The forefaid bill as concerning the Macedonian war, in the first Parliament assembled abouting the Macedonian war, in the first Parliament assembled about it, the first Parliament assembled about it is the first Parliament assembled about it. was in manner by all the centuries in the formost scrutinies nipped & flatled denied. Which ming, partly men of themselves were forward enough to do, as being over-wearied with long and fore wars, and worn out for very irksomnels of tedious travel, and painfull perils: and partly Q. Fabius 2 Tribune of the Commons, failed not to let them on: who taking the old course and way of blaming and accusing the nobles, had laid to their charge, that they sowed the seeds of war till, and ceated not to raile war upon war, to the end, that the commons might never be at reft, and enjoy the repose of peace, The LL, of the Senat took this to the heart, in such fort, that the Tribunewas shaken up and much reviled in the Senat-house with most opprobrious and reproachfull terms; and every man did his patt to encourage the Conful to publish a new affembly and scruting, for the proposing of the same bill; to chastise and rebuke the sloath and idleness of the people; yes, I and to open and thew unto them what great damage and loss, how much shame and dilworship they should incur by these delaies before the war began. Then the Consul having assembledthe people for this purpole in Mars field, before that he cited the Centuries to give their voices, called them all together and made a speech unto them in this wise: "It seemeth (quoth he) that you are ignorant, my Masters and Citizens of Rome, that the matter put to question is not, whether ye would have war or peace, (for Philip will not permit that to be at your disposition and pleasure. "who already prepareth mortall war both by iea and land but whether ye would rather choose "to transport the legions into Macedony, or receive your enemy here within Italy. And what di-"ference there is between the one and the other, you have had fufficient proof and experience (if ever at anytime before) even in this last war, especially with the Carthaginians, For who is he K that maketh doubt, but if we had with speed relieved the Saguntins besieged, who sled unto us "for help, and earnestly craved for our protection, like as our ancestors and progenitors in due "time affifted the Mamertins; we should have turned the whole violence and force of the war "into Spain, which by our long driving off & lingting delaies we entertained in Italy, to our great "lois and grievous calamity. Neitherneed we to doubt of this, but that we have hithertofiaid " Philip in Macedony, (who without question had combined with Annibal by means of letters and entercourse of Embassadors, for to have passed over into Italy before this time) only by "fending of Lavinus with a fleet, to begin with him at home, and to make war in his ownking-"dom. Defer we then to do that now, when Annibal is chased out of Italy and the Carthagini-" ans defeated; which then we did, when we had the same Annibal our enemy within Italy? Gol. "we onstill and suffer the King by winning the City of Athens (like as we permitted Annibally e forcing of Saguntum) to try and see our slackness and cowardise: we shall have him I warrant er you arrived in Italy, not at five months end, as Annibal was after his departure from Saguntum; si but withinfive daies, after he is difanchored once & under fail from Corinth, Set case ye will not " compare Philip with Annibal, no nor the Macedonians with the Carthaginians; yet I amfure e ye will make them matches, and equall with King Pyrrhus: fo far forth I fay, as one manexcelleth es another in valour, and one nation iurpasseth another in power. Epirus hath never been accounes ted, nor is at this day, but the smallest appendant to the kingdom of Macedony, and of least im-" portance. But as for Philip, the whole and entire seignory of Peloponnesus is under him, and Lord the is of Argos it self, a City nobled as well by the death of Pyrrhus, as the ancient name and te-M er nown that goeth of it. Compare now again the times of our state. How much stourished Italyin s' those daies more than now? Our affairs were then much more sound and unsoiled: our Capes tains safe, our armies all, so many as they were, untainted; whom the Carthaginian wars afterward confumed: yet as puissant and great as we were, Pyrrhus affaied us, he put us to trouble and "forrow enough, yea, and came intrain of victory to shake our free hold, even wel-near to the Cie: ty of Rome. So as not only the Tarentins, and all that tract of Italy, which they call the greater "Greece, banded with him in such fort, as a man would have thought they had followed the very anguage and those of their name: but the Lucans also and the Brutians, yea, and the Sampits rec: volted from us, and rebelled. And are ye of beliefe that these will be quiet and remain in loyalty and obedience, if Philip once were passed over into Italy? yes mary will they, there is no questi- N " on: for they flood fast afterwards, and continued true in the Punick war, Nay, nay, never make " reckoning that these States will not revolt from us so long as they know any one unto whom "they may turn and range themselves. If ye had thought much of it, and been loath to pass over "into Affrick in truth at this day ye should have had Annibal and the Carthaginians your enemies "(Hill in Italy, Let Macedony therefore be the feat of war rather than Italy: let our enemies Cities e and lands be destroyed with fire and sword. We have found well by good experience, that our "fortune is better, and onr forces wore puissant abroad in forrain parts, than at home in our own es Country, Go to therefore in the name of God to the Scrutiny and give your voyces; and those "things that the LL of the Senat have devised to do grant ye the same, and yield your assent, Ye " have not only the Conful author of this advice and counfel, but also the immortal gods (who as O "I offered facrifice and prayed devoutly unto them, that this war might redound to the good and 64 benefit of my lelf, of the Senat, of you, of our allies, of the Latine nation, and finally of our armies "and armadoes) have vouch safed me all the figns and tokens of comfort and joy, and affured me "that all shall be well, and according to our hearts desire. This Oration of his once ended, they went presently to deliver up their voices and gave affirmatively for the war, & suffered it to pass

according as he had propounded. Then by an order from the Senat there was a folemn supplication

The one and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

A for three daies proclaimed : and in all Churches and Chappels, and before every shrine & altar the gods were praied unto, that the war (which the people had allowed of) against K. Philip might be wel archieved, and have an happy end, Moreover, the Conful Sulpitius conferred with the heralds, and asked their advice, Whether they would ordain, that the war to be denounced against King Philip should be intimated to himself in person: orthought it sufficient to be proclaimed within the confines of his dominion, at the next frontier town of all, where he kept a garrifon and guard: they pronounced again, That it mattered not, but the Conful should please himself, and do full wellin the one and the other. Then the Conful was permitted by the LL of the Senat to chule whom he would, io he were not a Senator, for to lend as a messenger or pursevant of arms, to give the King defiance, and to publish war. After this it was debated in Council how the armies should B be disposed as well of Consuls as Prætors. The Consuls were commanded to enroll two legions, and to discharge and casse the old armies. Sulpitius, who by a decree was to manage this new war offogreat name and confequence, was allowed to take with him out of that army which Scapio the Vice-Conful had brought out of Affrick, as many voluntaries as he could procure : but in no case to urge any old fouldier against his will. Also it was decreed, that the Consul should allow unto the Prators L. Furius Purpureo, and Quintus Minutius Rufus 5000 men apeece of theastociats of the Latine nation; whom they should employ, the one in the Province of Gallia, and the other in the Brutians country to defend those parts and keep them in obedience. Q. Fulvins Gillo was himself likewije commanded to chuse out of that army which P. Ælius the Consul commanded, as many as had ferved fewelt years, untill he made up the number of 5000 also of the allies & C Latines; which should be a garrison to keep in order and safety the Province of Sicily, M. Valerius Falto, Prator the year before, and L. deputy of the Province of Campan, had his Commission figned anew, to continue for the term of one year longer, and as Vice-Prætor to pals over into Sardina, with direction to chule out of the army there 5000 of the allies and Latines, fuch as had served least time. And the Consuls were commanded to take up two legions of Citizens, which might be fent to any place, as need should require, considering that many nations in Italy tainted and intected with the fellowship and company of the Carthaginians during the wars and ever fince, were swelled with anger and despite against the Romans. Thus the Common-weal for that year was to use the employment of fix Roman Legions.

Amidst these preparations for war, there arrived Embassadors from K. Prolomeus, giving intelli-D gence, that the Athenians had craved aid of their King and Master, against Philip. And although they were confederate as well with him as the Romans, yet the King would fend into Greece neither a fleet of ships, nor an army of men, defensive, or offensive to any, but by authority and conient of the people of Rome. In case therefore the Romans were resolved, and sufficient withall of themselves to defend their allies, he would be willing to sit still and take his repose at home. Otherwife, if the Romans were rather disposed to rest and take their ease, he would himself be well content to fend such forces to the aid of the Athenians, as should defend them easily against all the power of Philip. The Senat returned great thanks unto the King, with this answer, That the people of Rome were purposed to protect their own allies: but if during this war they stood in need,upon any occurrence that might happen, they would give knowledge thereof to the King: as E being affured and making full account that all the puissance and wealth of his kingdom was a fure propand trufty pillar of their State and Common-wealth. This done, by order from the Senat the Embaffadors had given them for a reward * five thouland Affes apiece. Now whiles the Confuls * 15 list a fine. were busie in taking musters, and providing all things meet for the war; the City very devout and 6d, fterl. given much to religion, in the beginnings especially of all new wars, after they had performed their supplications aforesaid, and done their devotions at every altar and shrine : because nothing might be for-let and left out, that at any time heretofore had been done; ordained that the Cof. unto whom the Province of Macedony fell, should vow solemnly to exhibit to the honour of 7apiter, the great games and plaies, and a rich present beside. But Licinius the High Priest staid this publike vow for the time that it went not forward, alledging that it was not lawful to make a vow Fofanuncertain fum of money not determined: & if fuch money might not ferve for the use of war, it ought presently to be set by and laid up safe, and not be mingled and shuffled with other monies: and unless that were duly done, the vow could not be paid and performed according to the order of holy rites. Albeit the thing it felf and the person of the man that moved this scruple, touthed and troubled them much, yet they would needs that the Conful should propound the matter to the colledge of the Priests and Bishops, to know their resolution, whether a vow might not directly be made of an uncertain peece of money. The Bilhops fet down their opinion and judgment, that it might be well enough, yea, and better than otherwise. Whereupon the Consulpronounced the vow, according to the very same form of words (as the High Priest endited and spake before him) which aforetime they were wont to use, in making the quinquennal vows from five G years to five: fave only thus much, that he vowed and promited to represent the plaies, and to prefent oblations unto Jupiter, amounting to such a sum of money, as the Senat should set down a determinate fum of money ever affigned: but these were the first that were not limited within any certain flint and compais. Now when all mens minds were wholly bent upon the Macedonian war, behold on a findden, when they feared nothing less than such a thing, there arose a rumour of French troubles and Hhh 2 when the vow was to be performed. So many times before had the great games been vowed, and

tumults: for the Insubrians, the Cenomans and Boii, having sollicited and raised up by way of insur. H rection the Sallit, the Ilvations, and other states of Liguria, under the conduct of Amilear the Carthaginian, who in those parts staid behind with the remnant of Asarbal his army, were seized of Placentia: and after they had facked the City, and for very dispiteous anger burnt a great part of it, leaving hardly two thousand persons of all forts, which amidst the fire and ruins thereof chanced to fave themselves, crossed the river Po, and advanced forward to the spoil and pillage of Cremona. But the inhabitants of that Colony, having heard of the milery and calamity belain montheir neighbour-City, had some reipit and time to shut their gates, and to bestow their guards upon the walls : fo as, they should at least wife be first befreged or ever they were forced. and might be able to dispatch messengers unto the people of Rome. L. Furius Purpureo was governor of that Province for the time; who having by order from the Senat discharged all the rest of I the army but only five thousand of allies and those Latines, abode with that power in the next country to that Province, about Ariminum, He then addressed his letters unto the Senat, fignify. ing in how bad terms the provincestood, namely, that of thole two Colonies, which all the time of the Punick war had escaped those great storms and tempests of troubles, the one was wonby the enemies and put to the faccage, the other now befreged, and at hand to be loft: neither would his forces be sufficient and able to help the diffressed Cremonians, unless he should wilfully cast away five thousand allies, and expose them as a prey unto forty thousand of the enemies (for so many they were strong) to have their throats cut, and to be hewn in peeces; and by so great a loss and overthrow of his, to give more heart and conrage to the enemies, who are now in their ruff. and puffed up with pride for the ruin of one Roman Colony already. Upon the reading of these K letters, there went forth a decree from the LL. of the Senat, that C. Aurelius the Conful should fend out precepts for the army to be ready at Ariminum that very day, on which he appointed them to the Rendezwouz in Herruria: and that either himself in his own perion, if it might fland with the good of the State, would go with a power to suppress these French commotions, or else write to L. Furius the Prator, that when the Roman Legions presented themselves unto him out of Hetruria, he should send in their sead his own five thousand allies for the guard of Hetruria in the meantime, and make a journey himself in person to raise the siege before Cremona, and to fet the Colony free that now was beleaguered. They thought good belides to dispatch Embassisdors into Affrick, who should go to Carthage, and afterwards to Mafaniffa in Numidia. To Corthage, for to intimate unto them, That Amilear, a Citizen of theirs, left behind in France, (and L whether he were of the army of Afdrubal before or afterwards of Mago, they knew not for certain) waged war there against the covenants in the League contained: that he had assembled certain forces of French and Ligurians, to enter into arms against the people of Rome: and therefore, if they had any love to entertain peace, they should call him home, and deliver him to the people of Rome, Over and belides, they had in commission to give them to understand, that delivery was not yet made of all the runnagate rebels, but many of them, by report, were retired to Carhage, and there went up and down, and converted openly; which persons were, after diligent search made, to be attached and apprehended, that they might, according to the tenor of the accord, be fent home again, and delivered into the hands of the Romans. And thus much concerning their message to the Carthaginians, Now they had in charge besides to congratulate with Masanisa, M and to declare what joy they took in his behalf namely for that he had not only recovered the inheritance of his fathers kingdom, but also enlarged his dominion, by conquest of the most flourithing part of the Realm of Syphax. Moreover, commanded they were to figuifie unto him that they had undertaken to war upon King Philip because he had bestriended and aided the Carthaginians; and by offering and doing wrong to the friends of the people of Rome, even at what time as all Italy was full of troubles and wars, enforced and put them to it, forto fend their armies and their armadoes into Greece, and so by difmembring and dividing their forces into fundry places, was the principall cause that they were so late ere they passed over into Affrick: requesting him for the maintenance of this war, to fend over certain aids of Numidian horsemen. These Orators had great gifts and honourable presents given them for to carry unto the King, to wit, diverspee-N ces of plate both of gold and filver, a purple robe of State, with a rich castock or coat wrought in palm-tree work, with a royall Scepter of Ivory, also a robe embroydered before with purple, with an Ivory chair of state, Last of all they are willed to make promise unto the King, that if becould think upon any thing needfull and expedient either to establish his kingdom, or to advance his royall estate, the people of Rome would endeavour respectively for his good demerits to compais the same to the uttermost of their power.

There arrived also about that time Embassadors from Vermina the son of Spphax, and presented themselves unto the Senat, excusing the errour, and pretending the youth of rhe Prince cleering him of all Sauk, and laying the wholeblame upon the first and and treachery of the Carthaginians, promising for their King and Masser in this wise, That like as Masanissa of a professed enemy of was become a sworn friend to the Romans, even so would Vermina do his bests, and strain hintels that in all offices of sirred hip toward the people of Rome, settinet Massanissa, store on other should surpass and go beyond him; and making petition in his name, that the Senat would vouchiast to give him thetritles of King, of Ally, and Friend unto the Romans, These Orators had this fortheir answer, That not only Spphax, his father before him, of a confederate friend studenly without any cause at all proved an enemy to the people of Rome; but also himself had practised already in his

A young years, and laid the first ground of his warfare in annoying and troubling the Romans by war i and therefore he was to feek pardon and crave peace at their hands, before he might be invested by them with the terms of King, of Ally, and Friend: for the honour of that title the people of Rome were wont to vouchfatten none, but those Kings only who had deferved fingularly well of them. Mary there should be certain Roman Legats in Affrick, unto whom the Senate would give order to minister and tender unto Vermina certain conditions of peace, according to a large and abiolute commission that they had from the people of Rome, To do what they thought good. And in case the King milliked ought in those capitulations, and were deficous to have any article added, put out, or altered, he must recourse again to the Senat, and demand the sime. So there were Legats or Commissioners sent into Affrick, with such a Commission above had name-Bly, C. Terostius Varro, Sp. Lucretius, and Cn. Ottavius, and each of them had a galleace directed with site tows of oars.

After this were the letters read of Q. Minutius Prator in the Province of the Brutii, importing thus much, That the confectated money of Proferpina at Locri was by night floln out of her treajury; but to fay who should do the deed, they had no presumptions to give light and lead them directly. The Senat took the matter in very ill part, and grieved exceedingly, That facrilegious mentell fill to Church-robbing, and would not give over: and that the late and fresh example of Pleminius (so notorius as well for the hainous fact as the fearful punishment) was not able to terrifiethem and give them warning. So C. Aurelius the Col. was enjoyned to write unto the Prætor into the Brutians country, to this effect: That it was the Senats pleasure, that due enquiry and Cexamination should be had of the Treatury thus robbed, after the same precedent and course that M. Pomponius the Prator took three years before. And look what money could be found, it should be laid up duly in the place; and what was not forth-coming, it should be supplied and made good again. Also (if he thought meet) that there should be certain purgatory sacrifices.accoroing as the Bishops before ordained in the like case, for the expiration and satisfaction of the violating and defiling of the Temple, Moreover, there chanced about the same time divers prodigious tokens from many places to be reported. In the Lucans country the rumor and voice went that the welkin was on fire; and at Provernum, while the sky was bright and fair, the fun appeared red all day long. At Lanuvium, inthe Temple of Juno Sospita, there was heard in the night-season a mighty great noise. Nay, and more than this, in sundry places (as men say) were ma-D ny monitrous and strange births seen. In the Sabins country one child was born, and no man knew what to make of it, male or female: and another likewise was found of fixteen years of age, a very Hermaphrodite of doubtfull fex between both. At Frufino there was a lamb yeaned with a fwineshead : and at Sinuessa a sow farrowed a pig with the head of a man. In the Lucans country there was foled upon the common ground a colt with five feet. All these monsters were ugly to fee and abominable, and holden for great defects and errors of nature working strangely out of kind. But above all others, those births both male and female, (or rather neuter) were most abhorsed and detefted, and order was given presently, that they should be cast into the sea; even as of late daies when C. Claudius and M. Livius were Confuls the like deformed monster was thither hadaway and drowned. Nevertheless the Decemvirs were commanded to turn over and perule Ethebooks of Sibylla, to know what such prodigious monsters might portend: who by their learning and out of those books, gave direction to make the same sacrifices which last of all for the likeuncouth fights were made. Moreover, they gave commandment, that certain hymns and longs should be chanted throughout the City by three severall quires, of nine virgins in every one; and an oblation to be offered by them with all devotion to queen Juno. C. Aurelius the Conful caused all this to be performed according to the order and direction of the Decemvirs. And as in our fathers daies Livius composed the ditty of the hymn, so at that time P. Licinius Tegula framed and fer down a form of fong which they could fing. Thus when all things were expiate, and satisfaction made accordingly for the appearing of the wrath of the gods, (for even at Locrialio the facriledge was found out by Q. Minutius, and the money milling was railed out of F the goods of the offenders and guilty perions, and bestowed there again in the treatury) as the Con'uls were minded to take their journey into their Provinces, there repaired many private Citizens unto the Senat, unto whom the third payment was due that year for the loan of money, which in the time of M. Valerius and M. Claudius Confuls they had lent out and disburied, because that the Consuls had made them answer, That the stock of the City Chamber was hardly able to defray the charges of a new war, which required maintenance of a mighty Navy and of puitfair armies, and therefore flatly denied them, and taid, That they had not wherewith to fatisfie and make present payment. The Senat could not endure that they should have this occasion to make complaint; confidering, that if the Common-wealth would still employ the money upon the Macedonian war alto, which was granted in loan for the Punick war, G this would be the end of it that (one war following thus in the neck of another) their own money which was lent upon a curtesie and benevolence out of their private puries, should be little better than confiscate for some forfeiture, and fall to the Exchequer and common Chest of the City. These private persons demanding nothing but reason and right, and the City withall not able to discharge her debt, the Lords set down a middle and indifferent course between honesty and profit; and that was this: That for almuch as many of these men said, that the City had much land upon lale, and they were to buy and make purchase, therefore the common grounds lying and being withinfifty miles of Rome every way, should be granted unto them in fee H farm, and the Confuls to fet down an estimate of their value and worth, and charge them with a chief rent or tribute of three farthings an acre by the year, to tellifie only that they were the Cities lands; to the end that if any man hereafter (when the City should be aforehand and in case to repay the former debt) were defirous to have money rather than land, he should restore the lands and possessions again into the Cities hands and receive his money. These private Citizens (who were the foresaid creditors) accepted gladly of this offer and condition. And hereupon this land was called by the name of Trientius and Tributus, because it was set out and granted in lieu of a third part of the lone mony. Then P. Sulpitius after he had pronounced his vows abovefaid in the Capitoll, and departed out of the City in his coat of arms, with the Lictors and llfhers afore him, arrived at Brundusium; and so with the old voluntary souldiers drawn out of the army that was returned from Affrick, (whom he had enrolled into legions) and ships choien out of the fleet of Cornelius the Conful; he loofed from Brundusium, and the next day after landed in Macedonia: where attended him the Embassadors of the Athenians; who humbly befought him to deliver them from the fiege that invested their City. So C. Clau. Cento was incontinently fent to Athens, furnished with twenty long ships of war, and a strength of men: for the King himself in person besieged not Athens, but even then made hot assault upon the town Abydus, as having already given proof of his forces in fea-fight, both with the Rhodians and King Attalus, and in neither battell had good fuccess. But besides the ordinary stoutness and prideengrassed in him by nature, he was aloft now and looked high, by reason of the alliance made between him and Antiochus King of Syria, with whom he had parted the riches and Realm of Ægyps, unto K which they both appred, upon the news they heard of the death of Ptolomeus. Now the Athenians had drawn upon themselves the war against King Philip, upon a small occasion and of no importances who of all their ancient estate and glory, retain nothing else but great heart and hauty spirit. It fortuned that two young men of Acarnania, who had taken no orders and were not consecrate, entred among the other multitude into the Temple of Ceres, in the time of the feasitivall daies, and celebration of facrifices to that goddess belonging and being altogether ignorant in the custome of that solemnity and religion, and asking some foolish absurd questions, nothing fit for that time or place, were foon bewrayed by their speech and language: who being convented before the Prelates of the faid Temple, notwithstanding it was evidently proved and known, that upon an errour only & overfight, and not for any ill intent they were come into thel. Church, yet were they put to death as fellons, and guilty of some hainous fact in the highest degree. The people of Acarnania complained unto King Philip, and informed him of this villanous part and hostile act by them committed; and obtained a grant from him, that they might be permitted with the aid of the Macedonians, to make war upon the Athenians. This army at full invaded the territories of Athens, and with fire and fword made waste & havock of all, and so with a rich booty of all forts returned into Acarnania. These were the first quarrels on both sides that stirred coals and kindled fire between them. Afterwards was defiance given, and open war proclaimed, by the generall decrees of both States. For when King Attalus and the Rhodians pursued after Philip, as he retired into Macedony, and were come asfar as Egina, then the faid Kingpafsed over to Pyreaum, for to renew and confirm the league with the Athenians, Against his coming M the whole City went forth with their wives and children to meet him on the way: the Clergy with their rich vestments and goodly ornaments were ready to receive him as he entred the City: the very gods themselves in a manner abandoned their shrines to give him entertainment. Immediatly was the people summoned to a generall affembly, that the King might deliver his mind before them all: but afterwards, upon more fage advice, it was thought to fland better with the honour and Majesty of a Prince, that he should set down in writing what he thought good, rather than in open place either to blush himself in recounting his favors and good turns done unto the City, or in hearing the acclamations of the multitude in token of joy, to be abashed and ashamed of their gross and unmeasurable flattery. But in his letters which he sent unto the assembly, and were there openly read and published, first he made a rehearfall of the benefits that this con-N federate City had received at his hands. Secondly, he discoursed of the worthy exploits which he had performed against Philip. And finally he knit up all with an exhortation, that whiles they had himself, the Rhodians, and especially the Romans to friend them, they should put themselves in arms and begin war; as who if they now forflowed the enterprise, and let flip the present opportunity should hereafter seek in vain to find it, which once they had so retchlesty lost. Then had the Rhodian Embassadors audience given them, who lately had done the Athenians a great pleafure, in recovering and fending home unto Athens four long foifts, which newly had been bootded and taken by the Macedonians. Hereupon with generall accord they decreed to denounce and wage war against King Philip. But first they did King Attalus incredible honour beyond all measure and then likewise to the Rhodians. Then and never before there was some speech mo-O ved of adjoyning unto the ten ancient tribes, one other tribe, which of the Kings name should be called Attalia. Unto the City of the Rhodians they gave in token of vertue, a Crown of beaten gold. And like as beforetime the men of Rhodes had granted free Burgeofie of their City to the Athenians, to they of Athens now endured the Rhodians with their liberties and franchies. This Agean leasor done, K. Attalus returned to his fleet in the rode of Agina. The Rhodians then weighed anchor, Auchipelago. and from Egina failed to * Cea. From whence along the * Islands, they passed to the Rhodes:

A and in their voyage confedered themselves with them all, excepting * Andros, * Paros, and * Cyth- * Andros nus, which were guarded by garrisons of the Macedonians. In Agina King Attalus made his a . * Pario. bode a certain time, and entred into no action, by occasion of messengers whom he had sent into *Cysbro, or ; Andra, and Embassadors that were expected from thence. But as he could not prevail with the Camo. Etolians, & perswade them to take arms, contenting themselves with the peace that in some fort they had concluded with Philip: fo himself, and the Rhodians (who, no doubt, if they had pressed and followed hard upon Philip might have gained and enjoyed this glorious title, That they alone of themselves had delivered Greece from servitude) by suffering him once again to cross the seas as far as * Hellespons 111, and to posses himself of the commodious and important towns of Greece, * Streut de Calthereby to re-enforce his power and gather more firength, gave food and nourishment to the war, lipsti, Brathings B and in the end let the Romans go away with the honour, both of managing and also of finishing S Georgii, the same Philip carried with him yet a more princely mind and Kingly Courage: who, although S. Georgia at more he was not able to match and make his part good so much as with Attalus and the Rhodians his enemies, yet was he nothing at all danted with the thundring threats of the Roman war; but fent Philodes, a Captain of his, with a power of two thousand foot and two hundred horse, to invade and spoil the territory of the Athenians, committed his Armado to the charge of Heracliinvace and upon the territory of the Maronea, and himself in person marched by land thither with another regiment of two thousand sootmen lightly appointed, and two hundred men of arms. Maronea he Marolia. forced at the first assault. But as for Enus, after he had with much labour and travell laid siege thereto a long time, in the end he was Master thereof, through the treason of Ganymedes, deputed C L.Governor there for King Prolomans. After this he surprised and won other Castles, as Cypsela, Dorifcon, and Serrheum. From thence he advanced forward to Cherfone fus, where he gained Eleus and Alopeconnesus, which willingly surrendred : Callipolis also and Madytos, with some other peeces of bale account and reckoning. But the Abydens shut their gates against the King, and would not fuffer so much as his Embassadors to set foot within their Cities. There lay Philip a long time before the town and beleaguered it : and jurely had not Attalus and the Rhodians foreflacked the time, it might have been faved and the fiege raifed. Attalus fent thither three hundred souldiers and no more to lie in garrison, and the Rhodians one galley only with four banks of oars out of the navy when it rode at Tenedos. And afterwards when as Attalus himself was thither come at what time as the townsmen could hardly hold out any longer against the siege, he made D them a shew only near at hand of some help: other relief would he afford none to his allies either by land or fea. The Abydens at first planted their engins and artillery along the walls, and with that from thence not only distressed their enemies, and kept them from approach and entrance, but also annoyed them as they lay in harbour with their ships: but afterwards, seeing part of their walls ruinate and laid open; and perceiving befides that the enemies had undermined and were come under the ground as far as the inner countermure, which the inhabitants in great hastehadraised within, forthwith they sent Embassadors to the King to treat and article about some conditions for delivering up the City. The townsmen capitulated and demanded, that the Rhodian Galley aforesaid, with all her mariners, and the garrison also of King Attalus, might be sent away in safety, and themselves permitted to depart the town every one with a sin-E gle wit only of apparel. But Philip made answer again, that they had no peacefor them at all, unless they would quit the place, and simply commit themselves unto his mercy. This Embassage related unto them, fet them in such an heat and choler, that partly for spight and indignation, and partly upon despair, they fell into the like rage that the Saguntins did in times past. All the dames and wives of the City they commanded to be shut up within the Temple of Diana: their young boies and maidens that were free-born, the fucking babes, together with their nurses, they canfed to be bestowed within the common place of publike exercise: their gold and silver they took order to be brought into the market place: their rich attire, their costly apparell and furniture, to be cast into the two Galleys, the one of Rhodes, and the other of Cyzicum, which rid in the haven : and last of all, that their Priests should be brought forth with their beasts for facti-I fice and alters erected in the midst of the place. There first were certainmen chosen of purpose: who so soon as they perceived the battaillon of their countrimen deseated and slain, fighting before the breaches of the wall, immediatly should run upon their wives and children, and kill them without mercy, cast away into the sea their gold and silver, and all the furniture abovesaid that was in the Galleys, and fer the edifices and houses afire, as well publike as private, in as many places as possibly they could. For the performing and execution of these premises, they were bound by an oath ministred unto them; the form whereof, with a cursed malediction thereto annewd, they pronounced word for word from the Priests mouth. Then, as many as were of lawfull age to bear arms, sware likewise. That not one of them would depart out of the battellalive, but with victory. Thus remembring the oath they had taken, and how they called the gods to

G witness, they fought so resolutely, that whereas the night would have parted the combate, the King terrified with their furious rage, first gave over the conflict. The chief and principall men of the City, whose charge was to play the more cruell and horrible part in this tragicall act, seeing there remained but few alive after this skirmith, and those grievously wounded and tired our

and veiles of peace, to render the City unto Philip. Before the town was fully yielded, M. Emylim the youngest of those three Roman Embassadors which were sent to Alexandria, hearing of the straight siege of the Abydens came by the consent of the other two unto Philip, Where helaid H open their grievances, and made complaint. That he had warred upon Attalus and the Rhodians. and namely even then besieged and assailed Abydus most forcibly. And when the King answered that Accelus and the Rhodians without just cause on his part offered, began first to molest and trouble him, What! (quoth £n:ylius again) were you molefted and troubled first by the Abydens too? Philip who was not wont to be told the truth to plainly, thinking this rejoynder of his more bold and malapert than to be offered to a King, "Your youthfull age, quoth he, & airface, and above all the Roman name maketh you hardy and audacious. But I would advise you all "first to remember your covenants, and to entertain peace with me. For in case ye once begin "with me, and put me to it : I do you understand, that I also am fully resolved to make you feel "the fmart, and know, that the realm and nation of the Macedonians is no less renowned for feats I of arms than the Romans. Philip having dismissed the embassador, and seized upon all the gold and filver that lay on an heap together, loft all the booty of men of quality that might have vielded him a round ransom. For the multitude of common people fell into such a fit of rage and madness, that all of a sudden they imagined those who let their lives in the conflict were betrayed: and so casting one in anothers teeth their perjury, and charging the Priests especially that they were forsworn in delivering them alive unto the enemy whom they had devoted and appointed to death; they ran at once from all parts to the pitifull massacre of their own wives and children: and when they had so done, they made no more ado, but by fire, by sword, by drowning, hangging, and one way or other, they wrought a quick dispatch and clean riddance of themselves also The King aftonied to fee them thus horn mad, ftaid the bloudy his own fouldiers, faying that K he would allow the Abydens three daies to dye in. During which term of time the conquered Abydens exercised more fearful cruelty upon their own persons than ever the conquerors would have put in practice in the height of their heat and cholerick fury. Infomuch as there was not one of them came alive into the enemies hands; but such as either fast tied with bonds, or otherwise by some forcible means were staid from being their own hangmen, and the butchers of their proper bodies, Philip after he had placed a garrison at * Abydus returned into his own Realm, Now when this milerable calamity of the Abydens hadfleshed Philip to enterprise war against the Romans, like as Annibal afore him took heart by the wofull destruction of Saguntum to do the lemblable: behold, he was encountred with posts that brought news, how the Consul was in Entrated already, and had withdrawn his land-forces to Apolloma, and bestowed his servitors at sea in Cor-L

In this while the Embassadors who were sent into Affrica had their dispatch and this answer from the Carthaginian. First, as couching Amilear the Generall of the army and forces in France, they could do no more but banish his person, and confiscat his goods. Then concerning the higitive traitors and rebels which were run from the Romans, they had fent home again unto them as many as they could fearch out and come by : and to that purpose they would address Embassadors themselves unto the Romans, to satisfie the Senat in that behalf. And presently they sento Rome two hundred thouland Modii of wheat, and other two hundred thouland into Macedom to the army there. From thence the Roman Embassadors went forward to the King in Numidia To King Masanifa they delivered the presents which the Romans sent, and declared unto him M their commission; at whose hands they received a thousand Numidian horse, whereas he offered them two thousand: himself took order fortheir embarking, and so dispatched them into Macedony, with provision of two hundred thousand * measures of wheat, and as many of barley, A third Embassage they had to Vermina, who met the Embassadors as far as the utmost marches of his Realm, and to their disposition and discretion referred the drawing and penning of all conditions of peace as they would themselves: saying withall, that he held any peace whatsoever, thathe should have with the people of Rome for good and just. So there were presented unto him certain articles and conditions of peace, and for the ratifying thereof he was enjoyned to fend his

Much about the very same time L. Cornelius Lentulus the Vice-Prator returned out of Spain: N who having declared in the Senat his valiant and fortunate exploits, that for many years together he hadatchieved in Spain; and in confideration thereof, demanded that it might be lawfull for him to enter the City in triumph: the Senat judged that his noble acts deserved no less than he fued for: but they had no such precedent from their ancestors, that he should be allowed to the umph, who had warred, neither as Dictator, nor Conful, nor Prætor: and as for Lentulus, in quality of Vice-Prator only, and not of Conful or Prator he took upon him the charge of the Province of Spain. Howbeit, in the end they came down to this point, that he should ride into the City on horseback as Ovant. But T. Sempronius Longus a Tribune of the Com. interposed his negative, alledging that they had as little example to shew for that; and no practise or custome at all of their ancient predecessors. But in fine the Tribune gave place to the generall accord of the LL, and was content to be over-ruled. So after the order fet down by the Senat, L. Lentulus entied finite ounce. Rome in that folemnity and pomp before-named. He presented in shew of the pillage that he had got, 44000 pound weight of filver, * 2450 pound weight of gold. To his fouldiers he diffibuted out of the spoil * 120 Asses apeece.

Now was the army of the Conful translated already from Aretium to Ariminum, and five thousand Latine allies were passed out of France into Etruria, Therefore L. Furius departed from The one and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

A Ariminum, made haste by taking great journeyes to come against the Gauls, who then laid siege to Cremona, and encamped within a mile and an half from the enemy. Means and opportunity he had to do a notable exploit, and win a good hand of the enemies, if immediatly upon his first coming he might have assailed their Camp: for they wandred to and fro in scattering wife up and down the country a forraging, and had left no inflicient guard for the detence of their Camp. But heleared greatly that his fouldiers were weary and tired : became the companies marched apace thither in exceeding great hafte. Howbeit the Gauls being called back by the hooping and hollowing of their fellows, let go their booty which they had in manner as good as in their hands. and returned to the Camp, and the morrow after ranged themselves in battell array. The Romans were not behind for their parts, albeit they had hardly time enough to let themselves in order. B the enemies ran fo fuddeniy, and made such haste to fight. The right wing (for the army of the allies was divided into wings) was placed in the vanguard: the two Roman legions in the rereward; M. Furius led the right wing, M. Cecilius had the conduct of the legions; and L. V. slerini Flacens (all three Lieutenants) commanded the Cavalry. The Prator kept with him two Lieutenants, Cn. Lectorius, and P. Titinius, by whole means he might look about from every part, and be ready to oppose himself against al sudden attempts what soever of the enemies. At the first, the Gaulshoped that with their numbers they should be able to tread down and trample under their feet that right wing of allies which was in the forefront: and to that effect they reduced their multitudes into one place, and charged upon it with all their might and main together. But leeing thitemerprise sped not well, they endeavoured to environ the corners and sides, and to compais Ctheenemies round about: which they thought they might foon do, being to many as they were incomparison of so few: which when the Prætor perceived, to the end that he also might spread out his battrillons at large, he displaied the two legions in the rereward, so as he compassed on both hands that wing which fought in the vanguard: and therewith vowed two Chappels to 711partif that day he might be so fortunate as to vanquish his enemies. To L. Valerius he gave direction, that of one fide he should with the Cavalry of the two legions, and on the other fide with the horse belonging to the allies charge upon the wings of the enemies, and not suffer them inany case to enclose the battell about. Herewithall himself also, espying the midle battaillon of the Gauls to be but thin, by reason they were stretched out from thence to the corners and points of each hand, commanded his fouldiers to keep close together, to advance forward and break D through their ranks. So were the wings of the Gauls by the horsemen discomfitted, and they in the midh repulsed back & chased by the footmen: and when the enemies thus at once on every hand were beaten down and killed, they shewed their backs, and fled as fast as they could to the camp. Thehorfe pursued them in the rout and chase; and anon the legionary footmen made after also, andgave an assault upon their Camp. There escaped from thence not all out fix thousand: slain there were and taken prisoners above 35000, with seventy banners and ensigns, and more than two hundred French wagons, charged and laden with much pillage. In this conflict, Amilear the Generall of the Carthaginians lost his life, and three Noblemen of the French, Leaders of mark and name. The Placentine captives, to the number of two thousand men of free condition, were delivered again to them of their own Colony. This was a goodly victory; and upon the letters E which came with tidings thereof to Rome, received there with great joy; and ordained it was, that a folemn procession should be held for the space of three daies. Of Romans and allies one with another, there died in this battell two thousand: most of them were of that right wing, upon which the enemies in the beginning of the conflict most of all discharged their surv.

Albeit the Prætor had brought the war to a good pass, and in manner finished it, yet the Could also C. Aurelius, having accomplished his necessary affairs at Rome, made no stay but 100k his journey into France, and received the victorious army of of the Prætor, The other Conhi who came into his Province but a little before the end of Autumn, wintered about Apollonia. The Roman gallies which from the Armado that lay indock at * Coreyra, were fent as is afore- * corpus, said to Athens with C. Claudius, were no sooner arrived at Pyreaum, but they mightily comforted the allies, whose hearts were well-nigh done: for neither were there any more inrodes now by land as there were wont to be from Corinth fide by the way of Megara along into their territoties: and the men of war and Pyrats ships which from Chalcis had made not only the seas dangrous to the Athenians, but also the maritime & sea coasts, durst not now approach nearer than tothe cape of Sunium, no nor venture into the open main fea from out of the firaights of Euripus, Our and besides, there came in to them three Rhodian gallies with four banks of oars: there war also three open thips of Athens well rigged and appointed, for to keep the quarters that lay along the river. Claudius was well appaied, and thought he had got enough for the presemincase the City and Territory of Athens might be sufficiently guarded by this fleet. But see, therepresented unto him an occurrent besides of far greater importance and consequence. Certain banished persons of Chalcis, expelled from thence by the wrongs and violence of those that fided with King Philip, advertised him, that the City of Chalois might be eafily surprised withontany conflict or refiftance at all: for, not only the Macedonians ranged abroad every where up and down, because there were no enemies near at hand to fear; but also the townsmen Prefuming upon the garrison of the Macedonians, neglected the guard of the City. Upon the al-Prince of their words, he fet forward: and although he was arrived at Sunium with to good freed, that he might with ease have sailed to the entrance of the streights of Eubera, yet for sear of being discovered (when he was once got past the cape) he kept his fleet within the bay still until night: and at the shutting in of the evening he weighed anchor and lanched forth, and having calm fea, he arrived before Chalcis a little before the break of day, and prefented his forces against thole parts of the City that were least peopled: and with the help of some few souldiers he scaled and got the Tower that flood next, with the wall about it, whiles in some places the warders were found afleep; and in others not at all to befound. Then they advanced forward unto those parts that were more inhabited, and stood thicker with houses; where, after they had killed the guard and broke open a gate, they received into the town all the rest of their souldiers. Wherespe on there was running now on every hand into all parts of the City, and much hurry and continon; which was the greater, because the enemies had set fire on the houses about the market place. The Kings garners allo were of a light fire, together with the arlenall and armory, wherethere was exceeding store of provision, of engins, of artillery and other ordnance and instruments for war. After this they fell to execution and to massacre in every place, as well those that fled as those that made head; to as they missed not one that was of age meet to bear arms, but either he was killed or put to flight, Sopater likewise the Acarnanian Captain of the garrison was there slain, All the pillage was first brought and piled up together in the common place of the City, and afterwards embarked. The common Goal befides was broke open by the Rhodians, and the priloners and captives let out, whom Philip had there lodged as in a place of fureit guard and cultody. Then they overthrew the Images and statues of the King, and brake their necks: which done, they founded the retreat, went a shipboord, and returned to Pyreaum, from whence they came, But if the number of Roman fouldiers had been such that they might have kept Chalca still with a gar- K rison, without quitting and abandoning the defence of Athens, a great matter had been got inthe very beginning of the war: to wit, the City of Chalcis and the passage of Euripus, had been taken from the King, For as the narrow pais of Thermopyle stoppeth the wates into Greece by land, fothe fireights of Euripus maketh all fure by iea. Philip at that time lay in the City Demetrias; where, after he heard the news of the calamity befain upon a confederate City, albeit now it wastoo late to help when all was loft; yet because he would be revenged (which is a thing that cometh near to the nature of aid and fuccour) he went forth immediatly with five thousand footnen lightly appointed and nimble, and three thousand horsemen, with all the speed and hast he could to reach near unto Chalcis; making full reckoning that the Romans might be furprised on a fudden: but being disappointed of this hope, and thither come where he could see nothing else but a pitious spectacle of a friend-City half ruinare and still smoaking and so few people lest alive, that they hardly were able to bury their dead, he returned as haltly as he came; and having palledover Europus at a bridge, he lead threight to Athens by the way of Baotia, with a deep periwasion and hope, that a like enterprise unto the Romans should have the like issue, And verily he had not missed of the semblable effect, correspondent to his designs, but that a certain watchman (one of those whom the Greeks call Hemerodromos, that is posts and carriers that in one daies space will run and rid a mighty deal of ground) descried from a watch-tower the Kings troops matching: whereupon he ran out afore, and came to Athens ere midnight. There were they all asleeptoo, and as retchlets as they of Chalcu were a few daies past, which was the loss of their town. The Prator of the Athenians, and Dioxippus the Captain of a regiment of hired frangers and aid-M fouldiers, awoke at this so fearfull and sudden tidings and got up, affembled the souldiers into the market-stead and commanded to sound alarm from the highest place of the City, that all men might take knowledge that the enemies were near at hand. By which means they ran every man from all parts to the gates and up the walls. Within few hours after, and somewhat beforedaylight, he approached the City: and feeing many lights every where, hearing also a noise of people running to and fro (as in time of such a tumult) he staid his march, and commanded his souldiers to fit them down and rest themselves, intending to proceed by overt and open forces, since covert and crafty courses sped no better: and so at length he came before Dipylos. This Dipylos is a gate, standing in the very front of the City, greater and wider a great deal than the rest.

Both within and without that gate are large and broad streets, so that both the inhabitants, within may marshall an army, and lead in battellarray from the common place directly to the gate, and also the enemies without have room at will to conduct a power as well of horse as foot, by means of a spacious causey or high-way, which reacheth out almost a mile in length from the foresaid gate, and leadeth to the place of exercise or school called Academia. At this quarter of the City the Athenians, together with the garrison of Attalus, and the regiment of Dioxippus, issued forth, and entred the causey abovenamed, having first within the gate set their men in order of battell, Which when Philip law, he made full account, That he had his enemies as he would himself to do his pleasure with them, and that now he should have his fill of a massacre and flaughter that he had wished for so long (for there was not a State or City in all Greece that he maliced more than this of Athens.) And therefore he exhorted and encouraged his fouldiers, that O they should have their eye upon him ever as they fought, and know well this, that where the King was, there should the banners and cornets be displaied, there should the strength and force of the battell be : and so he set spurs to his horse, and ran with full carreer to charge the enemies. Thus was he not only carried away with heat of choler, but ravished also with a defire of glory, esteeming it a goodly thing, and a matter tending to his great honour, for to be seen fighting in the view of a great multitude of people that had taken up and filled the battlements of the walls

(as it were) to behold a solemn spectacle, Thus being advanced a good way before the main hattail, accompanied with some few men of arms, he rode among the mids of the enemies, where he bare himself to valiantly, that as he mightily heartned his own men, to be affrighted no less his enemies. Many a one he wounded with his own hand, reaching at theor that were neer, levelling at those that were farther off, and drave them afore him like theep and followed hard upon them in person to the very gate; where he made soul work among them, thronged and crouded as they were together in the freight of the passage, for half they made to cheape, and committed a grieyous flaughter. And albeit this was but an unwile and roth adventure of his yet he retired himiell in lafety, without farther danger of his person, by reason that they who were placed in the turrets of the gate, forbare to shoot and lance their darts, because they would not hurt their own Blide, intermingled among the enemies. But after this, when the Athenians kept their couldiers within the walls, Philip founded the retreat and pitched his tents at Comfinger, where there was a Temple of Hercules, and a school of learning and a grove standing about it. Astor Cynofarges, and the school Lyceum, and what loever was either religious, or pleasant and delectable about the City, was burned. And not only the edifices, but the icpulchres also and monuments of the dead were defaced and cast down: in which furious heat of anger, nothing was spared, were in facred orprophane, without regard of God and man. The next morrow, when the gates we refirst kept thur and afterwards fet open again upon a fuddain, because the garrison of Attalus entred into the City from Egina and the Roman from Pyreaum fide; Philip dislodged and removed back from the City almost three miles. From whence he went to Eleufine, hoping to surprise the Temple at Cunawages, together with the Town and Caftle, which both environeth the Temple, and all o commandeth the fame. But when he perceived that the corps de guard was not neglected, and that a fleet befides was coming from Pyreaum to fuccourthem, he gave over this defign and led his army to Megara, and fo streight forward immediately to Corinth; and having intelligence, that the Achai held a general Diet and counsel at Argon, thither he came unlooked for of the Achaans, and put himself amongst them at the very session and assembly. Consultation there was, about waging war with Nabe the tyrant of the Lacedemonians: Who seeing, that the Seignory of Aclas was taken from Philopamenes and conferred upon Cycliades, a Captain not to be named and compared with him, and perceiving also that the aids which the Achaens had, were fallen from them and gone, took their vantage tenued the old quarrel, and made fresh war upon them, D walling the villages and territories of the borderers, yea, and threatning the good Towns and Cives allo. Now whiles they fat deviling and conferring together what number of fouldiers should be levied and enrolled out of every several state and City, for to withstand this common enemy, Philip franckly promifed to ease them all of that care as touching Nabu and the Lacedemonlansiand nor only to impeach them for ipoiling the lands of their Allies, but also to lead his army out of hand into the very territory of Laconica and Sparta, and thither to turn the whole terror of this war. This kind speech and friendly offer of his, being with a general applause of them all accepted. "Mary, this you mult (quoth he) take withal, that good reason it is, whiles "Imy felf am content to defend and maintain your country by my forces, mine own territories "in the mean time be not disfurnished of their garrilons and left naked; and therefore, if ye think "good, provide me as many foul diers as may fuffice for the guard of Oreum, Chalcie and Corinth, "that thus making all fure behind me. I may be fecured from danger that way and with more re-"lolution profesure the war against Nabia and the Lacedemonians. The Achaens imelled him "quickly & knew full well, to what end this gracious promite of his and frank offer of aid against the Lacedemonians tended. His only drift wasto draw forth of Pelopinn for the youth and flour of the Achaans as a pledge and fure holtage for to engage the whole nation to far as they should beintereffed in the war that he had with the Romans, Cyclindes the Pretor of the Achanns thinking it bootless, and no good policy; to discover so much and to enforce that point against him, interred only this speech and said, That it was not lawful by the customes and ordinances of the Acheans, to propose other matters to parle of, thanthose for which they were assembled toge-F ther: and so after the order enacted for levying and waging anarmy against Natis, he dissolved and brake up the affembly, which he now had held right flourly and with the liberty of the place, who otherwise before that time was taken ever for no bette. I han one of the Kings flatterers and favorits. Thus Philip put befides the great hopes that he had conceived, levied some small number of voluntary fouldiers, and returned to Covinth and the land of Att c: During the time that Ph I p was in Achea, Philocles a Captain under the King, departed out

During the time that Ph I p was in Acta, Princip a Captin under the first departed of Enbas with two thousand Thracians and Maccdonians, for to wait and fool the confines of the Athenians; and overagainst Elensima passed over the forrest and hill Criberon, from whence having sent out the one half of his forces every way to prey upon the pain country, he sat him-less done in the other half in a convenient place for an ambusth, to the end, that if per-Gadrenure they should make out from the Fort at Elensime, and fet upon his solidiers as they drave booties, he might suddainly arise and charge upon the enemies at unawares, spred, and seatered all abroad. But this ambusthment was discovered, And therefore after he had called the solidiers back who were run all abroad a foraging, he put them in order well armed & appointed to befiege and assault the Fort of Elensime, against which heled all his forces: but after much but and many a wound received from them, he retired, and joyned with Philip as he returned out of Acta. The King also himself in person, assaid to force and batter the said hold; but the Roman ships coming from Pyreaum, and a fresh garrison received into the place, caused him persone to give over the enterprise. After this the King divided his power, and fent one part thereof against Athens, under the conduct of Philocles, and himself with the other marched to Pyreaum that whiles Philocles kept the Athenians within the City, by approaching their walls, and threatning to befiege and affault it, he might himself with facility win and gain Pfreeam, wherein there was lest but a small and slight guard. But he found as hot a peece of service about the assailing of Pyreaum, as before at Elensine, by reason of the same souldiers in manner that defended as well the one as the other, so on a suddain he departed from Pyreaum. & marched directly toward Athm.

From whence he was repulfed and chased by a suddain fally both of horse and foot, made from the ftreights of the wall half ruinat; which wall ftretching out, as it were, two arms, joyneth thepor Presum to Athens. So he left battering and affaulting the City, and parting again his army with Philocles, he went out to forrage and spoil the country: and as in his former faccage he exercised himself in demolishing the tombs all about the City, so because he would leave nothing entire and fafe, he commanded the chappels of the Gods, which were confectate in every village and hamler, to be pulled down, rafed, and burnt,

The countrey of Anica was marvailously beautified and embelished (as it were) with goodly neeces of work in that kind, (by reason as well of the store they had of native marble, as also of their industrious and excellent workmen) which ministred matter and occasion unto him of this outrage and madness. For not contented and satisfied with the ruin of the Temples, and cassing down of images, he commanded that the very stones should be broken and batter'd in peeces, that left being whole and found they might ferve to make up and ftop the breaches of the mins, " And after that his fell mood and anger was not fo much fatisfied and fatiate, as it wanted matter to work upon in that place, he departed out of his enemies countrey into Baotia, and performed

no other deed in Greece worthy of remembrance.

Sulpitim the Conful at that time lay in camp between * Apollonia and * Dyrrachium, neer the * Siffopoli, Piriver Appa : and having caused T. Applies the Lieutenant to come thither, he fent him with part of his forces to wast the borders of his enemies. Apulius after he had forraged the frontiers of Macedon, and forced at the first affault certain holds, as Corrhagum, Gerrhenium, and Oriesus, came with his army before Antipatria, a City leated in the narrow fireights of a certain pallage, And first he called forth the principal and chief citizens to a party, and affaied to perswade and induce them for to commit themselves under the protection and safeguard of the Romans; but afterwards, seeing the wated upon their greatnes, the strong walls and situation of the Town and therefore made no reckning of his motives, but rejected them, he affailed it by force of arms, and wan it in the end. All that were above fourteen years of age he put to the fword; the wholepil, lage he dealt amongst the fouldiers; the walls he rased, and let fire on the Town. The fear of like milery was the cause that Codrio, a Town of good strength and well fortified, was yeelded to the Romans without affault, or any (word drawn. There he left a garrison: and after that, he forced Iliuma Town better known for the name that it carieth of the other famous Himm in Afra, than for any thing else. As the Lieutenant returned with a great booty to the Conful, one Athenagoras a Captain under the King, charged upon the tail of the arreergard, difordred the hindmost, and impeached their passage over the river : but the Lieutenant, at their cry and stiddain affright rode in M all hast back, cansed them to turn again and make head, set them in battail ray, and bestowed all their bag and baggage in the mids upon a heap. The Kings fouldiers not able to abide the violence of the Romans, were many of them flain, and more taken prisoners. So, the Lieutenant having retired his army in fafety, was immediatly fent back unto the Conful to the Armado.

The war being thus begun, and the exploit of this first expedition happily performed, the Princes, Potentates, and LL, that bordered upon the Macedonians, repaired into the Roman camp, to wit, Plearatus the son of Scerdiletus, Aminander King of the Athamans: and from Dardania, Bato the son of Longarus. This Longarus had waged war aforetime in his own name and quarely with Demetrius the father of this Philip. These States offring and promising their aids unto the Conful, had this answer from him, That for the Dardanians and Pleuratus, he would use them, N when he entred with an hoft into Macedony. As for Aminander, he gave him in charge the while to follicit the Ætolians to war. The Embassadors of Attalus (for they also were come atthesame time) he dispatched with this order, That their King should attend the coming of the Roman fleet at Egina, where he wintered ; with which and his own jointly together, he should assaul Philip at sea like as he had done beforetime. Embassadors also were addressed to the Rhodians, that they likewife should have their hand and be seen in this war. Philipsor his part foreslowed not to make preparation (for now by this time was he come into Macedony) and fent with part of his forces for to keep the streights of the passage of Pelagonia, his son Perfeus, a very child of young years, having chosen certain of his trusty friends, to direct and govern his tenderage. As for * Sciathus and * Peparethus, two Towns of no small importance he destroied, for seartheene 0 mies fleet should seize upon them, and with their pillage content and pay themselves. He sent likewife Embaffadors to the Ætolians (a nation inconstant and unquiet by nature) that they should not upon the arrival of the Romans, change their alleageance. Now the Diet or general countel of all the states of Liolia, which they call Panatolium, was to be held at a certain day appointed. And therefore to prevent and meet with all dangers, both the Kings Embassadors made hast to be present thereat; and also L. Furius Purpurio presented himself there, as sent Embassador from the Athenian Embassadors likewise were at this assembly. And first the Macedonians (with whom a league was but lately concluded, and therefore freshest in remembrance) had audience, who faid, "They had no new matter to speak of, seeing there was no new occurrent and The Oration abusiness faller out: only this, that upon what motives and confiderations they were entred into of the Macedo. Or, love ye rather (quoth one above the rest of the Embassadors) to imitate the Romans licentionines or their levity, I know not whether? who, as they gave order and com-"mandment, that your Embassadors being at Rome, should receive their dispatch and answer in "these texms : Come ye now to us indeed my masters of Ætolia, when without our consent and R's warrantye have made peace with Philip? so likewise at this present are ready to require that ye of fhouldband with them, and war upon Philip. They pretended aforetime that they took arms against him, by occasion of you, in your quarel and defence; & now they forbid you to be in peace with Philip. At first, they entred into Sicily for to aid and succour Messana. A second time they " went thither to fet free and deliver Syracufa out of the oppression of the Carthaginians, And s now at this time they hold in possession both Messana and Syracusa: and all Sicily entire they " have made it tribut ary, yea, and reduced it into the form of a Province, to be ruled under their *fword, and the jurisdiction of their Deputies and Magistrates. And this dealing, none of them either can or ought to marvail at: for "why they fee Cities of Italy, by name Rhegium, Tarentum, and Capua, (to ipeak nothing of their D a neighbour Towns by whole fall they arole, by whole ruins Rome grew mighty) subject likewise "to the same rule and government. As for Capha, the very sepulcher and tomb of the Compan na-"tion (now that the natural people thereof are either dead and buried, officiven out as exiled "persons) remaineth at this day as a monster and wonder in nature, resembling a headless and "limleis dilmembred trunk of a body:a Town(I lay) without Senat, without Commonalty, with-"out Magistrats: where more cruelty was shewed, in leaving it to it self thus abandoned, and in "this manner to be inhabited, than if it had been clean rated and laid even with the ground. Meer "folly it is and without all fense and reason, to believe or hope, that if these strangers and aliens "born (who differ more from us in language, in customes and laws, than they are distant and dis-" joyned by space between of land and sea) be once seized and possessed of these places, that any e "thing will continue long entire in the present state. The Kingdom of Philip (ye will say) is a block "in your way, and feemeth to prejudice your freedom & liberties : yet he being made your heavy "friead, and that through your own fault and defert, required no other thing at your hands for a-"mends, but peace; and even now defireth nought eliebnt your alleageance; and the faithful ob-"lervance of the same. Acquaint forein legions once with this your countrey; you take the youe offervitude upon your necks for ever Accept the Romans once for your Lords: too late it will "be then and in vain for you, to feek Philip again, and wish him your ally. But all Grecians both are and ever will "beat war with Barbarians: enemies they are by nature, which is perpetual and immutable; and "not by occasions which alter every day. But where I began my speech, there will I leave & make "an end. In this very place you the same men, agreed three years past to have peace with Philip: "and the felf-same Romans as they milliked then & disavowed that peace so now they wil needs "disquiet and trouble it after it is once passed and accorded. And since the case still is all one, and "forume hath made no alteration, I see no reason why ye should vary and change your minds. And look what roul work he hath made in the "Country of Attica, fo rich and so beautifully adorred in times past, the like havock if he might " be let alone, would he make in Atolia and in all Greece throughout. For had not the Romans come in time to succour, our very City also had been so served and piteously disfigured. For with like milchievous intent came he to the City which worshipped those Gods, not sparing "thegoddes Minerva, the patroness and protectress of our Town and Cattle: the same wicked " mind he caried against the Temple of Ceres Eleusina: and no better affected was he to Jupater "and Minervain Pyreaum. But being repulled by force and arms not only from our Temples, 66 but also from the walls of our City he wreaked his anger and raged against those Chappels and religious houses, which had nothing for their delen e but only the reverent regard of the Gods, " whereof he had none, Herenpon, they prayed and humbly belought the Ætolians, to have com- K "paffi n of the Athenians, and to enterprise the war, under the conduct first of the immortal "Gods, and then of the Romans, who next to the Gods are most powerful and mighty. Then "the Roman Embessadour spake in this wife, "The Macedonians first, and after them the Athe-" nians, have altered the whose course and form of my speech. For, whereas my coming hither wasto complain of the injuries done by Philip to io many Cities of our allies and affoliats the "Macedonians by accusing the Romans first, have put me so hardly to my shifts, that I need a-"ther to employ my wits in moking a defense of our felves, than in framing an accutation against cothers. The Athenians again in reckoning up and recounting the impious, abhominable, and in-"human parts of King Philip committed against the Gods, both above and beneath, what have they left behind for me or any man effe to object against him besides? What they have said, 1 e you may wel think, and truly suppose, that the men of Chios, Abydus, Enus, Maronea, Theles, "Paros, Somos, Lariff and Moffine; those also here of Achaia, complain of the same, yea, and of of more grievous and cruel enormities; as whom he had greater means to annoy and hunt, as " for fuch things as he hath laid to our charge, if they deserve not honor and glory, I contest they "cannot be answered and desended. Reproched us he hath with Rhegium, with Capus, and Sy-"racufe, I cannot deny, but duting the war of Pyrrhus we fent a legion to Rhegium, theretoile in garrilon at the inflant prayer of the Rheginsthemielves, who requested us to lend them. "This legion I confe s, most wickedly and treacherously teized upon the City, and possessed it "to their own use, for the guard and defence whereof they were first sent. A vowed we (1 pray "you) that act of theirs? Nay, puriued we not by arms that lewd legion and ungratious? and M "when we had them in our power and at our devotion forced not we them to make amends and " fatisfaction to our allies, with the imart of their back and fides, and with the loss of their heads "in the end? And when we had to done, restored we not unto the Rhegins their City, their Lands, all their goods what loever together with their liberties, franchiles, and laws? As for the Syracufians, when they were opprefied by strange and forrain tyrants, we judging it to be a ce great indignity, relieved and succoured them : and after we had been (for three years ipace almost) wearied and toiled out with continual siege and uncessant assault both by land and sea of "their City, so exceeding strong and so well fortified; we seeing that the Syracusians themselves " made choice rather to be in servicude under those tyrants, than to be taken by us, gavethem "their City again both forced and freed by the same armies. Neither deny we that Sicily is our N "Province; and that the Cities which took part and fided with the Carthaginians, & joyntly with them accorded to wige war against us, are tributaries unto us, and pay us yearly rents and pen-" fions may, we are fo far from not taking this upon us that contrary-wife we would, that both " you and all nations befides well knew, that every one received at our hands that measure of fortune that he duly deferved. And now as touching the Capuans, should we repent that we have " chastised them in such sort, whereof they themselves verily can not complain? These men, after es we had maintained war against the Samnits in their quarrel and desence, for the space well near " of seventy years to no small di pence of ours and with many a loss and overthrow after we had "linked them unto us, first by league and alliance, then by marriage and affinity, and last of all, by " freedom and burgeofie of our City: their men I fay, in our advertity, were the fir of all other o anations of It. 19. that villanously massacred our garrison there, and revolted unto Annibal and "then for very (pight and indignation that they were by us befieged, fent Annibal to affailthe City of Rome. A "themselves away and so perished, than were by us executed and put to death. As for the rest, we "took from them indeed their Town, we deprived them of their possessions and livings, yet so, as weleft them both lands to occupy, and place to dwell in: the guiltless Town it self we suffered "to fland still lafe and found, that who foever at this day feeth it, can not find the least token or " shew of a City either forced or won. But what speak I of Capua? seeing we have afforded unto "Carthage (2 City conquered and jubdued) both peace and also liberty? Infomuch as we have "cause rather to be afraid, lest by remisseness and over-willingnes to pardon those whom we have "vanquished, we give occasion to many more to be so bold as to trie the hazard and fortune of " war against us. And thus I had to say in defence of our selves. Now somewhat I have to speak "against King Philip; whose horrible murders committed upon those of his own house, even his "neerest kinstolk and friends; whose loose life and unbridled lust (more unkind and inhumane in "manner than his cruelty) ye know better that are neerer unto Macedony. As for you, my ma-"flers of Etolia, we have for your takes begun war with Philip, and you again without us have "concluded peace with him. It may be you will alledge, that whiles we were occupied in the "Punick war, ye were forced and compelled for fear to take fuch conditions of peace at his hands, who was the fironger: we likewise / preffed with greater affairs and troubles) forbare to profe-" cute and follow that war, which by you first was laid down & given over At this present, seeing "by the grace and goodness of the Gods the Punick war is come to an end, both we have em-"ploied and bent all our forces against Macedony, and ye also have good occasion and opportuni-"ty offered to reenter into amity and alliance with us, unless ye had rather perish with Philip, C" than vanquish with the Romans.

When the Roman Embassador had ended this Oration, the Ætolians generally were enclined and affected to the Romans; but Damocritus their Pretor (corrupted as the speech went with a inm of money received from King Philip, and made for him) gave affent neither to the one party nor the other, but faid, "That in counfels of great weight and importance, there was nothing "more hurtful and prejudicial, than hast for repentance (qd. he) follow it never so soon, when a "thing is once done, yet it cometh too late and booteth not: confidering, that rash counsels can "not be revoked, hasty and headlong courses cannot possibly be recalled, nor matters once past be "reduced again to their former state. As for the proper time of that resolution now in hand, " whereof my felf am of advice, that the due maturity & full ripeness should be expected, it might D" now at this present be set down and concluded upon. For seeing that by our laws & ordinances " provided it is that we may not treat of any affairs concerning peace or war, but in the general "connels called Panatolaik or Pylaik: therefore for the present I would have you to ordain and " decree, that your Pretor without fraud or covin might call and hold a Diet or court of Parlia-" ment, when locver he is minded to treat of war or peace; and what loever then and there shall be "proposed and determined, it may stand in as good force, strength, & vertue, as if it had passed in "ainli Panatolaik or Pylaik councel. Thus the Embassadors being dismissed and sent away in * Panatolium. "suspence and nothing decided and concluded, he said, That he had performed a singular peece of A general "fervice to his nation and countrey. For now they would fide and take part with those, whose councel, where "fortune it were to speed better in the field. Thus went matters in the affembly of the Ætolians. Ætolia were

Now Philip with all diligence prepared for war both by lea and land. His fea forces he affem-affembled. bledtogenher unto Demetrius a port in Thessalpsmaking account, that Attalus and the Romanneer would in the beginning of the next spring depart from Egina. Over his navy and all the sea coasts Diet holden at he appointed Heraclides Admiral, like as he had done as ore time. Himself levied and gathered his Thermopple, land-forces, supposing verily that he had debarred and berefe the Romans of two great means of where the aid, to wit, the Ætolians of the one fide, and the Dardanians of the other; in that the narrow States of Green streights and passage of Pelagonia, was stopped and made sure against them by his son Perfeus. The or Amphilly-Confine on the other fide made not preparations for war, but was on foot and in action already, first each one conducting his army through the confines of the Daffaretians, and transporting with him out of their deputy of his wintering harbor all the provision of grain, whereof the country yeelded him sufficient to the agent, called maintenance of his fouldiers. The great Towns and Villages were furrended unto him, partly for 1 ylagoras. love and partly for fear: some were forced by assault, others abandoned by the inhabitants, and were found defolat, by reason that the barbarous people were retired into the mountains near by, to lave themselves: and at Lingum near the river Bevus he encamped from whence he sent to purvey for corn out of the garners and barns of the Dassaretians. Philip saw well enough that the country all about was in an hurry, and the people in great fear and fright; but being uncertain to what place the Conful intended to march, he fent out a cornet of light horsemen as espials to discover what way the enemies took, and whither they pretended to go. The Conful likewise for his part was as doubtful: well he wish that Philip was dislodged from the places where he had wintered, but in what quarter he journied, he knew not: and therefore he also had set forth certain horse in espial to scour the coasts. These two bands or troops from diversand contrary parts, encountred in the end in one way, after they had a long time wandered at adventure through the countrey of the Daffaretians, Both parts knew well by the noise they heard a far off, as well of men as horse, that enemies approched; and therefore they had both horse & armour in readines, before they were in fight one of another for fo foon as ever they were within their enterview, they made no flay, but charged immediatly and joyned iffue. It fortuned, that for number and valour both, they were equally matched, as being choice and elect men of either side: whereupon they fought for certain hours alike, until such time as their own wearines and the faintness of their horses purted the battail in doubtful victory. Of the Macedonians there died 40 horsemen: and of the Ros mans, five and thirty. And for all this neither brought the Macedonians any better intelligence to their King, nor the Romans to their Con.vl, of the place where the enemies were incamped, Bur certain ingitive traitors gave advertisement thereof: who commonly in all wars, upon a running head and light humour that naturally they have, are given to hearken after news, and to enquire in what terms enemies fland. Ph.hp imagining that it would avail somewhat both to purcha'e the affectionat love of his fouldiers, and alio to induce them more cheerfully and readily to undertake all hazards for his fake in case he seemed to have a careful regard to bury those hosemen which were flain in the journey and expedition aforelaid; commanded their bodies to be brought into the camp, to the end that all men might fee what honour he did them in their funerals. But I fee how nothing is more uncertain, nor whereof a man may make less reckoning than the minds and affections of the multitude. That which was thought would have made them more willing and forward to enter into any danger and jeopardy whatloever, even that, wrought acontrary effect and caused them to be most fearful and backward. For they who were nied to fight with Greeks and Hlyrians; and to fee mens bodies wounded with push of pike galled with arrows and pierced with lance here and there in this or that partiafter they beheld once their fellows foburcherly mangled with the Spanish curtelaxes and arming swords, the arms cut away from the body, the heads either imitten clean off by the neck, or cloven down right, and lying on the shoulders; their panches ript with the bowels open and guts drawing after; with other deep wounds and broad flashes, most hideous and fearful to behold; then they saw all full well (fearful treatures v as they were) what manner of weapons, and what kind of men they were to deal against Navithe King him eli was terribly afraid, who had not as yet encountred with the Romans in any ittheld. Whereupon he fent for his fon to come back with the garrifon that he had in the streights of Pe-Ligonia, thereby to increase and strengthen his own forces: and so laid open the way into Macdemin for Pleur at us and the Dardanians. Himlelf in person with a power of 20000 foot, and 4000 horse, guided by the sugitives above said, marched toward the enemy, and about a quarter of a mile or somewhat less from the Roman camp, possessed himself of a little hill neer to Atherom. which he fortified with trench and campier. From whence, when he beheld the Romans encumped hard under him he wondered (by report) to see not only the whole body of the camp, with the form and order thereof in general, but also how every part was ranged and set out interent, both in the manner of quartering and pitching their pavilions, and also in the proportion of the wayes for breadth and length between, And having viewed and confidered every thing accordingly: "Believe me (qd, he) there is no man who feeth this, that can either think or lay, it is the camp of a barbarous nation. For two daies space the Conful and the King (expecting one anothers attempts and coverprises) kept their souldiers close within their holds. When the thirddaywas come the Roman General brought forth his whole power into the field. But the King feering to hazard all o foonupon a cast, drew forth 400 Triballians (which were, as we have said ellewhere, the Illyrian nation) and 200 Cretenfians, all footmen, accompanied with the like number of horsemen; and sent them under the conduct of Athenago as, one of his courtiers and gallants, for to brive the Cavairy of the enemies, and to challenge them to fight. The Romans, whole main battail was little above half a mile off, put out against them their light armed van-curriers, end as it were, two companies or corners of horiemen: to the end, that they might be equal with the enemy in number both of foot and horse. They of the Kings part supposed verily, that they should fight aftertheir o'd and accustomed manner: namely, that the horsemen should by turns one while ride forward in the face of the enemy, other while retire again; fometime follow in chair and have nie of their darts and weapons and sometimes turn and shew their back parts that the nimbleness and activity of the Illyrians would fland in good flead to make excursions and inddain skirmithes; also that the Cretensian archers should be emploied in shooting arrows aloof at the enemies, as they advanced and came forward, or flung our all abroad on everyfide: but the violent charge of the Romans, no less continual and obstinat, than sierce and eager, put N them quite out of this manner of lervice, and disordered all. For no otherwise than it it had been a set battail between two entire armies, their sootmen lightly armed, so soon as they had lanced and let go their javelins from them, took them to their swords, and came to hand fight: the ho: semen likewise, no sooner affronted the enemies, but either staying their horses they sought on horseback, or else alighted on foot, and among the footmen maintained the skirmish. By this mean, neither the Kings Cavalry could match the Romans, because they had not been used toa fleady battel; nor his footmen who were wont to traverse their ground, and skirmish, never tlanding fill, and withal in manner half naked for any harness they had, was able to make their ports good with the Roman light appointed footmen, who had their fwords and bucklers, and were turnished with armour, as well defensive as offensive. So they could not endure long to o maintain fight; but were forced to retire into their camp, and by nothing else faved themselves but by good footmanship and riding apace. These passed one day between, when the King minding to trie a conflict with all his forces of Cavalry, and footmen lightly appointed, had laid in await by nighteertaintargatiers, whom they call Peltefla, in a covenient place between both camps, and given direction and charge unto thenagoras and his men of arms, That if they fped well in open .battel and plain fight, they flould on fill and follow their good fortune : but if they went by the

A worle, and were too weak, they should give ground by little and little, and train the enemy to the place of ambush. Well, it fell out so, that the horiemen indeed retired accordingly, but the leaders of that cohort aforesaid of targatiers, not attending the fignal long enough, but raising their men out of ambush before time, lost the opportunity of playing their part & performing a goodservice. The Roman Conini having both obtained victory in open battel, and elcaped the danger of a covert train, rerired himself into his camp. The morrow after, he came down into the plain field with all his forces, and put them in battel array, having arranged his Elephants in the forefront of the vangard. And this was the first time that ever the Romans had use in their wars, or this healt; by occasion, that in the late Punick war, they had taken some of them alive from their enemies. But perceiving that Philip kept himfelf close within his camp, he approched under the very R rampier, yea, and reproched him for his cowardife. And feeing for all that, he could not even then be drawn to a battel : confidering alto, that if he kept there a standing camp long, so neer unto the enemy, his provision of corn should be exposed to dangers; for no looner should the purrevors and forragers be gone abroad into the countrey, and ipread over the fields, but the enemies light horsemen would be ready at their heels to setch them in, and cause them to come short home: therefore he removed his camp to a place almost eight miles off, called Octolophum, where he might make his provision with leis danger. Now when the Romans purveied for corn and victuals in the territory thereabout, and were come upon a time fomewhat neer and within danger of Philip at first the King let them alone, and kept his men within their camp, to the end, that they might be more bold and venturous, and withal, lets wary and circumspect: but espying C them once stragling asunder here and there out of order, he fet forward with all his Cavalry, and the auxiliaries of the Candiors, and marched fo falt, as the swittest of his sootmen by running might keep pace with the horiemen: thus having gotten between them and home, he pitched down his entigns bet wist the Roman camp and the forragers. Then divided he his forces in two companies, the one he lent forth to course and chase them, so dispersed as they were ; giving speculcharge and direction, not to leave any of them alive that they could reach: with the other he thied himlest behind, and befet all the waies, and stopped the passages by which the enemies were liketo retire and have recourse unto their camp. Soon were they killed or put to flight in every plue, and as yet not one escaped to the Roman camp, for to bring news of this discomfiture: for, as many as fled back chanced upon the guard that the King had fet : and more were flain by them D that belet the waies, than thole that were fent out to the pursuit and execution. At length some hapned to escape through the midth of the Kings corps de guard, and in great halt and fearful manner came into the camp with a troublesome noise and tumult, rather than any certain tidings. The Conful, after order given to the horsemen, that every man should succour and retue what way to ever he could, their distressed fellows in this extremity, himself led forth the legions out of the camp, and marching in a fourfquare battaillon advanced toward the enemies. The Horsemen being spred over the fields in divers places, some lost their right way, being deceived by other outcryes heard from a contrary part: otherlome met with their ene-mies, and at one inflant, the skirmish began in many and fundry places. The band that guarded about the King, tought most fiercely and cruelly: for both they were for their own number as E well of horse as soot a full army welneer; and also most of the Romans light upon them, becante they kept the very port and rodeway in the mids. In this regard also were the Macedonianithe, better and had the vantage, because the King himself was present in perion to encourage and exhort them: and withal the auxiliary Candiots wounded many of the Romans ere they were aware of them: for why, they were well prepared aforehand, ranged thick and close together, and to fought against them that rode scattering abroad one from another, and without ar-III. And verily, if they could have kept any mean and measure in their chase, they had mightily advanced themselves, not only in winning the honor of that day, but also, in the main point of the whole war. But purluing them beyond all reason, and without diffretion, upon a bloudthirtly defire that they had of massacre, they chanced, upon the Roman Squadrons which were sone before with the Tribuns and Colonels: into much as the Horiemen aforesaid, who before fled, when they once saw the ensigns of their own insantery, reined their horse heads, and turned again upon the enemy that can with bridle in horse neck: and so in the turning of an hand, the fortune of the battail changed and came about, and they that erewhile made pursute, now shewed their backs and fled amain. Many of them were flain that came to close handfight, many likewise of those that ran away. Neither tell they all upon the edge of the sword, for some there were who plunged into bogs and matishes, where both horse and man sunk in the deep mud and mire, and to were swallowed up and perished. The King himself also was in great danger: for his borfe being wounded under him and fallen, he also came headlong down to the ground, and hardly exaped but he had been troden under foot and mischieved as he lay along. One horseman Gabore the reft. faved his life, who hastily lept himself from horseback, and withal mounted the King (forcared as he was) upon his own horse: who being now on foot, and not able to run as fast as the horsemen that sled away, was with many a stab and thrust soon dispatched by the enemies that came running together to the King when he was seen to fall. And the King after he had ridden in fearing flight about the fenny meers, one while where there was some way, and otherwhiles where there was none at all to be seen, chanced at length to come to his camp, when most men were in despair that he could possibly escape in safety. In this skirmish there were 200

The one and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Macedonians stain, a hundred almost taken prisoners: fourscore brave and goodly coursers, with H rich caparitions and other furniture, together with the spoil of fair armours caried away.

There were that blamed the King for being too rash that day, and the Consul for his slackings For Philip, say they, should have kept him quiet in rest and repose, knowing, as he did, that the enemies within few dayes would have been brought to extream want and penury, now that the territory all about was clean spoiled and wasted. And the Consul for his part, when he had foiled the Cavalry and light armed fouldiers of the enemies, and as good as taken the King priloper, ought presently to have advanced against the Kings camp: for never would the enemies io discornfited have flood to it: and so in the minute of an hour, they had been vanquished for ever, This is foon faid, but (as most things else) not so foon done. For in case that the King had likewise brought forth into the field all his Infantery, peradventure in that tumult, when all his men were r discomfitted and driven to flie out of the field to their camp, yea, and to keep within the rampier. for fear of the enemy, ready upon his victory to get over the counterfearp and other fortifications, the King might have been differzed of his hold, and lost all. Again confidering, that the whole power of Philip his footmen remained fill intire within the camp, the corps de guard before the gates warding; the fentinels and watch fet in convenient places of the rampier attending : what other good should the Consul have done in advancing thither, but imitated the rash fool-hardiness of the King, who a little before so hotly followed the chase of the hors men discomfited? Neither was the Kings first designment to be reproved and found fault with, when he charged upon the foragers, scattered as they were over all the fields: if he could have feen when he was well, and have used his good hand in measure and moderation. Less marvail it is besides, that w he was willing to trye the fortune of a battail; because there ran a rumor, that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were departed from home, and with a puissant power entred already into Macedone. And if he thus were befet round about with thele armies, there was no doubt but the Romans might have vanquished and subdued him, and never stirred foot for the matter. Philip therefore supposing that upon these two late received foils of the horsemen, he should have but unquiet and dangerous fitting in the fame standing camp still: and minding to dislodge from thence, and in his remove to beguil the enemy and not be feen, dispatched a Pursevant at arms or herald unto the Conful a little before fun fetting, to crave furcease of arms, until he had buried his horsementhat were flain: and at the relief of the second watch he deceived the enemy; for leaving many fires through all his camp, he marched without any noise and departed. The Contul had newly sup-1 ped, and was going to rest, when he was advertised that a Pursevant was come, and what hiserrand was. And for the present, he made the messenger no other answer but this, that the next morning he would talk with him, and give him audience. But Philip by this means got the advantage of that whole night, and part of the next day, to gain riddance of way in his journey, which was the only thing he fought for. And toward the mountains he took his flight, for that way he wift well the Romans would not follow after, with an army fo heavy and charged as it was. The Conful by day break, granted the Pursevant a cessation of arms, and gave him his dispatch but it was not long after that he was advertised how the enemy was gone: and not knowing which way to follow after, he passed some sew dayes in foraging and purveying provision all about the place where he lay encamped.

After this he marched to Stubera, and gathered together all the grain that was to be had a bout Pellagonia. From thence he went forward as far as to Pluvina, and all this while knew not for certain into what quarter of the countrey the enemies were retired. Philip having first set him down and encamped before Bruana, and departed from thence by crois and crooked wayes, struck a suddain sear into the enemy, whereupon the Romans dislodged from Pluvina, and neer unto the River Ofphagus pitched their pavilions. The King likewise rested himself not sar from thence, and had cast a trench and raised a rampier along the banks of the River, which the inhabitants call Erigonus. And after he was for certain advertised, that the Romans intended to go to Erduan, he marched afore to seize upon the streights, and to empeach the enemies, that they should not gain the passage that lyeth as it were in a narrow gullet, barred and enclosed on N each fide. There he raised in one place a rampier, and cast a trench in another; made busicadoes here and there, partly by piling stones up on heaps in sead of a wall, partly by felling of trees across, according as either the ground would give leave, or the place afford matter: And thus stopping up all the wayes by fundry devices and means, he made the place (to his thinking) both unpassable and impregnable, which of itself by nature was hard enough and troublesome. The countrey all about was for the most part forrests, and full of wood, very incommodious, especially for that manner of battailons and ordnance of array, which the Macedonians call Phalanx: which serveth them in small or no stead at all, unless with their long pikes they may make a pallifade, or flay (as it were) and oppose them before their shields: which they cannot well do, un'els they have free scope and liberty of plain and open ground. The Thra-o cians also were fouly troubled and cumbred with their spears named Rhomphea, which were likewise of a mighty length, and by reason thereof (catching as they did, and snarling within the boughs and branches of Trees that grew in their way every where about) hindred them very much. There remained the Cohort or band of the Candiots, that feemed of some useful to be employed. And yet the same also as it was able to discharge arrows against both Horse and man, and to annoy them so long as they lay open and exposed to shot, if haply they offered to charge; to they were not of-firength sufficient to drive their shafts level, and to pierce thorough the Roman targets: for otherwise there was no part of the body offered it self unarmed and naked for to aim at. And therefore so soon as they perceived that kind of shot to serve them to little or no purpose, they caught up stones which Layali over the valley, and let them flie at the enemy. Which stones, as they light and beat upon their bucklers, kept a great clattering, and with the found they made (rather than with any hurt besides) kept the Romans for a time from mounting up the bank. But the Romans making no reckoning of these stones neither, partly by pavoises and target-fences over their heads, made way directly through the thickest of their enemies; and partly by wheeling a little and fet, hing fome compais about gained the pitch of the hill, and were got up to the very top: from whence they drave the Macedonians (all affrighted as they were) g down the hill, and chased them from their holds and guards: and by reason they had much ado to flie (the ground was so rough and uneven) most of them were killed and cut in pieces. Thus the difficulty of the ffreights was over ome, and they were possessed thereof, with far less trouble and conflict than they looked for and made account of. Then they marched on forward as far as to Erduer, where the Consul after he had put the fields all over to the wast, retired himself to Elimea, From thence he forced Orestides, and affailed the Town Celeurum, fituate as it were, in a demy fland : there is a lake that environeth the walls, and but one way by land that leadeth to the Town from the main, and the same very streight and narrow, in form of a gullet, At the first when the Town was furmmoned the inhabitants trutting to the natural strength of the place kept their gates that against the Conful, and refused his summons. But after they saw once the ensigns dis-Colayed and mar hing against them, when they perceived the enemies defended under a pavoise to approach close to the gate, and the narrow streight and avenue aforesaid, befet with a band of them; before they would encounter and fight, they yeelded themselves for very fear. From Celetrum he marched on towards the Daffaretians, and wan by affault the City Pelium. From thence he caried away the bondilaves, with the rest of the pillage; but all persons what soever free born he letgo at liberty without paying rantom. The Town he gave them again after he had planted in italirong germon: for it it ood well, and in a very good place, for to make rodes and incursions into Macedony. Thus the Conful having ranged over the countrey of the enemies, brought his army back through the peaceable parts into Aprilonia, where he began first to make war.

Now the Athamans, and Dardanians, and many other wars riting juddainly at nonce, some from one pia e and some from another, had diverted and turned Philip a contrary way, Against the Dard mians (as they returned out of Macedony) he sent Athenagoras with the footmen lighty armed and appointed, and the greater part also of the horse giving him in charge and direction to follow them hard at their heels as they departed, and to play upon their backs, and cut off the tail of their rereward : to teach them against another time, not to be so halfy to come abroad with an army again, Democritus the Pretor of the Ætolians (who in the Diet aforefaid held at Naupattum perswaded to take a longer time for to consult about this war) had in the next Councel or Parliament following, moved the Ætolians to enterinto arms; namely, upon the same that was spread abroad of the horsemens fight before Octolophus; and also upon the coming of the Dardanians, and Pleuratus with the Illyrians into Macedony: befides the arrival of the Roman fleet at Oreum, and the general voice and bruit that went, how Macedony should thortly be affailed also by fea, over & above to many nations that from all parts about were come already by land. These motives regained Democritus and the Ætolians to friend the Romans again. Who joyning unto them Aminander the King of the Athamans, went forth together for to beliege Cercinium. They within the Town had shut their gates, whether by constraint or willingly of themselves, it was not known for they had the Kings garrison within among them. How ever it was, within few dayes Cercinium was taken and burnt. As many as remained alive after that great defeat, as well band as free one with another, were with the rest of the pillage carried away. This fearful example caused all the people inhabiting about the marish of Babe, to abandon their cities, and to retire themselves for security into the mountains. The Ætolians for want of F tich prey and booty (which they could not find there) turned from them and marched toward Perrhabia. In that quarter they won by force the City Cyretia, and cruelly put it to the ranfack. The inhabitants of Malles furrendred of themselves without compulsion, and were received into protection as allies. Out of Perrhebaa Aminander was of advice and deficous to march against Gomphos, by reason that the countrey of Athamania bordered so neer upon that City, and it feemed early to be forced without much trouble. But the Ætolians fingers tickled and itched again to be doing with the rich and fertile fields of Theffalie, and thither went they to raise booties and feek pillage. Athamander followed still for company, albeit he liked well neither of these fashions of the Atolians thus outragiously to make rodes and to spoil every where; nor of their manner of encamping at adventure, in what places foever they chanced to come, without all G discretion, regard, and care of fortifying and guarding the army. Fearing therefore lest their inconsiderate rashnes and supine negligence, might be an occasion that he or his should come to a shrewd turn, and incur some damage, spyed his time; and seeing them to incamp in a plain neer to the City Phacadum, he took a little Hill little above half a mile off, where both he and his, might with the help of any small guard, lie in security. Now when as the Ætolians leemed in manner to have forgotten that they were in the enemies country, but that they drave lome booties: whiles they were some of them wandring and stragling, disbanded and half armed, others within their camp without any corps du guard, swilling and sleeping all night and day long, H and made no difference of the times, Philip came upon them before they tooked for him. Andir being once known by the report of some that fled out of the fields in great affright, that heapproched; then Damocritus and the rest of the Captains began to quake for fear, Now was it about noonetide of the day, at what time as most of them having taken their full lode of wine and viands, lay along fast afleep. Then they fell to awake and raise one another, and to give the alarm: anon they fent out every way to call in those that were spreading abroad in the fields. So much they were aftonied, that for half many of the horsemen went forth without their swords, and most of them forgat to put on their cuiraces. Thus being led out in post hast, and hardly in all foor and horsetogether) able to make up the number of fix hundred, they light upon the Kings Cavalry, for number, armour, and courage much better than themselves; And therefore at the fift ; push were discomfited: for before they were well entred into skirmish, they fled shameinly a. way toward their camp. Some of them came short thither, and were either slain or taken philo. ners, even as many as the Kings horsemen overtook, and gat between them and their other companies. Philip, when he faw his men approch neer unto their camp, commanded to found the retreat: for both horse and man was weary, not so much with fight as with their long journey and the exceeding speed that they made. Whereupon he gave commandment, that the Horsemen by troops, and the light armed Footmen by their companies and Squadrons should water their horses one after another, and go to their dinner and repast. Others he kept still in armour for a guard attending the Regiment of the tootmen, that came but flowly forward, by reason they were heavily armed at all pieces; who being come, they also were enjoyned to pitch down w their enfigns, and lay their weapons before them, and to take a short bait and hasty pittance, lending two or three at the most out of every band for to water the horses. All this while the horses men, together with the light armed fouldiers, flood well appointed and in readiness, if haply the enemy would have given any attempt. The Ætolians bestowed armed men all about the gates and the rampier, intending to guard and defend their firength and fortifications, for now by this time they also that were scattered over the fields, had retired themselves into the camp. And so long as they beheld the enemies to keep quiet, and not fir, and were themselves in a sure hold, they made their bravadoes, and were very lufty: but after that the entiens of the Macedonians began to advance forward, and march in order of battel well appointed, close unto their trends all at once they abandoned their guards and quarters, and ran out at the back part of their campy. and fled to the foresaid hill, where the Athamanians were encamped. Many of the Ætolians were likewise in this hasty slight killed or taken prisoners. Philip made no doubt, but that the Athamanians also might have been driven from their hold, if there had been day enough behind: but the day being ipent already first in the skirmish, and afterward in the ransacking of their camp, he fet him down upon the next plain, hard at the foot of the hill aforefaid, intending very early the next morning to assail the enemy. The Ætoliansscared as much now, as they were before when they quit their own camp, sed scattering away the night following. Here Aminander flood them in very good flead, by whose good guidance and direction, the Athamanian being skilful in the coasts of the country, conducted them into Atolia, over the high mountains, whereas the enemies followed after them in blind and unknown by-wayes. Some few of them M hapned in this confused and scattered flight to lose their way, and stumble upon the Macedonian horsemen, whom Philip by day light, had sent to cut off the tail of the enemies, so soon as he perceived the hill abandoned. About the very fame time, Athenagoras a Captain under the King, overtook the Dardanians as they returned into their country, and at the first put their recreated in difarray. But afterward the Dardanians turned head again, and embattelled themselves: so they fought on even hand, and nothing was won nor loft on any fide. The Dardanians began not to foon to advance forward and march on again, but the Kings power, with their horiemen and light armed fouldiers came upon them afresh, and put them to great trouble. For they had no such means of help, and were befides furcharged with heavy armour, and withal, the place gave great advantage to those of the Kings part. Very few were flain, more wounded, none at all taken pri- N foners: for the manner of the Dardanians, is not to break out of their ranks and arraies for a little, and upon small occasions; but as they fight close, so they retire together, and part not. Thus Philip having restrained these two nations, by two brave exploits, which wereas happily performed as bravely enterprised, recovered the losses again, by him received in the Roman war. There hapned befides, another occurrent, which diminished the number of his enemies the Ætolians, For Seepas, one of the chief noblemen of that nation, being fent from Alexandria by King Ptolomans, with a mighty mass of gold, caried away with him into Egytt fix thousand sootmen, and certain horiemen, waged for mony to serve. Neither had heleft behind him any of the flour and youth of Ætolia, if Damocritus had not chassised and rebuked them, and so by that means kept some of them at home; making remonstrances unto them, one while of the war that was toward, and another O while of the defolation which was like to enfue thereupon. But whether he did this upon a good zeal and care that he had of his countrey, or only to cross copas because he had not fed him well with rich rewards and fat prefents, it is not known. And thus much concerning theaffairs passed between Philip and the Romans for that summer.

The Roman fleet having in the beginning of the same summer committed to Seasson Conopra, together with the Lieutenant Au. Apassus passed beyond the point of the cape Maleana

A joined with King Attalus, neer Seyllaum in the territory of Hermione. Then the whole City and State of Athens, upon hope of present aid and succour, brake out and poured forth at once all the hatted and malice which they had conceived against Philip, and which a long time for very fear they had held in, and therefore kept themselves in good and reasonable terms with him. Now in this City there never want prompt and ready tongues to fiir up and provoke the common people to a commotion. And as in all free States generally such kind of men are entertained and born out by the favour of the multitude, so in Athens especially, where eloquence is in most requeit, and beareth greatest sway. Presently therefore an ASt was put up and proposed unto the common people, and by them granted and confirmed, That all the Statues and Images of King common potential and a superior of all his progenitors and predecedlors, as B wellmens women, should be defaced, pulled down, and destroicd. Item, That all the settival dies, the scriftces and scriftces, which had been instructed and ordained for the honor of him, should be profuned and unhallowed again. Item, That the very places, wherein ought had been erected, or inscriptions graven to his honour, should be held as detectable and accurred: and that from thence forward, it might not be lawful to fet up there any of those things that ought to fland, and be dedicated in a pure and clean place. Item, That the publick Priests of the City, in. all their prairies, and so often as they praired for the good estate of the people of Athens and their allies, for the prefervation of their armies and armadoes; should detest and curie by name King Philip, his children and realm, his forces both by land and sea, with all the race and name of the. Macedonian nation. Moreover, it ran on in the decree, That if any man from that time forward, Cwould prefer and propound any thing that might tend to the digrace and infamie of Philip, the whole people of Ashem should approve and allow the same whatsoeyer, and make an act thereof Contrary-wife, if any person say or do anything for honour, or to impeach and check his dishonour, who loever should happen to kill the said party, he should be deemed and reputed, that hehad killed him justly and lawfully. Finally, this branch was comprised within the decree, That all things ordained in times past against Pissfraus his line and progeny, should be observed and fland in force against Philip. Thus verily warred the Athenians against Philip With letters and words: wherein they are right valiant, and to say truth, good at nothing else. But Arealus and the Romans, having from Hermiona shaped cheir course for Pyreaum, arrived there. And after. they had fo journed some few daies in Athens, and were loden with a number of decrees, wheren in the Athenians reconnted the praises and commendations of their allies beyond all measure, like as they had before exceeded in shewing their malice against their enemies; they set sail from Pyassue has genore exceuted in intering their mainte against men trainings, they fent certain from years to have a likely for the retain the same and the milds of the inhabitants. Whether they would chule to yeeld the Town willingly, or takerable the hazard of a forcible affault. Who answered again, that the Kings gartion being possessed to the carries of the Roman Leurenant lets their forces on land, and with all preparation of engines and the Roman Leurenant lets their forces on land, and with all preparation of engines and artillery fit for an affault, approached the City divers waies. The Roman standards and their arms, not feen before in more parts, the resolute courage also of the souldiers, who so lustily and nimbly came neer to scale the walls, terrified and amased the Greeks, much more than any thing elle. Therefore immediatly they fled into the Caffle, and the enemies were LL. of the City. Now, after they had for two daies space held out in the sortress, presuming more upon the firength of the place than the force of their armour and weapons they and the garrison together, compounded upon the third day to quit the place, so they might be brought with a convoy to Deliam, a Town in Bastia, and every man to have one fingle finit of apparel. Then the Romans laving the bare Ciry unto King Attalass, ransacked it themselves, and took away with them all, hepillage and ornaments that beautified the same. And to the end, that the life should not lie wal and defart, Arralus, perswaded the Macedonians in manner all, and certain also of the Andria. ans, there to remain. Afterwards, they also who by composition were transported to Delium, weeby the fair promites of the King drawn away from thence: which they gave ear and credit mothe fooner, for the love of their native country the miss whereof they might hardly brook. from Andres they croffed to Cythnus. There they from certain daies in affaulting the City, to no. purpose and seeing the gains would hardly quit their pains, they departed from thence. Neer unto Prafie (which is a place of Artica within the main) there joined unto the Roman fleet twenty pinnalles of the Islams, who were fent to rob and spoil the territory of the Carystians: the rest of the section ined at Gerestum, a noble rode and port of Eubera, until such time as the list were returned from Carefium. Then all together they made fail, and passing the mids of the main sea, they fell with the Isle of Icus, neer unto Seyrus. There they were flated for certain dates, by reason of the riging Northwind which being once laid and the fea calm again, they paffed to Seyathes a City lately pilled and ranfacked by K. Philip. The fouldiers ranged over the country, and brought om with them to their ships, & what loever else was fit for mans food. Other boory neither was there any, nor deserved had the Greeks to be spoiled at their hands. Thence they bent their course for Clandres & first they tode at anchor neer unto Mendie, a village situat by the sea side, and belonging to that state. From whence having failed beyond the cape, & defirous to come about with their veffels for to approach the very walls of the City, there arole a temper & fuddain guff; wherin they had like to have been cast away: but scattered they were as under & having for the most part of the tackling of their ships, they escaped with much ado to land. This tempest at sea, was also a fore-token prefaging unto them, that they were to follow the war by Land, and to give over fea H a note-token promping had brought all their shipstogether and ser their men a shore, they assiled the Town: but they had the repulse with many a bloudy blow belides (for there was within, a firong garrison of the Kings) whereupon they gave over their enterprise returned back and failed over to Canastanm a City of Pasane, And having doubled the point of Torona, they set their course for Acanthus. Thereat first theyfor raged the territory , then forted the Town, and ransacked in And for that their ships had their full traught and charge of pillage, they failed no farther forward. but returned from wheneethey came to Segathus, and from thente to Enhaat where leaving he hind them their main navy, they put in with ten ships lightly appointed, to the Bay or guliof Malea, for to parley with the Etolians about the whole course and managing of the wars. The chief of this emballage lent from the State, was one Stpyrrhicas an Actolian, who came to Hera 1 eles forto treat and confer about these affairs together with the King and the Roman Lieutenant They demanded of Attalus by vertue of the accord and agreement before made, to furnish them with a thousand souldiers : for so many ought he by right to set out and maintain, when loster they were to wage war against Philip. But this demand was denied to the Atolians i in regard that aforetime they likewife thought much to make a rode to spoil Macedony, at what time as Philip kept foul work about Pergamus, burning all edifices before him, as well facred as prophane. when they might have drawn him perforce from thence into his own realm to look unto his proper affairs there. Thus the Ætolians were dismiffed with more hope than help: for the Romans ied them only with fair words, and large promifes of all things. Then Apuftius with King dina. Ins returned to the fleet.

After this they laid their heads together, and began to confult about the fiege and affault of Oreum. A firong City this was both in regard of the walls, and also of a good garrison, by realen that heretofore it had been once affailed. Now there were 20 fail of Rhodian fhips allclok covered with hatches and decks, which under the conduct of Captain Agesimbrotus, had joyned with the fleet of Attalus and the Romans, after the winning and conquest of Andres. Their ships they sent to lie in the Bay of Zelasum, (a promontory or cape above the City Denuria, Jung very conveniently over against Ishmia) for this intent, that if the Macelonian Thips should come abroad from thence, they might be ready in gard to make fail agailift them. Herselid an Admiral for King Philip, lay there at rode with the navy, attending rather some enterprise by opportunity and vantage of the enemies negligence, than by plain and open force. The Romans and L Attalus in the mean time planted their ordnance against Oreum at divers parts. The Romans at the Castle fide that standeth upon the Sea: The King from the vale that lieth between two lons, where as the City is enclosed also with a wall. And as they affailed in fundry places; so their manner of affailing was much different, and their engins divers. The Romans affayed to approach the wall with tertoifes, pavoifes and mantilets, and to shake it with the Ram: They of the Kings part used Crossbows, Balifts, Catapults, and all manner of enfigns to floor forth quares and darts, yea, and to level and weigh mighty stones of exceeding great weight. They undermined alfo: and in fum, they practifed all means which they faw by experience did good during the former assault and siege. But the Macedonians were not only more in number than the time before to defend the City, but also of better courage and resolution; by reason that the King had rebuked them sharply for their fault passed: and they remembred well both his menaces, and also his promiles for the time to come: in so much as the affailants had small hope to win the Townin haft, Mean while the Roman Lieutenant, supposing that some other exploit might be performed, leaving a sufficient number (as he thought) for the finishing of the Fabricks begun, and other engins of affault, put over to the next places of the continent: where he surprised on a suddin Larifa (not that noble and renowned City in Theffaly, but another, which they call Cremefit) and won it, all but the fottress. Attalus in like fort took Egeleon, fearing nothing less than such an accident from them that were busie in besieging another Town. By this time, as the engins and other Fabricks without Oreum were at the point of finishing, and ready to perform the battery for which they were made: so the garrison within was overtoiled with continual pain and travail, fpent with watching night and day, and faint with many a grievous would. Moreover, part of the wall, shaken underneath with a butt and push of the Ram, was already sallen down in fundry places, in fo much as the Romans entred by night at the open breaches, and all the way above the Key, and so were possessed of the Castle. Attalast likewise by the break of day, after he saw the banner reared upon the fortress, and the fignal which the Romans put forth, entred the City; for now the walls in many places lay along, The garrifon and the Townsmen fled to a fecond citadel that they had, from whence after two dayes they yeelded. The City wastile Kings lot: the bodies of the prisoners were the Romans share. Now drew the sun neerunto the Equinoctial line in Autumn, at what time the Eubocan gull called Calls is dangerous, and not well trusted of mariners. Therefore being desirous to be gone into a place of sate retreat, before the troublesome winter weather overtook them, they turned their course and made head to Pyracum, from whence they came: where Ap stins leaving behind him thirty ships, ftt a compais about the cape of Malea, and failed to Coreyra. But the King flayed fill fo long as the fellival dayes of Ceres continued, because he would be present at the celebration of those solemnites, After the feast ended, himself likewise retired into Afa: but fift he fent Agesimbrans and the Rhodians home again. These were the affairs and exploits performed this summer by sea and and Theorite Conful. Against being come into his Province when the war was brought to an end, conful not mother and conceale his anger conceived against the Prator for fighting in his abience, When he had taken order therefore to fend him into Etruria, himfelf with the legions invaded the country of the enemies : where by way of robbing and spoiling he warred so as he gor more prey than praise, But L. Furius, seeing there was little to do in Etruria, and withall defitous rather than his life of a triumph over the Gauls (which he supposed to obtain with more case, whiles the Consul was ablent, who was both angry with him, and also envied at him arrived at Rome before any man looked for him, and affembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellong, Where, B after he had declared what acts he had archieved, he requested that he might be permitted to ride into the City with triumph. In great credit and account he was with many of the Senators, both for his noble and worthy deeds, in which regard they honoured him : and also for a speciall favoilt and love, in which respect they affected him. But the more ancient and elder Senators deniedhim triumph as well for that he had warred with the army of another, as also because he had abandoned his own Province, and government, upon a greedy defire to catch a triumph, by waiting his opportunity, and taking advantage: a thing nor warrantable by any former precedent or example And as many of them as had been Confuls laid moreover, That above all things he ought to attend upon the Conful his return, "For well might he (lay they) being encamped near unto "the City, have delended and guarded the Colony only, and fo have drawn the time out untill Cuhiscoming, and never needed to have fought a let battell for the matter. And although the Pro-"tor have omitted to to do, yet ought not the Senat to follow his example, but expect the Con-"ful. When as therefore they have heard the Conful and Prator discoursing and arguing the "matter both together face to face, then they should be able to judge better and more soundly "of the cause. A great part of the house was of opinion that they ought to look unto nothing else but the good fervice done, and whether he were lawfully called thereunto, as a Magistrate of himself, to manage his affairs by his proper conduct and the guidance of his own fortune. "For. "of the two Colonies (fay they) which were opposed as two forts and bulwarks to reffrain the "fudden impressions and tumults of the French; when the one was sacked and burnt, and the "fame fire like to leap from it to the other so near, (as from house to house, that joyn together) D " what could the Prator have done otherwise in that case? For if there might be nothing attempe "ted without the Conful, it must needs follow that either the Senat did amiss ingiving the Pra-"torthe charge of an army (for if their will was that the war should be managed not by the Pra-"torsaimy, but by the Confuls, they might have limited it in the Commission by especial words. "especily forbidding the fervice to be done by the Trator, but only by the Conful) or elle the "Conful hath committed a fault, who having commanded the army to go out of Tuscan into "Frince, came not himself in person to Ariminum to encounter the enemy, and be present in that war, which without him might not be lawfully fought. Over and befides, the occasions and leaons of war attend no staies, and tarry for no politick delaies of Generals, And otherwhiles, fight ' amanmust, not because a man is willing thereto, but because his enemy puts him to it. To con-"clude, the very battell it felf, and the happy issue thereof, ought only to be considered and regarded. The enemies are defeated and slain; their Camp taken and ransacked; the siege raised "from the one Colony, and it preserved; the captives of the other recovered armrestored to "their friends; and to be brief, in one battell the quarrell is decided, and the war finished, And not only men have rejoyced for this victory, but also there have been processions for three daies "space to the honour of the immortall gods: [For that L. Furius hath managed the Common-"meal well and happily and not ill and roshly.] Finally, these Erench wars fall by a fatall destiny to the "house and race of the Furii. By these and such like remonstrances alledged by himself and his friends, the majesty of the Conful absent was over-weighed with the favour born to the Prætor present. And so in a frequent assembly of Senators a decree was granted, That L. Farius should ide intriumph. Thus triumphed over the Gauls L. Furing Prator, whiles he was in office. He brought into the common treasury 320000 Asses, 170000 pound weight of silver. But neither were there any priloners led captives in thew, nor spoils carried in pomp before his charior, nor yet his foundiers followed after. So as it appeared that all other things besides victory alone, pertainedproperly to the Conful.

After this were the plaies exhibited with great magnificence by P. Cornelius Scipio, which he had towed in Africk, during his Confulfhip. Also there passed an order for the lands of his soldiers; That for so long as each one had served in Spain or Africk, he should have two acres for every year: and that these lands should be set out and assigned unto them by ten December for the purpose deputed. Then were certain Triumvirs created for to supply and make 6 up the number of the Roman Inhabitants in Vennsia, by reason that during the time of Anniah war, the strength of that Colony was much enleebled and impaired. C. Terentius Varro, T. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cneus, enrolled new Coloners to inhabit

The lame year C. Cornelius Cethogus, who governed Spain as Pro-Conful, discomfitted a great host of the enemies in the country of the Sedetans. In which battell, by report, were slain 15000 Spaniards, and 78 military ensigns taken. C. Aurelius the Consul, when he was returned out of his Province to Rome against the solemn election of Magistrates, complained, not as men H made reckoning he would have done, That the Senat expected not for his coming, nor that the Conful was not permitted to debate the matter with the Prætor) but found himself grieved 66 That the Senat had decreed a triumph fo, as the party only was suffered to speak who was to the "umph, and none of them might be heard who were present at the battell, And whereas our fore-"fathers ordained, that Lieutenants, Colonels, Marshals, and Centurions, yea, and in one word. "the fouldiers should be at a triumph; for this end and purpose, that the truth might appearto "the world, of al things archieved by him unto whom lo great honolir was to be done: Was there es any one (quoth he) of all that army which fought with the Gauls, I fay not a fouldier, but fo much as a lackey or horse boy following the Camp, of whom the Senat might enquire, when "ther the Prator tpake true orfale? This done and faid he published the day of affembly forther election abovesaid wherein were created Confuls L. Cornsina Lensulus, and P. Villus Tapplus. After them were Practors choien L. Quintius Flaminius, L. Valerius Flaceus, L. Villius Tapplus, and G. Bebius Pamphilus. Grain and other victuals that year were cheap. Great flore of con was *1 d.ob, fterl, brought out of Affrick, which the Ædiles of the chair diffributed to the people, at *two Affrica Modius. They also set forth the Roman games and patimes right sumptnously; yea, and reprefented them one day more than ordinary. Moreover of the filver railed by fines and forfeitures, they made leven brazen statues, which they fet up in the treasure-house of the City. The Plebeian plaies likewise were thrice requed all over by the Ædiles of the Commons L. Terentius Massall ota, and C. Bebius Pamphilus Prætor elect. Finally, the funerall games that year were four daies together exhibited in the common place of the City, occasioned by the death of M.Valerius Lavi-K nus: and celebrated they were by his two fons P. and M. who also shewed unto the people 2 brave spectacle of sencers at the sharp: wherein there were five and twenty couples that entred the lifts and performed combat. M. Aurelius Corta, one of the Decemvirs, that year departed this life; and in his place M. Acilius Glabrio was subordained. In the solemn affembly for electing fdiles of the chair, it chanced that those two which were chosen might not immediately enter into office: for C. Cornelius Cethegus was created in his ablence, whiles he governed the Province of Spain, And C. Valerius Flaccus who was present at his ownelection, might not be sworn to maintain the laws, because he was the Flamin or Priest of Jupiter. For lawfull it was not for any Magifrate to exercise his place above five daies, unless he were tworn to the laws. Then Flacen prefetred a petition that he might be dispensed with : whereupon the Senat ordained, That if the E. r. dile would find one to swear in his name at the good pleasure and discretion of the Consuls, then the Confuls (if they thought it meet) should deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, to propound it unto the people that it might pass under their grant. So L. Valerius Flaceus (the Pieror elect for the year following) was presented to take the oath for his brother. Then the Tribunes put it to a canvale before the people, and they enacted, That the oath of his brother should be of the same validity as if the Ædile himself had taken it in his own person. Concerning the other Ediles also there passed an act of the Commons. For when the tribunes proposed unto the prople, Which two they would have to go into Spain as LL, deputies with command over the armies; the people ordained, that C. Cornelius the Ædile of the chair might come home to bear his office, and L. Manlins also after so many years, depart out of his Province: the people ordained

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the two and thirtieth Book.

Many strange and prodigious sights (as they were reported from divers countries) are here related and set down: among which, this is one, that in Macedony there was a bay tree sprung up of it self in the poop of a galley. T. Quintius Flaminius the Consul sought fortunately against Philip in the freights of Epirus: and having put him to slight, he compelled him to return into his own kingdan. Himfelf, with the elfiftance of the Ætolians and Athamans, infested for each plagued Thesialy, which bordereth upon Macedony. L. Quintius Flamininus the Conful his brother, by the aid of King Ma-O lus and the Rhodians, made conquest by war at sea, of Eubeca and all the sea-coast. The Achainere received into amity. The conspiracy of slaves, that complotted to deliver and set at large the hostages of the Carthaginians, was detected and took no effect. The number of Prators was encreased to fix. The Conful Cornelius Cethegus defeated the French Insubrians in battell. League and amity was concluded between the Romans and the Lacedamonians, with their tyrant Nabis. Over and besides, there is contaiged in this book the winning of many Cities in Macedony.

Hen the Conful and Practors were entred into office upon the * Ides of March, they * 15 of March cast lots for the government of the Provinces. To L. Lentulus, fell Italy; and to P. Villius, Macedony. As for the Prators, L. Quintius had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome, and C. Babius the government of Ariminum; L. Valerius ruled Sicily, and L. Villius his lot was to command Sardinia. Lentulus the Conful had order given him to levy new legions and Villius to receive the army of P. Sulpirius, with commission and licence to take up as ma-Bny fouldiers as he thought good himself to furnish the same with a fresh supply. Those legions which C. Aurelius Conful had in charge, were affigned over to Babius the Prator, with condition to keep them with him, untill the Conful were arrived in France with a new army; and fo foon as he came, to discharge and dismisse all the souldiers home to their houses except 5000 allies: forasmuch as this number was thought sufficient to govern the Province about Arimi-

The Prætors of the former year continued fill Commanders of their armies. Cn. Sirgins was enjoyned to see and take order, that certain lands should be set out for those souldiers who had ferved many years together in Spain, Italy, and Sardinia. And Q. Minuins had in charge togo through with that inquificion of certain conspirators and traitors in the Brutians country, upon C which he had fitten already as Prætor with great fidelity and diligence: and also to send unto Locrifor to receive due punishment of those prisoners, whom being attainted and convicted of sacriledge, he had lent bound to Rome. And finally, to cause all the treasure taken out of the Temple of Profirpina, to be restored thither again, with an over-encrease, to make satisfaction and to raze out the wicked part committed. The Latine feafts and holy-dates were folemnized again by venue of an ordinance of the Bishops, upon this occasion, That certain Embassadors from Ardia complained in the Senat, how they had not their ordinary allowance of flesh at the Latine feasts ascretaid in the mount Alba, according to the old custome. News came from Suessa, that two of their City gates, and all the wall between, was finitten with lightning, Messengers also from Formia reported that their Temple of Jupiter was likewise blasted, Moreover, they of Offia brought D word of the like michance with them in the Church of Jupiter. And from Velture tidings came of the like mishap, fallen upon the Temples of Apolto and Sangus. And that in the Temple of Hercules there forung up a bush of hair. Letters came also from Q. Minutius the Pro-Prator out of the Brutians country, that there was a colt foled with five feet, and three chickens harched with three feet apeece. After all this, P. Sulpitius the Pro-Prator fent letters from out of Macedony, containing among other matters this news, that there was a Laurell tree grew of it self in the poop

The Senat in regard of all the former prodigious fights, ordained, that the Conful should satrificegreater bealts unto what gods hethought good: but about this last rehearsed, the Soothfaiers that pry into beafts inwards, were fent into the Senat-house; and by direction of their answer, an Edict went forth, That the people should go in procession, and make supplications one day, and in all Temples and Altars of the gods there were facrifices celebrated with great de-

The Corthoginians this year came to Rome with the first payment of the tribute imposed upon them: and for almitch as the treasurers and receivers of the City made report, that the filver was not good and lawful, and being brought to thetrial, was found too light by one fourth part washed away these Carthaginians were constrained to take up money of the bankers of Rome, and to make good the defect and loss of the filver abovefuld. They put up a petition besides unto the Senar that it might stand with their good pleasure to re-deliver now their hostages. Whereupon anhundred of them were rendred back, and good hope there was of the relt, if to be they contimed loyall and fast in their alleageance. And when they made a farther request in behalf of those hoffages which were not delivered that they might be transported from Norbas where they were not to their good liking and ease) to some other place, granted it was, that they might remove to Signia and Ferentinsini, In like fort, the Gaditansmade humble fuit, and obtained this liberty, that there should not be sent from the Romans acaptain to govern Gades, any thing to the contray in their covenant (concluded with L. Martins Septimius, when they yielded themselves undethe inbjection of the Romans) not with flanding. Moreover, for almuch as the Emballadors of Namia made complaint, that they had not their full number of inhabitants, and that there were (crainstrangers enterming ed among them, not of their own nation, who barothemselves as Coforers: therefore L. Cornelius the Conful was commanded to create three Deputies or Commif-Ghorers, called Triumvits for to reform this dijorder. And cholen there were for this purpole, Publine and Seffins Lelins, who had both of them the furname of Perus, and C. Cornelius Lenzulus, This that was granted to them of Narnia, was denied to the Embassadors of Cossa, who likewise regnested that the number of their inhabitants might be encreased.

The affairs thus finished at Rame that there were to be done the Consuls went into their several Provinces. Printing of one as he was arrived in Macedon, was welcomed at his first coming with a dangerous mutiny of the fouldiers, which long afore being kindled, was not well quenched at the first beginning. These were those two thousand, which after the defeat of Annibal, were H fent out of Affrick into Sicily; and from thence, a year after almost, transported into Macedany for voluntary fouldiers: but they themselves stood stoutly to it, that it was no voluntary at of theirs, but that they were shipped by their Colonels and Tibunes full against their wills. And howfoever it was, whether they ferved willingly or unwillingly, it was but meet and good reason, that the time of their fouldiery should run out, and their service have an end at length. Alledging, that for these many years they had not seen Icaly; that they waxed old men under their hameis, having born arms in Sicily in Affrick; and in Macedony; that with toil and travel fo tedious, ther were weak and feeble; and after fo many wounds and hurrs received, they had no more bloud to lofe, The Conful made them answer that their caute was good and reasonable, but marred in the handling; and meet hethought it, that they should be dismissed, if they could have requested it I in modest terms : but neither it, nor any cause else whatsoever was warrantable to make a mutiny and sedition. Therefore, if they could be content to keep to their colours, and be at command as loyallouldiers, he would in their behalf write his letters unto the Senat, as touching their conge and dismission: for be they well assured, that they shallget more by sober and gentle behaviour. than by any such stubborn, froward, and wilfull demeanor.

At the same time Philip affailed the City of Thaumaci with terraces & mantelets in all forcible manner, to that he was now at the point to batter & shake the wall with the ram. But the sudden arrival of the Etolian enfor ed him to furcease his enterprise; who by the condust of Archide mus having pasted the ough the midst of the Macedonian guards, & entred the town, never cased day nor night to make lakies forth, one while upon their flanding watch, otherwhiles upon their & fabricks & engins. The natural fituation of the place yielded them good help and vantage: for the town of Thaum ici is leated on high to amons thinking as he goeth from Pyla & the gulph of Mie lea by the way of Lamis & sheweth it self aloft, seeming to o erlook & command the streight pasfage of the torrests called Cale. Again, when one travelleth over the craggy places, and the crooked waies entangled with to many windings in the vallies of Theff.ly, and is approached once nearto the City, all on a sudden he may discover before him a mighty large and open phin, as it were a wide and vast sea, so as aman shall have much ado to reach with his eye to tar as these downs lve out every way under him, and see all over them. And hereupon by reason of this stange and marvellous prospect, the City is called * Thannacis Over and besides that the high grounds affordeth withall, that the town it felf when it was won would not quit the painful labour, and pay for the danger about it. Besides, the winter was now at hand, when he departed from thence, and retired his forces into Macedom, there to harbor. Where, when all others, during the time that they could catch any repose and reft, refreshed their spirits and bodies with some recreations and dispons; Philip only, how much respit soever he had, either of intermission or remission from continual labour of marching in journey, and fighting in battell; so much more trouble he had in his mind whiles he confled and discoursed with himself, what the total and finall issue might be of this war: whiles he flood not only in fear of the enemies, which perfectited him by fea and land, but also in doubt, as well of the hearts of his allies, as of the affections of his own inbjects: left the one in horem of the Romans friendship should revolt, and the other (even the Macedonians themselves) det re novelties, and long for a change. Therefore he address d his Embassadors into Achaa, bothto exact an oath of the Achaens for their alleageance (for they had apitulated in the accordand agreement made, yearly to swear fealty unto Philip) and al oto deliver into their hands, Orchomenus, Herea, and Triphylia. And when they demanded also Aliphera, the Embaffadors answered, that the City never pertained to Triphylia, but that of right it ought to be restored unto Philip: as being one of them which in the generall councill and affembly of the Arcadians, were affigued and fet out for the building of Megalopolis, And thus verily he entertained firm alliance withthe Achains. As for the Macedonians hegained their hearts unto him, by occasion of Heraelides for feeing that by means of him he incurred their exceeding ill will and hard conceit, and that hewas N charged with many grievous crimes, he cast him in priton to gratiste his ownsubjects; whereat the people took great joy and hearts content. Then made he preparation for war, with an earnellendeavor, as at any time before: he exercised as well the Macedonians as mercenary fouldiers in pay, namely, to wear their armor, and handle their weapons; & in the very prime of spring, he sent all his forrain aids and light armed touldiers, under the leading of Athenagoras into (haonia by the way of Epirus, to leize upon the firaight paffage near to Antigonia, which the Greeks call Stena. Himself a few daies after followed with his main army more heavily appointed. And when hehad well viewed & confidered the fituation of the country, and how it lay, he judged that the quarter coasting upon the river Aom was the meetest place to fortifie and encamp in. This river between two hills the one by the peafants of the country called Fropus the other Afnaus, runneth within O a narrow vale, and yieldeth but a small passage upon the bank side. He commanded Athenage-Tas to gain and fortifie Afnaus with his light armed fouldiers : himself encamped upon Eropus, And look what way as the hill was fenced with broken and cragged rocks, there he kept a small guard of tome few fouldiers: but whereas there was more danger, and easier accels for the enemy he fortified with trenches rampiers and bulwarks. He planted also and disposed in conve-

A abof. The royal pavillion of the King himself was pitche before the tampier upon a bank in a more compressible of open light for to terrific the enemy, and also to encourage and hearten his own men, when they thould see him so confident and resolute. The Contul advertized by Charopus the Epirot, what pattages the King with his army was possessed of, after he had passed the winter in Corepta, himself nkewise in the beginning of spring, went up into the main land, and held on his mirch toward the enemy, And being advanced almost within five miles of the Kings camp, he left his legions in a strong fenced place, and went himself in person forward with certain lighting appointed in espialito discover the quarters, and the morrow after held a consultation, Whether he might do better to affay to pals through the place which the enemy kept (not withflanding he law evidently before his eyes great trouble and hazard in that adventure) or to bring his B afrily about and letch a comp is the same way, whereas the year before Sulpitim entred into Maredbig. This deliberation held him for certain daies in even balance and suspence, untill news come unto him that T. Quinting was created Conful; and having the Province of Macedony allotted unto him made halic thither and was already paffed to Coregra.

Valerius Anisas writeth how Villius was entred the pais aforefaid & because he could not take the straight and direct way (by reason that the King and his forces had beset all plates) followed the valley along through the middle whereof the river * Aous runneth: and having made a bridge the sanguards and passed have passed over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there tought over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there to the bank of the bank athattell: Wherein the King was dif omfitted and put to flight, and driven out of his camp; that Prose Ni f:000 enemies were flain in that conflict, 2200 taken priloners, 132 enigns won and carried a- vavifaction C way belides 2; 6 horle. But all other writers both Greek and Latine, at least wife whole Andals I have read, report that Vidius performed no memorable act, and that the Conful

T. Quintus who next increeded took in hand the whole and entire war himfelf, Whiles things thus palled in Macedony, the other Conful L. Lemulus who thaid behind at Rome. held a general affembly for the election of Centors: And among many famous and noble perfonighs who field for that dignity, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and P. Elius Parus Were created Ceniors, These two ag eeing together in great concord, both elected a Senat without defaming any per on; and also firmed out the toll for portage of all things that were sold at Copua: hem, they let & to farm let the custome for passage that way whereas the camp stood, and where now D there is a town built; and enrolled three hundred Colones (for thet number was limited by the Senar) there to inhabit. They fold also the lands of Capuallying under the hill Tifara.

Ations the same time L.M. unbus Acidinus departed out of Spain, and was prohibited by M. Pacini Licea a Tribune of the Commons, to enter at his return into the City with the folemn pomp of an Ovation, not with Handing he had that honour granted by the Senat. So he came into Ame as a private perion and brought into the Chamber of the City 1200 pound weight of filver. and thirty pound weight well-near of gold. The same year Cn. Babius Tamphilas, who had receited the Provin e of France from C. Aurelius the Conful of the former year, engaged himfelf rathly wishin the marches of the French Insubrians, and was environed and enclosed round about both he and in manner his whole army. He lost above 6600 men. See what an overthrow was Eteletied in a war, whereof there was no reckoning made, and from when e no danger was feared any more. This caused L. Lentalus the Conful to come out of the City of Rome, who being arrived into a Province full of trouble and tumult after he had received the charge of afrighted and disasted army, gave the Prattor a great check and rebuke, & took him up roundly with reproachfull terms, yea, and commanded him to get him gone out of the Province, and to repair to Rome. Neither performed the Conful himself any exploit worthy of remembrance by reason that he was called home to Rome for to hold the folemn election of Magistrates: which also was staid by M. Fulvius, and M. Curius Tribunes of the Commons: who likewife would not inffer T. Quintiat Flimmwing, having been but Quaffor, for to fland for a Confoliship. "Now adaies, fay they, "the dignities of Ediles and Prators are nought let by and not worth the feeking for and thefe to noblemen will needs mount into the Confuls place, not by fleps and degrees of other offices, "wherein they should make proof and give good testimony what their carriage is, but leaping oerer those in the midft, joyned the lowest and highest together. This debate which began in Mars field in the affembly of the people, came at length to be decided before the Senat. And the If ordained, That for simuch as he which fued for that dignity was by law capable thereof it was tsafon hat the people should have plenary and absolute power to create him, or whomsoever elicthey peased, so the Tribunes submitted themselves under the authority of the Senator , And for Coll, were elected Sex Alius Pains, and T Quintins Fl mininus. Then enfued the election of the Prints. It which were created L. Cornelius Mernla, M. Claudius Marcellus M. Porcius Cato. and C Helwins who had been Ediles of the Commons. By whom the Plebei in plaies were re-Crised; and a folemin feast made in the honour of Jupiter in regard of those plaies. The Curu e Adles likewife C. Palerius Flaccus, who allo was the Flamine Dialis or Priest of Jupiter, and C. Cormilus Cethreus, exhibited the Roman games with great magnificence. The great Pontifices or Thops Servine Sulpitius, and L. Galba died that year : In whose places were entalled M. Emyhas he p dus and Co. Cornelius Scipio. Now when Sex, Alius Perus and Titus Quintius Flamininus of Coll, were entired into their Magillracy, they affembled the Senat in the Capitoll: where the five order, that concerning the two Provinces of Macedony and Italy, the Confuls should either agree between themselves, or else cast lots whether of them should govern the one or the H other: And that he, whose hap was to have the charge of Macedony, should enroll of Romans three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: Also of Latine allies five thousand foot and five hundred horse, for to supply and furnish out the legions. And for the other Consulir was decreed, that he should have an army all entire and new. L. Lentulus the Consul of the former year, continued fill Governour in the Province with express commandment, that neither himself should leave the government, nor withdraw his forces from thence, before the Conful were come with the new legions. So the Confuls referred themselves to the direction of the lots. To Elius teil Italy: and Macedony to Quinting, As for the Prators, who all were guided by lots, L. Cornelius Meral, had the juridiction of the City of Rome, M. Claudius governed Sicily. To M. Porsine was allotted Sardinia, and C. Helvins his lot was to be L. Deputy in Ganl. After this they I began to take musters. For over and besides the Consular armies, the Prators also were charged to levy fouldiers. To Marcellus were affigned four thousand footmen of Latine allies, and three hundred horiemen to go into Sicily. And for Cato three thousand toot of the same kind of fouldiers with two hundred horse to serve in Sardinia: upon condition, that when both these Prators were come into their Provinces, they should discharge all the old souldiers there as well fooimen

Then the Confuls granted the Embashadors of King Attalus leave to come into the Sena. house: where having audience given them, "after they had declared how their King and Mafter "had affilted the State of Rome with his forces as well by fea as land, and shewed himself chear-"foll, ready, and obedient to this present day for to execute and perform whatsoever the Roman K "Confuls had enjoyined him to do; they faid now, that they much feared left from henceforward " he would not be able to do the same by reason he was impeached by Amiochus. For Amiochus " taking his vantage, and finding the realm of Attalus disfurnished of garrisons, and unprovided of forces both by fea and land had invaded the fame. For which occasion Attalas belought the e. LL, of the Senat there affembled, that it they minded to use his navy, and employ the means " that he could make in the fer ite of the Macedonian war, they would then fend him a fuffici-"ent garrilon to delend his kingdom: but it they thought not well thereof, his request was to er permit himself to return with his fleet and other forces, to the defence of his own. The Sense gave order to return this aniwer unto the Embaffadors: " Whereas King Analus had succoured the Roman Captains with his Armedo and other means of war, the Senat accepted thereof inl " the best part. But as touching A. tiethus the King, anally and friend of the people of Rome, they " neither would fend any aid against him : nor yet detain the aids of King Attalus in any service es of theirs, longer than the King himself should think it stood with his own commodity. For the manner of the people of Rome hath alwaies been to serve their own turn with the help and affi-"Hance of others, but yet at the good pleasure & discretion of others. And wholoever were wil-Ing to relieve the Romans, they were at their own liberty to begin and end when they would "themselves. Howbeit they purposed to address their Embassadors unto Amiochus, to advenise him and let him underfland that the people of Rome employed the help of Attalus his fhipsand colldiers against Philip, a common everify: and the Sener would take it kindly at his hands, if "for their fakes he forbare the Realm of Antalus, and abitained from war, For meet and realous "ir was, that the Kings who were friends and allies to the people of Rome, should likewide enter-

"tain peace and amity among themselves. T. Quinting the Contributed hafte to be gone into his Province: and when he had levied and mustered his souldier so, as that he had enrolled those old experienced servitors for the most pert, who had given good proof of their valour in the fervice of Spain and Affrick, he was detained folong at Rome by occasion of certain prodigious figns reported, untill he had taken order for the appealing of the gods, and expition of them. The lightning korched and blaffed the great port way from Veii: the Common Hall likewise of publike assemblies, and the Temple of Jupiter in Languium: a to the Temple of Hercules in .. rdea: the walls belides and turrets of Ca and the Temple there which is called All a. At Arctium the sky appeared to be on a light fire. N A. Veluve the earth fetled and funk down, leaving a great gaping chink for the compais of three acres of ground, Word moreover was brought, that in Sueffa Aurunca 2 lamb was yeared with two heads and in Sinue fin a porket with a mans head. In regard of thele prodigies, there was a procession and application one whole day, and the Consuls intended devoutly to their facilities: and after they had patified the gods, they took their journey into their Provinces. Elim, together with C. H. lvim the Prator went into France and gave unto the faid Prator the army which be received of L. Le stalus, and should have dismissed and discharged of their service; because he purposed himself to employ in his own wars the fresh and new legions which he brought with him : but heperformed no action worth the report. The other Conful T. Quintim having taken the fea and departed from Brundufium fooner than other Confuls were wont, arrived at CongraO with eight thouland foot, and eight hundred horse. From thence he crossed the seas with agalleace of five ranks of oars, directing his course for the nearest coasts of Epirm, and by great jourreys made hafte until he was come to the Roman camp: from whence after he had licensed Ville su to depart, and finid there some few daies, until his forces which were at Coregra could overtake him, he called his Councill together to refolve, Whether he should keep on his journey directly, and make way through the midth of his enemies where they lay encamped, or rather without any

a fuch attempt (which could not but carry with it great pain and perill) fetch a compais about with isfety, and to enter into Macedony by the way of the Daffaretians country and Lingue. And verily, this latter course of the twain had taken place, but that he seared, when he were retired once far from the sea, and had let the enemy slip out of his hands, if the King haply were minded (as he haddone before) to defend himfeit within the deferts and forrells, that he should spend all the long fimmer and do no good. Therefore come what would of it he refolved to affail the enemy in that very place as deficult as it was, with all the difadvantage what loever. But as they determined intheir imention thus to do, fo they were not fo ready in the means to execute and effect the same. Thus they fate still and spent to ty daies within the eye of the enemy, and made no attempt. Then Philip conceived some hope to affay a peace, by the means and intercession of the Epirox B nation, And after consultation had there were certain agents chosen for that purpose to wit, Panfaviathe Prator, and Alexander Generall of the hories who brought the Conful and the King together for to parl, unto a place whereas the river Aous is natrowell, and the banks nearest together. The demands of the Conful in fum were thele: That Philip should remove his garrilons out of the Cities Isem, That whose territories or towns he had pilled and spoiled, he should make refliution again unto them all those things that were extant and to be found ! as for the rest, they thould be, prized and valued indifferently to their worth, Philipmade answer again, " That all "those peeces were not of like quality and condition. As for such as he had taken himself, he "would be content to let them at liberty: but for those that were lest unto him by his progenitors "and predeceflors, he would not forgo the possession thereof, since he held them lawfully in right C " of inheritance, Finally, if those Cities wherewith he had warred made complaint, that they were ever endamaged by him, he would report himself to what Cities and States they would them-"felves, and stand to their award, so they were neuters, or in peace as well with the one fide as "the other. The Conful hereunto replied and faid, That for this matter it was needless to refer "themselves to the arbitrement or doom of any. For who feeth not evidently (quoth he) that "he hath done the wrong who first took arms? And that Philip before ever that he was molested "and troubled by any war from others, offered violence first unto all? After, when it was debated "what Cities thould be fet free, the Conful named first of all The falorica sat which word the King was in flich a heat of tholer that he cried out aloud " What hardet condition O Quinting Would "you impose upon him that you had vanquished? and withall, he flung away in a chase from off D the place of meeting and enterview, and would no longer parl. And much ado they had on both ids to hold their hands from shooting one at another, for the river ran in the midst between them that they could not try it out by the ears. The morrow after there passed many light skirmiles between the corps de guard on both parts by way of excursions, first in a plain that lay our broidenough for that purpose : but afterwards as the Kings men retired themselves into the narrowstraights and rough rugged places, the Romans of an ardent defire to be fighting, entred this ther foon after. The Romans had on their fide the benefit of good order and military differpline and were furnished with such kind of weapons as were fit for to maintain a skirmish in a set batell. The enemies again for their parts had the vantage of the ground, and the help of fundry engins to call forth that afar off (as balifts and catapults) planted and ranged almost upon every E chirand took as it had been upon the walls of a City. After they had on both fides given and takenminy a wound, so as divers of them were left slain on the earth, as if they had fought in a full

battell the night at length parted them afunder. Things thus standing in these terms, there happed a certain herdman sent from Charonne 2 Prince of the Epirots to be brought before the Coniul: who gave him to understand that he kept cattell a grazing in that forreft (which then was overforead with the Kings pavillion) and knew all the cranks, all the windings, turnings, and blind waies of those mountains s-promiting, that if he would fend out a band of fouldiers with him, he would conduct them thorow a place that was neither dangerous, nor yet difficult and hard of aftent : which if they had once gained, they should be over their enemies heads and able to command them. And these things (quoth he) you may furely trust upon; for Charopia willed me to make declaration, That he could wish you the Conful were Mafter of all rather than any other. The Conful was definous to believe all, but dust not credit him. And thus being troubled in spirit, whiles he entertained in his heart both joy and fear together, at length the authority of Charopus induced him to refolve and give the ad-Venure of this hope thus offered and prefented unto him. And to the end that the enemy might dillruit and impect nothing. for two dates following he never ceated to affail and provoke him, fetting companies of armed fouldiers in every place, to charge upon him, and ever feconding them with fresh men to succeed in the place of the wearied. After this, he delivered to a Tribune or Colonell four thousand chosen footmen, and three hundred horsemen; with this direction. to lead forward the Cavalry, as far as the ground would give leave: and when they were come 6 once to a place where the horfemen could not pass nor march farther, then to plant them in fome plain and even ground: willing the footmen to march on as the guide should lead them and Point our their way: but after they were mounted above the enemies heads, according as he undertook and made promise, then to give a sign by smok, and not to shout and to set up a cry until one might guesse that upon signall of battell by him given, the battell was begun. And the Consul accommandment to march by night (for as good hap was, the Moon was at full, and shone all night long) and take their refection and fleep in the day time. As for the guide aforefaid, he made unto him many fair and large promises, if it might appear, that he meant truth, and deales faithfully: howbeit in the mean time he delivered him bound to the custody of the faid Colonel When thele companies were thus fent away, the Roman Generall travelled and endeavoured fo much the more to gain vantage of the enemies guards. All this while the Romans that were lent out with the Colonel, marched forward; and upon the third day, when they had given token by imoak, that they had won the pitch of the hill as they intended, and held it ftill : then the Conful divided his forces into three squadrons, and entred the midit of the valley with the main strength of his army, but he led forth the wings of his battell, both the right and the left, against the very camp of the enemies. Who also for their parts were not behind to re-encounter and receive him. And all the whiles that they advanced without their fortifications of defence upon a hot defire of conflict, it fell out, that the Roman fouldier had the better a good deal, as being more valourous more skilful, and better appointed with weapons for that kind of service. But after that the Kines fouldices, whe estmany were wounded or killed outright, retired themselves to places of fafety, either by natural ficuation or by are of man the danger returned upon the Romans heads, who in confideratly were engaged into places of diladvantage, and into narrow fireights, from whence they could no retire with ese. And furely they had not returned back again unpunished for their rashness but that the Kings men hearing first an outcry behind their backs, and seeing also a skirmish begun, were astonied at the sudden terror, and put besides themselves. Some fled here and there away; others that made a fland and tarried ftill, for that they rather wanted ground to flie than had heart enough to fight it out, were environed by their enemies both before and behind hythearmed fouldiers, and Xynia was facked, thus left and forfaken as it was. After this the Acolians won Cyphara, a fort and town of firength, well feated for to empeach and command Dolo- * Oneblacket pia. Thele exploits performed the Ætolians hastily, all in few daies. Neither refled Aminander nor the Athamans quiet and fill, after they heard the news of the prosperous battell which the Romans had lought, But Aminander reposing small trust in his own fouldiers, craved of the Contul a small supply of other forces: and as he marched toward Gomphia he iurprized forthwith and forced a town named Pheca, fituat between Gomphi and the firaichts that divide Theff- by from Athamania. From thence he advanced before Gomphi, and affailed the town which was detended right valiantly for certain daies: but after that he had erected icaling ladders against it, he forced the townsmen within, for very fear to yield and render all into his B hands, The furrender of this City terrified the Theffalians exceedingly: in such fort, that the Citizens of Argenta, Pherinum, Thimarum, Lifinas, Stimon, and Lampfum, one after another submitted themselves, with other peeces thereby of small importance.

Whiles the Atham mians and Ætoiians (fecured from all danger of the Macedonians) made fooil and raised again to themselves by the victory of others: whiles Theffaly was pilled and facked by three armies at once, and knew not their friends from their foes, nor whom to trust : the Conful passed over into the country of * Epirus, by the way of the straights which he had opened * Albania. and madeclear by reason that the enemies were fled. And albeit he knew full well which way all the Epirots in generali went, and with whom they had fided, excepting only Prince Charopus, vet because he saw them not only carefull to make amends and satisfaction, but also willing and C forward to do what loever he commanded, he effeemed and regarded them by their prefent state, more than by their demeanor past, and so by shewing himself inclined to mercy and easie to pardon a fault, he won their hearts, and gained them unto him for the time to come. After this he dilpatched messengers to Coreyra, to will that the kulks and ships of burden should put into the gulph of * Ambrasia, whiles himself travelled by easie journies; and the fourth day after pitched guipn of Amiracia, winter united by the for Aminander to repair with his aids, not substitute finite for any need he had of his forces, fo as much as of his guidance to direct tim in his journeys for it is a part of Thefaly. Most of the Epirotsalfo, for the same intent were received who voluntarily offered the mountain their help and affirtance. The first City that he affauted in The ff to was Pholoria, wherein there Ampelos. laya garrifon of two thouland Macedonians. Who at fift held out and relifted most manually, D and as much as either armor or the walls were able to do defended themselves. But the assault & battery continuing uncessantly both night and day, overcame at length the constant and resolute valour of the Macedonians. For the Conful made this re kening, That upon this point depended the hearts and dispositions of all the other thessa in the first should not be able to abide the violence and force of the Romans. Phaleria was no looner won but there came Embaffadors from Maropolis and Piera to render up their Cities into his hands, who raved pardon, and ob- *A City in tained it. Phaleria was burnt and lacked From them e he let forward to Agineum bur ceing the The gall or replace defentible with any small garrison, and in manner impregnante, he believed some in all thor be Maredony, of darts upon the next corps de guard, and turned his afmy toward the country againt. Maure, casor Ambracia, he fent out his companies one after another to Ambracia, for to purvey orn and vistuals. The way between Gomphi and Ambracia, as it is cumberous and hard for passage, so again, it is but short and very compendious. So that within tew daies he had transported certain convoies of victuals from the port of Ambracia, whereby the camp was flored with plenty of all provision. From thence he passed to Rhages, a town almost ten miles distant from Lariffa. The Citizens thereof are descended from Perrhabia, and the City it self leated upon the river * Peneus. * Selampria, 72 The Theffalians were nothing affraid at the first coming of the Romans. As for Philip, like as he Peris. durit not him elf in person march forward into The flats, so having taken a place within * Tempe, * The pleasang which he held with a flanding camp, he espied into what quarters the enemies intended to go, meadows and and ever as he could find opportunity and advantage, lent underhand succour and relief thirher the liver Personal successions. accordingly.

Much about the same time that the Conful first encamped against Philip in the straights of Epi-781 L. Quintus also, the Conful his brother, who by commission from the Senat had the charge of the fleet and the government of all fea-coafts, failed beyond Corerra with two Galleaces of five banks of oats: and hearing that the navy was departed from thence leeing allo there was no flaying there, he made fail after apace, and having overtaken them at the life Zamma he dismissed Apuffins in whose place he succeeded: from thence he went fair & softly haling after him the most part of the ships which followed with the provision of victuals, until he came to M. lea. From whence, when he had given order, that the rest should make as good speed as possibly they could after him, he went with three Quinqueremes lightly appointed, and arrived before at Pyracum; where he received the other ships that L. Apustius the Lieutenant had left there for the guard and

At the same time there were two Armadoes set out of Asia, the one conducted by King Asi talm, confifting of four and twenty fail of Quinqueremes: the other were of Rhodians, and flood of twenty covers thips with decks and harches, commanded by Agefimbrosas the Admirall.

The whole army might have been note:ly defeated, if the winners had luftily followed the thate. But the firzights and the roughnets of the waics hindred the horie, and the weight of armor combred the footmen. At first the King rode amain with bridle in horse neck, without regard of any thing or looking behind him but after he was got five miles before & gueffing as it was indeed that by reason of the disadiantinge of the place the enemy could not possible make way after the re-Red upon a certain mount and fent his people all abroad over hils and dales, to rally his fouldiers together that were dispersed. Thus with the loss not all out of two thousand men, the rest of the inultitude met together, as if they had repaired to a Rendezzonz upon tome fignal git en & fo marthed with a great train into Theff. ly. The Romans perfued them as far as they might with fafety. killing them, and rifling the dead; yea and ranfacked the Kings camp, which though it were naked without defendants, yet for the difficult access unto it, they had much trouble to win & that night they lodged in their own camp. The next day they Consul made pursuit after the enemy along the flraight, whereas the river runnerh amoung the vallies. The K, came the first day unto the hold or camp of Pyrilms (a place to called Jin Tripbilia, belonging to the territory of Melotis. From whence the morrow after he mare hed a mighty journey with his whole army (for needs he must go that fear drives) & approached the mountain Lingus. These mountains are in Epirus, situate between Macedony and Theffaly. The fide that lieth to Theffaly regardeth the East : that which butteth upon Mased my bath the North directly before it. Covered they are and overspred with abundance of woods; yet so as the very tops do affoard open plains and running waters. The King keeping his camp there for certain daies, was much roubled and perplexed in his mind, calling and revolving, whether it were expedient for him to return immediatly into his own kingdom, or possible to retire himself into I helf dy. In sum, his resolution was to bring down his army into Thessale. And to to Tricea he marched the next way he possibly could. From thence he passed in great halle through all the Cities that were in his way. As many men as were able to follow he forced to quit their habitations and dwelling houses. The towns he set on fire : yet he permitted every one to carry away with him as much as he could of his own goods; all the rest fell to the souldiers share, No manner of cruelty there was, that the very enemy could exercise, but he practised among his own allies. And Philip him elf in the execution thereof, grieved nor a little, and was vexed at the heart; but alas he could do no other; yet his defire was, in that country which within a while should be possessed by the enemy to five the bodies at least wife of his associats. In this manner were rantacked & spoiled their towns following, Phacium, Irefia, Euhydrium, Eretria, & Palaphatus, Against N his coming to Phere the gates were shut upon him. And because it would ask some timeto win that town by affault and no effure he had thereto, he gave over that enterprile & paffed into Macedony: for the bruit went that the Ætolians also approached. Who having heard of the issue of the bittell fought by the river Aonisfirst wasted and ransacked all the country near unto Sperchie and Mara Come (as they call it I and having from thence passed over into Thessaly, won Cymines and Angeas with the first affinit. Howbeit, a repulse they took at Metropolis, whiles they harried the fields about it by reason that the townsmen ran together to the desence of their wals. After this they gave the attempt upon Callithera, where they found the like refistance and violence of the enemies: but there they perfifted longer, and gave not over, nay, they drave the enemies that issued forth within their walls and contenting themselves with that victory, they departed thence feeing no great hope to force the town. Then they won and pilled two villages, Thenmiand Ca'aibana. As for Achana it was furrendred by composition. And upon the like feat! Xynia alfo was abandoned of her own inhabitants. Their Citizens thus driven out of their own houses. flumbled at a venture upon a garrison which was a leading into Athamania, for the betterguard of the forrage is that were to purvey corn. Rerce (which

These fleers joyning together about the Island Andres, croffed the narrow seas from thence to u Eubera And first they forraged the territory of the Carystians: afterwards feeing Cariffus from enough against them by reason of a garrison sent to them in all haste from Chalcis, they approached to Eretria, L. Quintins having intelligence that King Attalus was come, repaired thither allo with those vessels which had been at Pyracum, & gave commandment, that asmany ships asarived thither belonging to his fleet, should bend their course for Eubaa. Now was Eretria by all forcible means affaulted, for not only the veffels of three joynt navies had brought thither all torts of engins and artillery devited for to shake and batter the walls of Ciries, but also the fields and country hard by, yielded them plenty of timber, and other matter to make new. The townsmen from the very first day shewed no valour and courage in defending their walls: and after wards when they were wearied, and some of them hurt, and saw with all a part of their wall over I thrown by the ordnance and engins of the enemy, enclined to yield: but they had amongst them a garrison of Macedonians, whom they seared no less than the Romans. Moreover, Philodes a Captain under the King fent messengers unto them from Chalcis, assuring them, that if they could hold out fill and endure the fiege, he would in good time be with them, and bring relief. Thus hope and fear together constrained them to drive offlonger than either they were willing or well able to do. But when they heard once that Philocles had a repulle by the way, and in great halleand fear was retired and fled to Chalcis again, then immediatly they lent their Embassadors unto Attalus, to crave pardon and protection. Whiles they were wholly bent to feek peace (whereof they had some hope) and forestacked the affairs of war-service, opposing their corp. de guardon that fide only of the wall where the breaches were, and neglecting all befides, behold, Quintimin the K hight-leason gave a camissado in that quarter which was least suspected, and with scaling ladders won the town. The whole multitude of the inhabitants fled with their wives and children into the Cattle, which also afterwards was tendred up. As for money, gold, and filver, there was no great flore to speak of but Images, and painted tables of antique work, artificially wrought and such like ornaments, there were more found, than for the proportion of the bigness, or other wealth besides, of such a City as that was. From thence they set sail once again for Carystus, where the whole multitude, before the enemies were put on land, having abandoned the City, were fled into their fortress: from whence they fent their Orators unto the Roman Generall, humbly cuving their mercifull protection. The townsmen presently had their lives and libertie granted them. But the Macedonians were put to their ransom and they compounded to pay * three hundredfil-L ver sessences apeece, and to give up their armour and weapons, and so to depart: With this sum of money having redeemed themselves they were set out disarmed into Baotia. These forces at sea having in few daies gained two noble and renowned Cities in Eubara, coasted about Sunium, a recommend or cape within the territory of Artica, and arrived before Cenebree, a townofmer-

Gandile and traffick belonging to the Corinthians. The Conful all this while had a longer and more dangerous piece of service in the sege (of Eliages abati all men looked for. And the enemies within maderefiftance, where he would have least of all inspected. For he supposed verily that all the trouble and difficulty would be in battering flown the wall, & making some breach. For thus he thought that if he had once opened way for his armed louldiers to enter into the town, the enemies afterwards would either flee or bey flain as it falleth out commonly in Cities when they are forced. Howbeit, when part of the wallby the battery of the Ram lay flat along, and the enemies were got over at the breaches & ruins thereof; then began their labour and pains anew, as if they had had no trouble nor toil afore. For the Macedonians in garrison, who were many in number, and those approved and select souldiers, thinking how honourable a lervice it would be to defend the City by valour and dint of fword, rather than by the fitength of walls had ranged themselves in a battell within strongly marshalled into many ranks and files close together and when they perceived the Romans were mounting over the breaches to enter the City, they repelled and beat them back in that place of great disadvantage, where they had much ado to recover and retire themselves. The Cos, hereat was much displeased, and vexed in him elf: and making this account, that such a foul foil and disgrace was not N only an occasion of a longer tract of time, before he could force that one City; but also material and important for the main progress and proceeding of the whole war, which commonly dependeth upon the occurrences of light matters and of small moment in the beginning: after he had rid and cleanfed the place which was choaked up with the ruins of the half-broken wallly ing there upon heaps he reared a tower or frame of timber of a huge height to overtop the walls confifting of many stories and stoors one over another, which contained and carried a mighty number of armedmen, and drave the same upon wheels and rollers close to the wall, Moreover he sent out certain ensigns one after another by turns, to break through by force (if it were possible) that throng and close battaillon of the Macedonians (which they themselves call Phalanx.) But the place being so streight (for that the breach of the wall was nothing broad JO the enemies had the vantage both in regard of the weapons which they used, and of the form of battell wherein they were ranged. For when the Macedonians standing close one to another with a continued roof or fence of targets over their heads, opposed their pikes before them which were of an exceeding length: the Romans neither with their darts could hurthem afar off, nor with their fivords drawn come near them to fight close at hand, or cut their pikes in two: and if it chanced that they whipt off or Inapt any alunder, yet the feel and truncheon

A thereof being sharp still at the point (headless though it were) among the other pikes that were headed, served to make a sence as it were an hay or pallaisade. Over and besides that part of the wal that flood whole and found fill, was a fure defence unto both flanks of the enemies: reither had the Romans any room at length to return, and from thence to fetch their beir, and to give a violent charge, which is the thing that usually breaketh and disordereth ranks. Moreover, there chanced one thing by meer fortune that encouraged them within : for as the tower aforefaid was in driving over a terrais or bank whereof the floor was not fast and foundly hardned with the rammer one of the wheels hapned to fink in and make a deep rout in the ground, whereby the whole frame nodded to forward that the enemies without thought verily it was ready to fall, and the armed fouldiers standing upon it within, quaked for fear, and were put well-near besides their wits. B Thus when nothing that was provided might avail and come to any great effect, the Conful was vexed at the heart, to fee himself so over-matched in souldiers, in armour, and in manner of fervice; and withall he confidered, that he had no help to force the City and to win it in any shore time, nor could make means to pass the winter in those parts so far from sea, and seft naked already and waste by those calamities that follow wars. Whereupon he raised the siege: and becausethere was no haven in all the tract and coast of Acarnania and Atolia, which was able both to receive and hatbour all his hulks that brought victuals tor his army, and also to yield winter lodging for his legions; he thought upon the Isle Anticyra within the country of Phocis; which lying toward the gulph of Corinth, seemed to him most fit and commodions for his purpose; becanfe they should not remove far from The fally, and the territories belonging to the enemies ha-C ving befides Peloponnefus affront even over against them, divided but by a small arm of the lea : at their back Atolia and Acarnania: and of each fide Louris and Bania. At the first assault, the Conful without any refistance won Panopea in Phocis, Anticyralikewise long endured not the sege. Then Ambrifus and Hyampolis were received by composition. Daulis by reason that it was fituateupon an high hill could neither be scaled nor forced by instruments and engins of battery. But the Romans by lancing their darts and shooting arrows against them that were in guard. trained them forth to skirmish; and after some light scufflings to no effect, whiles one while they feemed to flie, and other whiles to purfue, they brought them to be fo careless, so negliger t and so little respective, that when the enemies fled back within the gate, they entred pell-mel with them, and so were Masters of the town. Other small forts likewise of Phocis yielded rather for fear than any force offered unto them. Elacia kept their gates shut, and made a countenance, that unless they were driven thereunto, they would receive within their walls neither Roman

Whiles the Conful lay at the fiege before Elana, there was prefented unto him the hope of a greater matter, namely, of withdrawing the nation of the Ache from the Kings alliance to the amity of the Romans, For they had expelled and banished Cycliadas the . hiet of that faction the fided with Philip: and Arifthenus who triended the Romans and fought to be confedered with them, was Prator for the time.

Now the Roman Armado, together with Attalus and the Rhodians, tode at anchor in the haven of Centhrea, and they all were agreed in common to affail Corinth. But the Conful thought E good, before that they should put that designment in action, to send Embassadors to the State of Achaia, promising, if they would revold from the King and turn to them, to deliver Corinth into their hands, for to be incorporate into the ancient league and councill of their nation. And so by the advice of the Conful, there were Embassadors addressed to the Achaans from his brother L Quintius, from Attalus, the Rhodians and the Athenians. And at * Sicyone was there a Councill * Baffice and Diet held for to give them audience. Now the Achaens were not all of one mind and alike affected. The Athenians (a dangerous; an ordinary, and continual enemy of theirs) put them in fear of one fide: the Romans they had in dread and horrour of another. To the Macedonians they were obliged and bound by many good turns and favours, as well old as new. The K. himfelf they held in jealousse for his cruelty and treachery: and calling a proof and conjecture by those consies which he then took, and by his practices for the time, they forefaw well that after the war ended he would be incollerable and a very tyrant over them. They were besides not only ignorant, what every man had faid in the severall councels of every particular State, and in the generalDiets of the whole nation, when they were required to deliver their opinions; but also uncertain and unresolute among themselves in their own minds what to will or wish. Unto men thus doubtfully disposed and unsetled, the Embassadors abovesaid were admitted, and license was given them to deliver their message. First, the Roman Embassador L. Calphurnins; after him, those that were for King Attalus: and in the rhird place, the Rhodians spake and made discourse: and consequently, the Embassadors of Philip were permitted to parl. The Athenians had audience. given them last of all, and were reserved of purpose to consute whatsoever should be spoken and alledged by the Macedonians. And these Athenians inveighed most sharply and bitterly against the King, for none had received either more wrongs, or suffered the like indignities at his hands as they had. So this affembly verily for that time(by reason that the day was spent in hearing the continued orations of fo many Embassadors) brake up about sun setting. The mortow after they affembled again: where the Magistrates by the voice of the Beadle or publike crier after the custome of the Greeks.) gave liberty to every person to deliver his mind, and no man hepped forth. Great filence there was, and not a word among them for a long time, looking

And no marvell if they whole spirits wereaste a nied in some tort within them, when they of their own accord cast and toffed in their hinds things to different and contrary, were now more troubled and perplexed by thole orations before that had lafted all the long day, broaching, uttering, & advising many matters to hastly foodifficate and unpleasant unto them. At length, because the Councill should not be dissolved wishout some foeeth and parl, Arifthenus the Proport of the Acheans began to speak, and faid." Whatin be. "come (my Masters of Achea) of those hearts of yours and couragious stomacks, wherebyatall wyour fealts and in your private meetings (when talk is ministred of Philip and the Romans) you can hardly hold your hands, but are ready to fly one in anothers face? The two and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

After this Oration of the Pretor, there arose a muttering and noise in the assembly, whiles some approved and gave affent unto that which he faid, others rebuked in churlish wife those thataccorded. Infomuch, as they jangled not one with another in particular, but the very States there affembled were at variance, yea, and this debate between the Magistrates of the whole nation k (whom they call Demiurgi, and ten they are in number) was as hotly maintained, as among the multitude. Five of them faid, they would propound unto the people, and debate with them in countel about accepting the alliance of the people of Rome, and put it to voices. The other five protested, that this was directly against a law, in that case provided, forbidding expressy that no Magistrats should either propound or determine ought in any Diet, prejudicial to the society and league with Philip. Thus was this day also spent in debating and wrangling, and nothing done, There remained one day yet of a tull Diet and Councel, for by law they were to conclude and decree formewhat within three dayes at the farthest. Against that time, the parties were so holly bent one against the other, that the fathers could hardly sorbear to offer violence to their very children. There was one Rhifiafus of Pellera, who had a fon named Memnon, and he was a Demisurgus, who took part and Eded with them that would not permit the matter to be put to quefion and determined by a icratiny of voices. This Rhifiafus having instantly a long time importuned his fon and belought him to fuffer the Acheans to provide for their weal publick, and not by his peevish stowardnes undo the state of the whole nation: when he saw once that all his prayers prevailed nothing, he sware a great oath that he would kill him with his own hands and not take him for his ion, but for an errant every. By which his menaces, he gained thus much in the end, that content he was the next day to joyn with them that put the matter to question: who now being more in number than the other made a report and proposed the cause to the assembly; and when all the States in manner there met enclined thereto, and approved thereof, so as they avowed openly what they would ordain; the Dymaans, Megapolitans, and certain Argives, before m the decree was enacted, role up all at once, and departed out of the affembly, and no man either wondred at it, or blamed them for ir. As for the Megapolitans, no longer ago than in their grandfires dayes, at what time as they were expelled out of their country by the Lacedemonians, K. Antigonus had reflored them again. The Dymeans being but lately taken prisoners, and ransacked by the Roman army, Philip having given order that they should be redeemed wheresoever they were in flavery and bondage, he not only let tree, but also replanted in their own country. The Argives last of all besides that they are of a settled opinion and belief that the Macedonian Kings are delcended from them, were for the most part linked unto Philip in the right and regard of privat ho spitality, and samiliar friendship. In these respects, they went out of that assembly which inclined to the contract of alliance with the Romans, and were held excused for this departure; being thus N obliged unto Philip the adverte part by great favours and benefits, yea, and those newly received at his hands. All the other States of the Achaans, when they were demanded their opinions, without delay confirmed by their immediat decree, the society with Attalus and the Rhodians: but the league with the people of Rome, because it could not be ravised and established without the Act of the people, was referred and put off until the time that Embaffadors might be fent unto Rome. But for the present it was thought good that three Embassadors should be addressed unto L. Quintius, and that all the forces of the Achaans should march toward Corinth for that Quintims having won the port of Cenchrea, was already at the fiege and affault of that City.

Theie Achwans encamped themselves over against that gate that openeth toward Sienne: the Romans lay against that part of the City which looketh toward Cenchrea and Attalus hiving led his army through the narrow streight of Ishmus, assailed them of Lechass side, which is anharen of the other Sea. At the first they made no hot assaill, hoping that there would be some mutiny between the Towns-men and the Kings garrison. But perceiving they were all of one mind and resolution, and that both the Macedonians defended the City, as their own nativecountry; and also the Corimbians were content to be at the full command and direction of And-sibhes the Captain of the garrison, as well as if he had been their fellow-citizen, and lawfully chosen by

A their own election and fuffrages: then the affailants had no other hope but in the violent force of arms and engins. And of all fides they had rai ed banks and mures, and were come close to the walls, although with hard access thereto. Now had the Ramstrom that quarter where the Romans lay, beaten down a good part of the wall. To which breach, because it lay naked without defence, all the Macedonians ran to guard and detend it by thrength of arms: where there was a cruel fight between them and the Romans. At the first the Romans were soon repulsed by means of the great numbers of defendants: but after the fuccours of the Achai and Attalns came unto them, they received them with equal valour: neither doubted they but to be able with ease to drive the Macedonians and the Greeks from their Handings, and force them to retreat. But there were within the Town a multitude of Italian fugitives revolted and fled from the Romans : part B of them, a relidue left of Annibal his army; who having transgressed the laws, for fear of punishment were fled from the Romans, and took part with Philip: part also were marriners and leafaring men, who for hope of more honorable intertainment and service, had abandoned their ships, and were gotten into the City of Corinth. These fellows past all hope of life, if the Romans haply should have the better hand fared more like mad men than hardy and audacious souldiers. Now there is over-against Sicyone a promontory of Inno, which they call the Cape of Acrea, and it runneth into the Sea: from whence the passage over to Corimb is a cut almost of seven miles. This ther Philocles, a Captain also under King Philip, had conducted through Exotia 1 500 fouldiers: and certain Brigantins of Corinth were there ready to embark that supply of aid, and to transport them to Leeka s. By this time Attalus advised to set on fire the engins and fabricks that they had r made, and prefently to give over the fiege. Quintius perfitted yet more obstinatly in his enterprise begun. But he also seeing the Kings guards ranged and quartered at every gate, and that if they should hap to fally out their violence would hardly be suffrained, was of the same mind with Attalus. So without effecting any thing, the Achaens were dismissed, and the rest returned to their

thips, Attalus to Pira um, the Romans to Corerra. During this fervice by Seaforces, the (other) Conful who lay in camp before Ela : a in Phocis, first affaied to gain the City by conference and parly with the principal citizens thereof: but after aniwer made, that it lay not in their hands, and that they who were for the King, outwent the Towns-men both in number and firength: then at once from all parts he gave an affault unto the City both by force of arms, and also by engins of artillery. The Ram was bent against the walls, hand as much thereof beaten down with a mighty crash and fearful noise, as stood between the Towers: whereupon the Yown was diffmantelled and laid naked, and withal a cohort of Roman fouldiers entred at the open breach; fo as from all parts the defendants abandoned their guards, and ranto that place that thus was diffrested by the enemies. And at one instant the Romans advanced themselves over the breach, and set up scaling ladders against the wall which was standing. and whiles the enemies were amused wholly, and had their eye only upon that one place where the conflict was, the wall in many parts was scaled, and armed couldiers mounted into the City. At which suddain tumult and alarm, the armed men having quit the place which they guarded with a thick troop fled all into the cattle for fear; and the unarmed and naked multitude fe llowed after. Thus the Conful was matter of the City: which being rantacked, he fent unto the Cattle E certain messengers, promiting life to as many of the Kings garrison as would depart away without arms, and offering liberty to the Elatians; and after fecurity given hereof, within few dayes the Cattleallo was rendred into his hands. Moreover, by the arrival of Philodes (a commander for the King) in Acke is not Corinth only was delivered from fiege, but the City also of the Argives, was by certain of the principal rulers betrayed unto Philocles, who before had founded and follicited the minds and affections of the common people. There was a cultome in this City that upon the first day of their general affemblies, the Pretor should in token of good luck pronounce the names of Jup ter, Apollo, and Hercules: and afterwards ordained it was befides by a law, that the name of Philip (hould make up the fourth. Now after the alliance accorded between them and the Romans it hapned that the beadle or publick cryer left out the name of Philip: whereat the mul-Friende first began to mutter and grumble: then arose a loud cry of those that put him in mind to name the King, willing him to give him his honor dueby law; until at last his name was also pronounced with great applicule and confent. Upon the confidence and affurance of this favour Philocles was fent for, who by night feifed upon an hill that commandeth the City which commonly 18 Called the fort of Lar freand having put a garrifon there, the next morning betimes he advanced forward with banner displaid, and came down toward the common place lying under the torressatoresaid: where there encountred him a band of armed men well appointed in order of battail. These were the garrison of the Achzi lately there placed to the number of 500 electmen chosen forth of all the States of Achea: and one Enefidemus a Dymean was their commander. Unto him Philacles (one of the Kings Captains aforefaid) addressed a special messenger to per-6 wade and exhort him to quit the City; giving him to understand, That he and his Company Were not able to match the Town-men alone, who caried the same mind that the Macedonians had done: much less then should they stand out when the Macedonians were joined unto them; the Macedonians (I fay) whom the very Romans themselves could not sustain at Corinth. At first he did no good either with leader or souldier: yea, and when wirhin a while they beheld the Argives also marching armed against them with a great troop from another part, and saw present death before their eyes, yet it seemed they would have put it to the hazard of a conflict, and fought to the last man, in case their Captain would have stuck to it, and not relented. But H Enefidemus for fear left together with the City, the flour of all the youth of Achea should perish, capitulated with Philocles, that they might be permitted to depart and go their way: but himlest kept his ground fill in his armour, with some few of his followers and vaffals, and removed nor a foot. Then Philotles sent out unto him, to demand, What he meant thereby? Unto whom he gave no other words, but holding forth his shield before him made answer, That armed ashe was he would live and die in the guard and defence of that City which was committed to his charge. Then by the commandment of the Captains, the Thracians lanced their darts and flot at him, and to both he and the company about him were flain every one. Thus after the accord of alliance between the Achaans and Romans, two most noble and famous Cities (Argiand Co. rinth) came under the subjection of the King. These were the acts atchieved by the Romans as , well by Land as Sea this fummer.

In France there was no exploit performed worth remembrance by Sext. El us the Conful notwithstanding he had under his government two entire armies: the one that he retained still with him, which by order he should have discharged, and was the same that had before been commanded by L. Cornelius the Pro-conful and now by him was committed to the charge of C. Eligi the other, that he brought himself with him into the Province. So that he imployed the whole year almost in compelling the men of Cremona and Placentia to return into their Colonies, from whence by fundry casualties of war they were chased and dispersed. As France that year was in quiet beyond all hope and expectation, so about the City of Rome there had like to have been a commotion and tumult of bondflaves. The Carthaginian hoftages were in guard and kept at K Setia, where they had attending about them (as meet was for the children of the chief Nobles and Princes of Carthage) a mighty train and retinue of servants. The number of them was the greater by occasion of the late Affrican war; during which time and presently after the Seting also themselves had bought up many of that nation which were taken captives, and came in port-i le with the rest of the prizes. These having conspired together, sent out certain of their own company to follicite also the other flaves that were in the territory of Seria, and so forth, as many as they could find about Norba and Circeii. Their plot was, that when all things were provided aforehand, they should upon the very day of the solemn games and plaies (which shortly were to be exhibited and let forth in Setia) take the opportunity of the time, when as the people were busy in beholding the spectacle and shew represented unto their eye, and to run upon them: and L when they had by maffacre in this fuddain hurlyburly possessed themselves of Seria, thentogo forward and surprise Norba and Circeii. This horrible complot and conspiracy was detected, and information given at Rome to L. Cornelius Merula Pretor at that time of the City. For two bondflaves early in a morning before day, prefented themselves unto him, and opened from point to point in order, namely, what had been contrived and done, and what remained yet to do. The Pretor having taken order for their fafe custody at home within his own house, called the Senate together; where, after he had recounted and declared unto them what these informers had revealed, he was commanded to go abroad to fearth out and repress this conspiracy. Forth he marched with five Lieutenants of the camp, and look how many he could meet with in his way all over the fields, villages, and hamlets, he tendred unto them a military oath, and constrained M them to arm and follow him. Thus in this hafty manner of levy, he armed well neer 2000, and with them all together (who knew not whither he meant to go, nor to what peece of fervice he led them) to Setia he came. At his first entrance, he suddainly in great hast apprehended the principal heads of the compiracy; whereupon the flaves fled out of the Town. Then were fent out certain into the fields, to trace and to find them out by their tracks. In this business there were two bondlaves and one free man that performed fingular good fervice. Unto him the LL of the Senat gave order that there should be paid 1 00000 Asses in brass coin: but unto the slaves 25000 and their freedom. For the redemption of whom, their masters were contented their full price out of the Chamber of the City. Not long after, it was reported that the remnant of this conspiracy purposed to surprise Preneste. Thither marched L. Cornel in the Pretor of the City, where he exe- N cuted about 500 persons who were found guilty. The City was in great fear to see how the hostages and captives of the Carthaginians practifed such troubles. Therefore in Rome a standing watch was kept in every street: and the inferior Magistrats were charged to see to it and to walk the round, and the Triumvirs likewife (or three Sheriffs) to have a better eye and look to the Quarry-prilon. The Pretor also directed his letters into all quarters of the Latin nation to this effect, That all the hostages should be kept within doors, and not suffered to go abroad into the fireets: that all captives and prisoners should have gives about their heels of ten pound weight at least, and be kept in no other ward but in the common goal.

The same year came Embassadors from King Artalus, who presented in the Capitol a golden Crown of 246 pound weight, with great thanksgiving unto the Senate, that King Antiochus in O 89 6 lib. En. regard of the authority and countenance of the Roman Embassadors, had withdrawn his forces glish in angel out of the confines of Attalus. The same summer two hundred men of arms, ten Elephints, gold, or there and 200000 Modii of wheat fent from King Mafaniffa, arrived at the camp in Greece, Likewife out of Sicily and Sardinia, there was fent great store of victual and liveries for the army. In Sicily M. Marcellus was I. Governour, and in Sardinia M. Porcius Cato, an upright man and living ulury. He banished out of that Iland all usurers: he abridged also and cut off clean, the charges which the allies were wont to defray for the entertainment of the Pretor.

Sex, Elius the Conful being returned to Rome out of France in regard of the general affembly for election of Magistrats, created Confuis Cn. Cornelius Cethegus and Q. Minutius Rufus. And two daies after, the election was held for Pretors. This year first were chosen fix Pretors, by reason that the number of Provinces encreased, and the Roman Empire and Seignory extended farther, And these were they, to wit, L. Manlins Volfo, Cn. Sempronius Tuditanus, M. Sergius Si- Six Pietors lus, M. Helvius, M. Minuteus Rufus, and L. Acilius. Of theie, Sempronius and Helvius were A- first created. diles of the Commons; Q. Minutius Thermus and T. Sempronius Longus Ædiles of the their. The Roman games this year were four times renewed. Cn. Cornelius and Q. Minntins being Confuls, B above all things went in hand with the Provinces of Confuls and Pretors: and first they dispatched thole that concerned the Pretors (a matter that might be decided by casting lots,) To Sergius fell the jurisdiction of the City, and to Minutius the forein, over frangers. Acilius was appointed to Surdinia, Manhins to Sicily, Sempronius to that part of Spain between Italy and therus; and Halones unto the other beyond the River.

When the Consuls were upon the point to call lots likewife for their provinces; namely, Italy and Masedow, L. Oppius, and Q. Fulvius Tribuns of the Commons, interpoled themselves and flaied them aliedging, "That Macedony was a province lying far off, and there was no one thing " that had more empeached and hindred the proceeding of wars to that day than this, That in fo remote parts, the Conful ever of the former year was called home before he were fetled in his C" anims, and when he should be emploied most in wars. Now have there four years already "gone over our heads, fince we decreed and concluded to follow the Macedonian war; during "which time, Sulpitius spent the greater part or his year in seeking after the King and his army; "Villius, when he should encounter the enemy, was called away before he had effected any ex-"ploit; as for Quintins, he was kept at Rome hill for the most part of the year, in attendance a-"bout Church-matters and facrifices: howbeit the affairs of wars under his conduct were ma-" naged to well, that if either he had gone fooner into his province, or the winter had been later, whe might have dispatched the wars there : and now, that he is ready to retire into his standing "camp and wintring harbors, the report is, that he hath brought the war to that good pass and "forwardness, that unless he be not hindred by a new successor, in all likely-hood and apparence, D"he will make a final end thereof the next summer. With these speeches they prevailed so much, that the Consuls for their part promised to be ordered and fet down by the Senet in this behalf, upon condition, that the Tribuns would be content to do the like. Now when of both fides, they had referred themselves to a free and absolute confultation the LL of the Senat affigued to both the Confuls the government of Italy, and continued the command of the army fill with T. Quintius, until there came another to fucceed him. Two legions were appointed for the Conful, with commission to war upon the Gauls between Rom: and the Alps who had revolted from the people of Rome. And for Quintius ordained it was, that there should be sent into Macedony unto him, a new supply of 5000 foot, 300 horse, and 3000 fea-fervitors and mariners. And likewife, that the same L. Quantus Fluminimus should be E Admiral of the navy, as before. For the Pretors who were to go into Spain, there was an allowance of 8000 footmen out of the allies of the Latin nation, and 400 horiemen, to that they difmissed the old souldiers out of Spain: and enjoined they were to limit and set out the bounds of their leveral provinces, whereas the higher Sp. iin and the lower should part. And for Macedony there were two Lieutenams more for the army appointed, to wit, P. Sulpitius and P. Villius, who had been Confuls both, and in that province.

Before that either Confuls or Pretors went out into their provinces, it was thought good to take order for the prodigious tokens which hapned. For at Rome the Temple of Videan and Summanusat Fregella, the wall and a gate of the City, were firthen with lightning. At Frusino it appeared light (as it had been clear day) in the night leason. At Afrilum a Lamb was yeared ha-Fring two heads and five feet. Also at Formia two wolves entred into the Town, and worried fomethat were intheir way. Last of all, at Rome there was a wolf, that not only came into the City, but went forward as far as to the Capitol.

C. Actions a Tribun of the Commons proposed a law, that there should be five Colonies conducted to the Sea fide and there planted: two at the month of the Rivers Vultumnus and Liternus, one at * Puteoli, another in the Burrough Town of Salernam, and to m ke the fift * Buxentum * Puzzole. was adjoined to the reft. Into every Colony order was taken, that there should be thirty hou- * pige outs Vi. sholds fent. The three Commissaries, called Triumvirs, for the conducting of these Colonies grant Forests, were created; namely, M. Servilius Geminus, Q. Minutias Thermus, and T. Sempronius Longus, Egorio. Theiethree had commission to continue in the charge of this office three year. After the more, Gand all other matters accomplished, pertaining to God and man, that were by the Contracto be performed, then they fee forward both, into their provinces. Cornelius took his way directly against the Insubrians, who accompanied with the Cenomans, were entred at that time into arms: 2. Minutius in his journey bare on the left hand of Italy toward the nether fea ; and conducting his army to Genua, began with the Ligurians to make war. Cl. stidium and Litubium, Towns both of the Ligurians, likewife two States of the fame nation, the Celelais and the Cerdiciats furrendred unto him; infomuch as all the country on this fide the Po, were in subjection to the Romans, except the Boians among the Gauls, and the Illusts among the Lighting. By report ! there were fifteen Towns containing twenty thouland men, which yeelded unto them. From thence heled the legions into the territory of the Boians. The army of the Boians had passed over the Po a little before, and joined with the Infubrians and Canomans; for hearing that the Confule would war jointly with both their forces, they intended likewife to make themselves more ftrong, by uniting and bringing their power together. But the bruit being blown abroad, that once of the Confuls invaded and fired the country of the Boians, prefently there arose a tumult. For the Bojans demanded, that they all in general would help them in their diffress. The Insubrians relufed and faid, That they would not abandon their own confines by which occasion they dishanded. The Boians went to the defence of their own country, and the Infubrians with the Conomans. fat them down upon the banks of the River Mineius. Five miles beneath that place, the Conful I Corneline also encamped himfelf neer the said River : from whence he sent certain messengers all about the villages, and to Brixia, the head City of that nation; and being advertised sufficiently that the youth was up in arms, without the warrant and content of their ancients; and that the Canomans joined not with the Infubrians in their rebellion by vertue of publick counfel and authority; he fent for the principal persons among them, and began to labour and deal with them, that the Canomans would tortake the Infubrians, and openly with their enfigns advanced, either to return into their own country, or turn to the Romans. This they could not bring them to : howbeit they affured the Conful, that in the field they would either fit ftill and do nothing, or elfe, if any good opportunity was prefented unto them, they would aid the Romans. The Infubrians knew nothing of this complot: and yet, some doubt and suspition they had, that their allies haked, and were not K found of all four: and therefore when there was occasion to lead forth to fight a field, they duff not trust them with either of the two wings and points of the battel, for fear if they retreated like talle brethren, they should bazard the main chance: but placed them behind the enfigns in the reeignd. The Conful in the beginning of the battel vowed a Temple to Juno Soffita, in cate he discomfitted the enemies that day, and put them to the rout. The fouldiers fet up a shout, and cried aloud that they would bring it to pais that the Control thould have his defire, and therewith charged the enemy right fiercely. The Infubrians could not abide the first shock. Some write, that in the very conflict the Conomans also suddainly set upon their back, whereby they were distressed and in danger both before and behind; and that there were flain enclosed in the mids five and thirty thoufand of the enemies, and feven hundred taken priloners, and among them Amilear the General of L the Carthaginians, who was the cause of this war: also that there were a hundred and thirty enfigus carried away, and of charjots above two hundred. All the Towns that followed this revolt, yeelded to the Romans.

Minutius the Consus, as the beginning made excutions into the country of the Boians, walling and fooiling it all over a but after wards when they had fortaken the Infubrians, and wereretired home to deleng and fave toer owe, he kept himself within camp, making full account to triea let battel with the enemy. Neither weald the Boians for their part have been behind, batterdy to have answered them, had not the rumor of the Insubrians overthrow, daunted and broken their bearts. Whereupon they for ook their leader, quit the camp, and bestowed themselves in the Towns and Villages to guard every man his own, and quite altered the courie of their enemy his M war, and put him besides his account. For the Consul past all hope now to determine the quartel in one ranged battel, began again to forrage the fields, burn all buildings, and force Townsby affault. Much about the same time Clast dium was set on fire. And from thence the legions were conducted against the Iluats among the Ligarians, who only stood out and would not come in, and yeeld obed ence. Which nation like wife hearing that the Infubrians were defeated in a battel, and that the Boians were to scared, that they dust not venture the fortune of a field, submitted themselves. At the same time the letters of the containing their happy affairs in France, were brought to Rome. M. Sergins the Pretor of the City first read them in the Senat, and afterwards by the advice of the Senate, rebearfed them in a full addience and affembly of the people. Anda procession was decreed for the space of tour dates.

Now was winter come, and whiles T. Quinting after the winning of Elatia, wintred his armies in divers harbors within Phocis and Locris, there profe a muting in Opes. The one faction lent for the Actolians their neer neighbours to fide with the m: and the other for the Romans. The Actolians came first, but the mightier faction would not luft it them to enter in : for having dispatched a messenger to the Roman General, they held the Town until his coming. The Kings garrison kept the fortress, neither could they be brought to abandon it either with the menaces of the Opuntians, or the authority and countenance of the itoman commander. The only let and flay why it was not immediatly assaulted was this; Because there was come an herald from the King, requelting time and place of a parle, which with much ado was granted to the King a not because Quinters of himself was not defirous and wished that he might be thought so have ended this was 0 either by force of arms or conditions of peace; for as yet he knew nor whether one of the new Consuls should be fent to succeed him, or his government continued still unto him (according as he had given his friends and kinsfolks in charge to bring that about by all the endeavour and means that he could make :) but he supposed verily, that this parling would be to good purpose torhim, if it might be in his liberty to drive matters unto war if he stayed Itill, or draw to a peace if hedeparted home. So upon the strand and shore of the gulf Males, they choic a place neer unto Nices.

A Thither came the King by water from Demetrias with five brigantins or pinnaces, and one thin of war with a brais beak-head. There accompanied him the chief LL, of Macedony, and Cycliadae anoble personage of great mark among the Achans, and one that was from thence banished. With the Roman General were King Aminander, Dienylidorus an Embassador of King Accalus, and Acclimbratus Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, Phaneas the chief and principal Magistrat of the Riolians, and two Achaans Arifthenus and Xenophon. The Roman General in the mids of the C. advanced himself forward to the edge of the very shore, even to the bank side, whiles the King came forward to the foredeck of his ship standing at anchor and thus he began and said unto the King; "Sir, you may do better to come ashore that we may commune and confer tog; ther close, and both speak and hear one another more casily. The King refused so to do : and why so? quoth B" Quintius, who is it that you tear, if a man may know? Then with an hauty spirit and kinglike: I " fear none (quoth he) but the immortal Gods; but I trult not the fidelity of all that I fee here a-"houtyou, and namely, the Etolians leaft of all other. Why (faith Quinting again) this is the "common cate of all them that come to parly with enemies; namely, to be in danger one of anowther, Yea mary queth the King, but by your leave Quinting, the price and recompense of trea-"chery and falshood (if it should come to that) is not all one for killing Philip and Phiness : for to the Atolians should not find it so hard a matter to substitute another Pretor, as the Macedonians "tocreste another King in my room. This faid, there was not a word more to the point : while the Roman General thought it reason that he should begin who sought for a parle; and the King supposed it meet that it was his part to speak first who should give conditions, and not for him that flood at receipt, and was to accept thereof. Then Quintim began and faid, that his speech should be plain and simple : for he would fay no more, but propose only those points, which if they might not be performed, there would be no peace upon any condition at all. First, that the King mult withdraw his garrifons out of all the Cities of Greece. Item, That he is to deliver up all the prisoners and fugitive revolts that he hath, unto the allies of the people of Rome. Item, That he reflore again to the Romans all those pieces in Illiricum, which after the peace concluded in Epirm. he hid feized upon. Last of all, that he furrender unto Ptolomew King of Agypt, all those Cities which he possessed himself of, after the death of Prolome Philopator. These (faith he) are the conditions, that I and the people of Rome do demand : but meet it is befides, that you hear the demands also of the allies. Then the Embassador or agent for King Accalus required, that the ships n and captives which had been taken in the Se - fight before China, should be rendered and that Nicopherium and the Temple of Venue, which he had pilled and spoiled, should be restored as good and entire, as they were before. After him, the Rhodians made claim to Peraa (a country in the continent right over-against their Isle, and an ancient appurtenance of their Seignory) and demanded withal, that the garritons should quit Iasius, Bargilla, and the City of the Euromensians, and about Hellofpontus, like wife the Cities of Seftos and Abydos. Item, that Panopolis should be restoredunto the Bizantins, with the ancient charter of their franchifes and liberties. Finally, that all the Merchant Towns and Ports in Afia might be freed from paying custome. Then came upon himthe Achæi, and challenged Corimb and Argi as their own. After them, when as Phineas (the Pretor of the Atolians) had demanded in a manner the fame that the Romans had before; Enamely, that the Kings forces should depart out of Greece, adding moreover, that those Cities should be rendred unto the Ætolians which in times past belonged to their dominion and jurisdiflion: then one of the heads of the Ætolians named Alexander an elequent manamong them, as any other, presently inferred and said; "That he had a long time fitten still, and opened not his "mouth, not because be thought that in all this conference they would grow to any point or con-"clusion, but for that he would not interrupt any of his allies in their speech. And as for Philip, "quothhe, he dealeth not foundly and bons fide in treaties of peace, no more than ever betetoicre "he bath managed his wars with vertue and true valour. For in all these parlies and conferences "he layeth trains, and lieth to catch advantages: in war he never striketh a battail in plain field, "nor cometh to close fight hand to hand; but in his recreats and flights, burneth and facketh Ci-F"ties; and thus being himself vanquished, spoileth and maketh havock of that which by right is "the due reward and recompence of conquerors. But the noble Macedonian Kings in old-time, "took no luch courfes. Their manner was to fight it out in open field, and to spare Cities and "Towns, all th.t ever poffibly they could; to the end that their dominion might be more wealthy "and putifant. For what kind of policy is it, for him to minate and deftroy utterly that, about the "possession whereof he is in question, and reserve nothing for himself but only war? This Philip "the year past hath leid desolate in The falie more Cities of his allies there, than ali the enemies "bave done that ever Theffalie had; and hath taken more from the Ætolians themlelves, while " he was a confederate friend with them, than all the time that he was their professed enemy. He "hath feized upon Lyfimachia, expelled their Pretor, and chalco out the garrion of the Atomans. G (hios allo, a City under his own subjection he hath rafed, subverted and quite destroyed. By semblablefailhood and deceit he is policifed of * Thebes in Philia, Echinam. Larifa, and Pharfalus. For diftindi-Philip netled and galled at these words of Alexander, commanded that his thip should approach on of Thibes neerer to the bank, to the end that himself might be better heard. And as he negan to trame bitter in Egypt and invectives against the Etolians principally, Chaneas cut him off, taying, That the quarrel was not to be decided by word, but with the tword : and either he mult win it by mere force, or yeeld Obedience to the mightier. That is true, quoth Philip, and so evident, that a blind man may see it;

jesting merily at Phaneas, who was troubled with a pair of bad eies. And given he was by nature H to be pleasantly conceited, yea, and fuller of his frumps, I wot than beseemed the Majesty of a King to as many times even in treaty of ferious matters and of great confequence, he could not forbear but make himself mery and laugh a good while, "Afterwards he fell to a fit of choler and "indignation, that the Ætolians should take upon them like Romans to command him out of "Greece, who if they were put to it, were not able upon their knowledge to let down the bounds " of Greece & limit how far it reached. For asmuch as the Agrei, the Apodeotes and Amphilo: hi. "which take up a great part of Atolia, are not within Greece. And what just cause (quoth he) of "complaint have they, in that I have not spared some of their allies? Why? even they themselves " hold this old enflome for a law, namely, to permit their youth to take arms and ferre against their own alties fo they do it without the publick order and warrant from the State: and very I "often a man may fee Ætolians in contrary armies, &come to aid as we! the one fide as the other "As for Chine it was not I that forced it; I did no more but aid Prufias my friend and ally, in the "fiege and atlault thereof. And as touching Lysimachia, I defended it against the Thracians: but Gor almuch as of necessity I was called away from the guard thereof unto this war, the Thraci-" ans now hold it. Thus much by way of answer to the Ætolians. Now concerning Analus and the Rhodians, by right I owe them nothing: for it was not I but they, that began the war. "Howbeit, for the honor that I bear to the Romans, I will make restitution to the Rhodians of 6. Peral, and reftore I will to Attalus the ships and the captives as many as are forth coming and "may be found. As for the restitution and making good again of Nicephorium and the Templeof " Verus what answer should I return to them that demand it, but this, that I will endeavour and K "be at charge of planting new trees (which is the only way and means whereby groves and " woods that are cut down and fallen, may be recovered again) feeing that ye will needs have it. that Kings (torlooth) mult commune and reason to and fro about such matters as these. In " the last place, he framed his speech to answer the Achaans: wherein, first he began with the benefits and pleafures that Antigonus had done unto that nation; then, of the favours and good turns they had received from his own telf; and with all he commanded their decrees and edias to be read, containing all kind of honors as well divine as human: adding moreover the late "and tresh revole of their army from him: and albeit he inveighed sharply against their disloy-" alty and treachery, yet he promited to render Argos unto them. As for Corinth, he would con-"fer and confult with the Roman General, and demand of him, whether he thought it reason t. "that he should depart from those cities which he wan by arms, and held by right of conquest, or "disposses himself of those also, which he received from his progenitors as his lawful inheristance? The Acheans and Ætolians addressed themselves to answer those points; but the sun was welneer down : whereupon the conference was adjourned until the morrow. Fhilip refired to the harbot from whence he came and the Romans with their allies to their camp. The day iollowing Quartins at the time appointed was ready before the City of Nices (for that was thought a convenient place.) But Philip appeared not nor for the space of certain hours came there any at all from him, not to much as a meflenger. Now when they were out of all hope of his repair thither, behold of a suddain his ships were deliried. For himself he said by way of exeme, that confidering how hard, how grievous and intolerable indignities were imposed upon him he had M employed all that day time until then in confutation, and could not refolve. But it was generally thought among them all that he had of purpose prolonged the time, and made it so late eventoward evening, because the Achains and Etolians should have no leisure to answer unto him, And this opinion of theirs himself confirmed, in that he requested that he alone might parly with the Roman General himself, and that all others should go aside and ablent themselves; to the end they two might fpend and lole to more time in debate and wrangling, but go briefly to the point, and make an end one way or other. This petition of his would not at first be accepted by Quintius, precending that he would not have it teen that the allies were excluded out of the conference. But afterwards upon his importunat fuit, by the advise of them all the Roman General together with Ap. Claudius a Colonel, when the reif were voided away, advanced forward N to the bank ide: the King with the other two whom he had with him the day before came aland There after they had parled intecret together a certain time, they parted. What Philiprelated unto his company is not certainly known: but Quintius made report onto his allies of their conference in this wife: name y, that Philip was content to quit the who could and tract of Illyricum- for the Romans to enter upon. Item, to fend back all the traitere us renegats, and as many captives as were to be found. Item, to redeliver unto Attalus the flips and the mariners taken prisoners therein, Item to render unto the Rhodians the country of her a that in no wife to be differied of Liffus and Bargylla. Item, to deliver unto the Elopians of a false and L . Jahurnet Thebes in any case, Last of all to part not only with Argos but with Cornel al o for the behoof of the Achains. There was not one of them all well pleafed a this limitation and ferting on of pit of cicular parts, which he would deliver, and which he would not. For in this reckoning & second they should be more losers than winners. For unless (say they) he remove his forces and garrions out of all Greece throughout, he will never cease to give or take occasions of quarrel. As they all cried out from the whole affembly to this effect, their high voyce was heard of Pi-dip, albeit he Road aloof. Wherupon he requested Quintius to refer the whole matter once more unto the next day; and then certainly without fail, he would either perswade him and his allies and bring them to his mind, or else would come off and suffer himself to be perswaded and over-ruled by them The place of meeting was appointed upon the strand near Thronium: and thither they repaired on both parts betimes. There Philip first and foremost, belought both Quinting and all those that were present, not to disturb the hope of peace, but that it might come to some effect: and in conclusion, craved time wherein he might fend his Embassadours unto the Senat of Rome; affuring them, that if he could not obtain peace under those articles above said, he would accept of any other conditions, which it should please the Senat to put upon him. All the rest missised hereof suppoling that he fought for nothing else but delayes and tract of time, whiles he might gather his forces together. But Quintius inferred again, That well it might so be and a truth indeed that they alledged, it were summer time and a season fit for war and martial exploits: but now, considerging winter was at hand, they could lose nothing by granting him respite to address an embassage. For neither (qd, he) will any capitulation and composition which we should make with Pkilip fland good and firm without the approbation of the Senat : and in this one winter (when of necellity we must surcease from war) it may be known what the Senate by their authority will approve. To this advice the chief of the confederats accorded, and therein rested. So there was a cellation of arms for two moneths granted: in which mean time it was thought good, that each of them likewise should dispatch one Embassador to advertise the Senate, to take heed they were not over-raught by the subtilty and fraud of the King. But provided it was in the covenant of the truceaforelaid, That incontinently the Kings garrifons should void the territories of Phoeis and Locris, Quintius alio, himself sent (together with the Embassadors of the allies) A minender King of the Athamans; and to make the embassage more honourable, Q. Fabius (his own wives listers ion) Q. Fulvius and P. Claudius accompanied the King.

When they were arrived at Rome, the Embaffadours of the allies had audience given them before those that were fent from King Philip. Most of their speeches were spent in raising against the King but in this one point they most of all moved the Senat to give ear unto them namely, when they described by demonstration (as in a map) the situation of those countries as well by Land as Sea, that all men might plainly fee, that if the King might hold in his hands the City Demetrias in Theffalie, Chalcie in Eubaa, and Corineh in Achaia, Greece could not possibly be at liberty, confidering that Philip himself was wont to term them (no less truly than tauntingly) The shackles and fetters of Greece. After them were the Kings Embassadors permitted to enter into the Se nat-Dhouse and having begun to make a long Oration, their speech was cut off with this one brief and short interrogatory, Whether Philip would quit those three Cities aforesaid, or no? Whereunto they made this answer, That they had no express warrant in their commission touching that matter by name. So the Kings Embaffadors were fent away without conclusion of any peace: and Quintim had full authority to determine of war or peace at his pleasure. Who seeing plainly by this, that the Senat was not weary of war, and being himself more desirons of victory than peace, he would never after grant Philip any more parlies, but gave him to understand, that he would admit no other embassage from him, but that which should bring him news of his departure quite out of Greece.

Philipleeing no other way now but that he must needs fight and trie the issue by a main bat-E tail, and that he was to gather his forces together from all parts: being perplexed most of all for the Cities of Achaia (a countrey far remote from him) and yet more careful in regard of Argi than Corinth; he thought it best policy to make it over (as it were upon trust) into the hands of Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, upon condition, That if he obtained the victory, Nabis should deliver it up unto him again; but if ought should come to him but well, then Nabis himfelf to have and hold it as his own. Unto Philocles, Governor of Corint h and Argu he dispatcheth his letters, That he should himself in person commune with the tyrant above named about ir. Philocles, befides that he came now with a present, added moreover of his own head (for the better affurance and pawn of amity between the tyrant and the King) That Philip would give his daughters in marriage to Natis his sons. The tyrant refused at the first to accept of that City, Funless he were sent for, by a decree of the Argives themselves to come for to aid the City. But afterwards when he heard fay, That in a frequent affembly there, they not only rejected him, but also detected and abhorred the very name of a tyrant, as an exectable abhomination; supposing now that he had a good occasion and quarrel offered to make a spoil of them, he willed Philodes to deliver the City unto him when he would. So the tyrant was received into the Town in the night (eason, without the privity and knowledge of any person : and by break of day he seised upon all the higher places. The gates were thut, and few of the principal heads in the beginning of the tumult made shift to escape. Those that were absent had their honies ransancked and their goods pilled: as many as were prefent, had all their gold and filvertaken from them; besides, great sums of money were imposed upon them to be paid. They that made speed and Gwere not long about it, but tendred ready coin, were let go without any outrage or hurt done unto their bodies: but such as were suspected either to hide or keep ought back, were mangled and tortured like bondslaves. After this, he affembled the people together and published two Laws; the one, for croffing all debt-books and cancelling obligations: the other, for divifion of Lands among the people by the poll: two fire brands to serve their turn that seek for change and alteration in a State; enough to fet on fire the Commons against the Nobles and chief of a City! When

When the City of Argos was thus brought in subjection under Na is the tyrant never temen-u bring at whose hands, nor upon what condition he had received it, sent Embastadors to Eldie unto Quinting, likewile to Artelus wintring then in Agina, certifying them, That Argor wasin his hands and at his devotion; and if Quintius would repair thither to parle with him, he doubted not but they two should agree well enough in every point, Quintini granted to come thither to the end, that by this means he might disfurnish Philip of that garrison: and he fent likewife to Accalus, willing him, that he would depart from Lgina and meet him at Sicyone: himfelf loofed from Anticrea, and with ten Galeaces called Quinqueremes; which (as hap was) L. Quintuithis brother some dayes before had put to sea out of the wintring harbor of Coregia, crossed overto Sicrone, Now was Att. lus there already, who making remonstrance unto Quintius, That ither came a tyrant to come unto a Roman General, and not a Roman General to go unto a tyrant, induced Quintins to condescend unto his opinion, and not to enter the City of Argos, Not far from the City is a place called Mycenica, where they agreed to meet and commune together. Quinting came to the place, accompanied with his brother and certain Colonels. Attalus was guarded with his Princely and Royal train, Nicoftrains the Pretor of the Achaans repaired thither, attended with fome few auxiliary touldiers : and there they found the tyrant expecting their comine with all his for es. And armed as he was with his guard like wife armed he advanced himfelf into the midti (well neer) of the plain that lay between. Quinting unarmed came forward with his brother and two Colone . King At alus likewise between the Pretor of the Achaans of the one hand and a contriour of his on the other, both una rmed. The tyrant began the speech with an ex use, That being in arms and attended with a guard of at med men, he pretented himselfto a h purle feeing the General of the Romans and King Attalus unarmed: and taid that he flood not in fear of them but of certain exiled persons of the Argines. After this, when they came totteat as touching the conditions and covenants for the contract of an amity, Quinius the Generaldemanded two things: the one. That Nabia would make an end of warring with the Achai: theother. That he would lend with him certain aids against Philip. And verily to fend succour hegunred: and in lieu of peace he was content there should be a truce, until the war with Philes was dispatched. Al o about Argos King Attalus beganto enter into some question saying: That having the City trea herously betrayed unto him by Philocles, he now held it by force of arms but heapfwered again, That he was tent for by the Argives themselves for to protect them. Then the King, required that the Argives might be affembled together, that he might know the truth. The typic made no denial thereof. The King teplied again, that the affembly should be free, and at their liberry to speak, and to that effect the garrisons were to be removed out of the City, and no Lace demonians intermingled among them; to the end that the Argives might frankly speak their mind, But the tyrant flatly denied to withdraw from thence the guards. So this arguing came to no conclusion, and the conference brake up, after that the tyrant had given the Roman General 600 Candiots, and a truce made for the term of four moneths, between Nicoftratus Pretor of the Athezans, and Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. From thence Quintius departed to Corinth, and approached the gate with a Regiment of Cretenfians, that it might appear to Philocles the Kings Captain there that the tyrant was revolted from Philip. Philocles also entred into a parle with the Roman General and when he was exhorted by him to depart out of hand and yeeld the City, he N returned such an answer unto him, that he seemed rather to defer, than to deny the thing. From C rinth Quintius crossed the Sea to Anticyra, from whence he fent his brother to found the nation of the Avarnanians, And Attalus departed directly from Argos to Sicyone. Where the City not only en realed the ancient honours of the King, with the addition of new : but also the King over and befides that he had purchased for them in time past, the sacred land of Apollo, with a great sum of money because he would not seem now also to pass by this friend City allied unto him, without tome royal bounty and munificence, he gave freely unto them fix talents of filver, and 10000 Medimns of corn and to returned to his ships at Cenchrea. Nahis also having strengthened the garrison in Argi returned to Lacedomon: and after himself had robbed the men of their mony and goods he fent his wite thither to do the like by the women. Who fending for the honourable & N worthipful dames of the City inviting them one by one to her house, and otherwhiles many together at once such as were of kin one to another, by flattering and by threatning gat from them not only all the gold that they had, but in the end fiript off their apparelalio, and all the jewels and ornaments that they wore.

adjoyning in those quarters to Acarusnia. There was a streight pass or gullet there, half a mile almost in length, but not half a mile in breadth: at the end of this streight standeth the City Lencas olanted against an hill that turneth to the East, and looketh toward Acarnania, The base Town is built upon a plain, reaching along the fea that divideth Lencadia from Acarnania, Whereupon the City as well on the land inde, as by tea, is easie to be forced. For the foords of the water relemble a standing lake rather than a Sea, and the whole soil is a light earth, minable and easy to be wrought into, to that in many places at once the walls either undermined or shaken with the ram, came tumbling down. But as the Town it felf was affaultable, to the hearts of the Townsmen were in-Cyincible, For night and day they gave not over, to repair the cracks of the shaken wal, to fill up the open breaches and ruins, to make head infilly, and skirmish with the enemy, and rather to defend the walls by force of arms, than to fave themselves by strength of their walls. And surely a longer fiege they would have made of it than the Romans hoped but that certain banished perions, Italians born, dwelling in Lencas let in and received armed fouldiers on the Castle fide. Howbeit, the Leucadians embattelling themselves in their market place, encountred them as they ran down from the higher ground with a great cry and noise, and maintained battel with them for a long time. In this mean while, the walls in diverse places were scaled with ladders, and the enemies mounting over the heaps of Itones that lay at the breaches, entred the Town, And now by this time the Lieutenant in perion, with many companies environed them as they fought: fome flain in the midfl, Dothers flung away their weapons, and yeelded to the conquerour. After few dayes, upon the news of the field fought at Cynocephala, all the States of Acarcania came in, and submitted themselves to the Lientenant.

At the same time, whiles fortune turned thus about, and bare down a side all at once; the Rhoe dians also sent out Pansistratus their Pretor, with 800 sootmen of Achea, & about 1900 souldiers well armed, gathered out of all forts of auxiliaries, to regain and reconquer from Philip the country of Peres, lying in the main and firm land, which had been held sometime, and possessed by their ancestours. And these aids were compounded and mixed of French, Nisuets, Piluets, Tanians, and Areans of Affrick, and Laodiceans of Asia. With these forces Paulistratus encamped in the territory of Stratonicea, and there he seized of a commodious place, and very good for his putpose, Eunwares to the Kings company that had holden the same. Thither came also to aid them in very good time, a Regiment of a 1000 foot and a 100 horse of Achaens, levied for that purpose, and were commanded by Theoxenus. Dinocrates a Captain under the King, willing to recover the faid hold again, first pitched his tents, hard against the enemies camp. But afterwards he removed to another fort in the territory likewise of Stratonicea, which they call Astragon: and having rallied together all the garrisons dispersed asunder in divers places, and sent for the auxiliary bands also of Thessalians, even from Stratonicea, he took his way and marched toward Alabanda, where the enemies were. The Rhodians likewise for their part were ready for battel, and after they were encamped of both fides neer together, immediatly they entred into the field to fight it out. Dinocrasuplaced in the right point 500 Macedonians, and the Agrians he put in the lest, in the main battelhe bestowed all those that he had gathered together out of the garritons belonging to the forts abovefaid, who for the most part were Carians, the points he slanked round about with his cornessoi Horse. The Rhodian cohort was marshalled in this manner: The auxiliaries of the Candiots and Thracians kept the right point, the hired fouldiers (and they were a power of elect footmen) flood in the left; in the midst were the aids (a mixture of many nations:) the Cavalry and all the light armed foul diers that were, compafied the corners like wings. All that day the two armiss flood only upon the bank of a brook which ran between them with a small and shallow water: and after some loose shot discharged, they retired into their tents. The next day they were ranged in like order, and struck a battail exceeding the proportion of their number; for on each fide there were not above three thouland foot, and upon a hundred horse: but they were even G matched not in number only and armour, but also in equal courage and hope alike. The Achæi fiftpassed over the said brook, and charged upon the Agrians: atterwards the whole army ran as one would say, over the River. The fight continued long doubtful. The Achai being of themselves in number a thousand, disordred some sour hundred of the other, and sorced them to retreat, and afterwards the entire right point of the battail began to shrink and give ground. As for the Macedonians, folong as their battaillon called Phalanx, kept their array and stood close to gether, could not possibly be stirred or removed; but after their left side was laid naked, and they began to reach out on an all hands their long pikes against the enemy, charging them across upon H the flank, they were presently troubled: and first they put themselves in dilarray, afterwards they turned their backs, and last of all flung their weapons from them, and ran away for life, until they were come to Bargilia, Thither also was Dinocrates fled. The Rhodians having followed the chale as long as they had any day to fee, retired into their camp. And for certain it is known, if in this train of victory they had prefently made speed to Stratonicea, they might have been masses of the Town, and never drawn (word for it: but whiles they spent time in recovering the burrough Towns and forts of Perea, they let this opportunity slip out of their hands, and lost it for ever For in the mean space, they that lay in garrison and held Stratonicea, were encouraged, and took better heart. Dinocrates also anon with those forces of his that remained, put himself within the walls. Then was the Tower befieged and affailed, all in vain, neither could it be forced and won I but by Amiochus, a certain time after. Thus went the affairs in Theffalie, in Achea, and in Affa. much about one and the felt-same time.

The three and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Philip being advertised that the Dardanians were entred within the confines of his realm, and wasted the high country of Macedony, albeit he law that almost in all parts of the world unhappy for une fill followed and courfed both him and his wherefoever they were: yet effeeming it more grievous and heavy than death it self to be diffeized of the possession of Macedony also, he madea levy in great hast our of all his cities of fix thousand foot, and 500 horse; with which power of Macedonians, he fuddainly furprited the enemy (unprovided and not aware of his coming) about Stobi in Pelagonia. Great numbers of men were flain in conflict, but more in the fields, fuch as were disbanded, and ranged abroad for greediness of booty and pillage. But as manyas could w rate (1,000). make means to file more readily and eafily away, never flood out the tryal of a battail, but returned home into their own countrey. Having thus put life as it were again into his men by this one expedition and exploit (a matter of no consequence to the total adventure of his whole estate) he retired himself to The falonica. The Punick war was not atchieved and brought to an end io happily and in so good a time for the Romans (who otherwise should have warred at once both against the Carthaginians and Philip) but it fell out as well and in as fit a feafon, that Philip was now vanquished; just against the time that Antiochiu in Syria prepared to levy war against them. For bendes that the serice was much more easily managed against them single and apart, than it would have been if they had banded both at once, and brought their forces together, it chanced also that Spain about the very L

tame instant brake out to a tumultuous insurrection.

Antiochus being returned to Antioch there to winter, after he had the summer before brought under his subjection all the Citics belonging to Prolomans, within the country of * Cale-Small was yet never the more at quiet, and mindful ofpeace afterwards. For when he had aftembleda puissant power both of Land and also of Sea-forces, and purposed to employ the whole strength of his realm, he sent afore by Land in the beginning of the spring, his two sons Ardnes and Mithridates with a mighty army, commanding them to attend him at Sardis: himself in person set forth a Voyage by Sea, with a fleet of a hundred fail of covert ships with decks and hatches, befides two hundred lighter Veffels, as Galions and Brigantins, purposing at one time to assay all the Cities in * Celicia and Caria, coasting along the Sea fide, which were within the Dominion of M Ptolomaus: and withalto aid Philip as well with shipping as souldiers, for as yet Philip was not utterly subdued, nor the war with him brought to a final end. Many brave and worthy exploits enterprised the Rhodians both by Sea and Land, in their loyalty and faithfulnes to the Romans, and for the safeguard and desence of all the Greekish Nation. But no one thing shewedtheir magnificence more than this, that being nothing terrified at that time with such a World of wars threatned against them, they sent Embassadors to the King, to let him underst and, that is he said forward and flayed not his Armado, they would encounter him at the Bay of Nephelis (which is a promontory or Cape of Cilicia, renowned for the ancient league of the Athenians,) And this they did, not upon any hatred they bare to his person, but to impeach him only for coming to join with Philip, thereby to hinder the Romans in their good course of setting Greece at liberry. N At the same time Antiochus was busied in the siege and assault of Coracesium, against which he had placed all ordnance and engins of battery: for he was already mafter of the Cities of Zephyrium, Soli, * Aphrodisias and * Corycus, and having doubled the point of * Anemurium (a Cape of forland also of Cilicia) he had won likewise the City of * Selinus. All these, and many other forts of that coast being yeelded unto him by composition, either for fear or willingly, without any assault. only Coracesium shut their gates against him, and staid his progress beyond his expectation. There the Embassadors of the Rhodians had audience. And albeit that embassie was such as might have fet a King into a fit of choler and chafed his bloud, yet he tempred his anger, and made answer that he would fend his Embassadors to Rhodes, and give them in charge to renew the ancient rights and privileges as well of his own as of his ancestours with that City and State, (and to will them not to fland in lear of the Kings coming, for that neither they nor any allies of theirs should sustain harm or damage by him. For it was no part of his meaning to infrirge and break the amity which he had with the Romans, as it may appear as well by his late emballie fent unro them, as also by the honorable decrees and aniwers made by the Senat and fent unto For it fortuned that even then the Embassadors of King Antiochus were returned from Pome, having had a triendly audience there, and a gracious dispatch, according as the time re-

A quited: for as year the iffue of the war against Philip was uncertain. Whiles the Kings Embaffadors delivered these points in the assembly of the Rhodians, there arrived a post with news, that the war was ended by means of a victory atchieved by the Romans against Philip at Cynoscephale, Theiexidings being once heard, the Rhodians past all fear now of Philip were of advice to meet Anisobus at fea with their navy. For they had a fecond care befides which they neglected not, to maintain the liberty of those allied Cities pertaining to King Ptolomy, against which war was mena ed from Antigebus. Some they succoured with sending aideunto them, and others by forecast and giving them warning of the designments and enterprises of their enemies: whereby they were a caute, that the Caunii, Myndii, they of Halicarnaffus and Samos enjoyed fill their entire freedom. But needless it is for me, to profecute all the occurrents and affairs that passed B in these parts, considering how I shall have enough to do, and hardly be able to set down and go though with those that properly concern the Roman war. At the fame time also King The commend Analus was brought fick from Thebes to Pergamus, and there departed this world in the feven- dation of King teenth year of his age, when hehad reigned forty four. This man was behonden to fortune for Attalus. nothing elie but riches, that might commend him to the hope of a kingdom. He employed the same with such wildome and magnificence, that first in his own conceit, and afterwards in the judgment of others, he was not thought unworthy to be a King. Afterwards when he had vanquilhed in one battell the Gauls (a nation at that time newly arrived in Asia, and therefore the more dread and terrible) he took upon him to be filled King, and ever after carried a mind answerable to the grandeur and Majesty of that name. His own subjects he governed with singular Ciuli.e. To his alies he shewed himself most fatt and faithfull. His triends he used with all kindnels and bounty, A wife and four children he had living when himself diec: and left his kingdom folure and well ferled, that the possession thereof continued firm to the third distent and generation after him.

Whiles things flood thus in Afia, Greece, and Macedony, and the war with Philip scarcely ended, or at leastwife peace not fully concluded, there arole a mighty war in the Province of Spain beyond the river Iberus. M. Helvius at that time was governorthere, who by his letters advertifed the Senat, That Colcas and Luscinus, two Princes in those parts, were gone out, and had taken arms; that with Coleas there banded seventeen towns, and with Luscinus the strong and puissant Cities Cardo and Bardo; that the whole sea coast, which hitherto by open re-D volt shewed not their rebellious heart, would doubtless upon the commotion of those their neighbours, make likewile an infurrection together with them. After these letters were read by M. Sergius the Prator, who had the jurisdiction between Citizens and aliens, the LL, of the Senat ordained), that after the election of new Prators was past, he to whole lot the government of Spain fell, should propose unto the Senat in all convenient speed as touching the war in

About that very time the Confuls repaired to Rome (from their Provinces) who held an affemby of the Senat in the Temple of Bellona: and when they demanded triumph in confideration of their good fervice, and happy exploits in war atchieved : C. Atinius Labeo and C. Urfanius Tribunes of the Commons required, That the Confuls should speak severally by themselves con-E ceming triumph: for inffer them they would not joyntly to propound that thing in the house, to the end, that equal and lemblable honour should not be conferred upon perions of unlike quality, worth, and defert. And when Minutius interred again and laid, That the Province of Italy tell unto them both in one commission, and Cornelius seconded him withall, averring, That he and his companion in government had managed all their affairs with one mind by common councill and advice; that the Boians who passed over the river Poagainst him for to succour the Insubrians, and Canomans, were forced to turn back again to defend their own, by reason that the other Conful his Collegue made such waste and pillage in their fields and villages. The Tribunes confessed that Cornelius indeed had atchieved to worthy exploits in war, that there was no more doubt to be made of his triumph, than of rendring praise and thanks to the immortall Fgods: but neither he nor any other Citizen flood ever at any time in such grace, favour, and credit, that having obtained the honour of a triumph for himself, he should impart that glory unto his Collegue and fellow, if he were so shameless as to crave it. As for Q. Minutius (say they) he made tome fleight skirmishes with the Ligurians not worth the talking of: mary in France he loli, a good number of his fouldiers. And with that they named T. Juventius and Cneus the brother of Labeo, two Colonels of Tribunes of the camp, who were sain in an unfortunate battel, with many a brave and hardy man befides, as well Citizens as allies. And to conclude, there were tome few towns and villages colourably yielded and rendred up for the time, without any affurance and security. These junglings and debates between the Consuls and the Tribunes continued for two daies: but in the end, the Confuls being overcome with the importunity of the Tribunes, were content to propose the matter diffinelly by themselves. And withthe generall voice and accord of all, a triumph was decreed for Cn. Cornelius. The Placentins also and men of Cremona, were agreet cause that this Consul found more favour; by reason that they gave thanks, and reported on his behalf, that they were delivered by his good means from the fiege, yea, and most of them recovered from servitude out of the hands of their enemies, Q. Minutius having phy casta proffer and made an assay of proposing his cause to the Senat, seeing them wholly banded and let organish him, faid aloud, That in maintenance of Copiular authority, and by vertue of that place, yea, and according to the good examples of divers noble and renowned personages, he we would triumph, and aske them no leave, in the mount Allan, But Cn, Cornelius whiles he was fill in office triumphed over the Infubrians and Canomans, He carried in pomp before him a number of military enfigns: he caused great store of French spoil and pillage to pais in a pageant upon charriots taken from the enemies. Many Noblemen of France were led in a flew before his own triumphant chariot: among whom (as iome write) was Amilear General of the Carthaginans. But above all others, the goodlieft fight was, a number of Coloners and inhabitants of Cremma and Placentia, who with boness or caps of liberty on their heads followed his chariot, Hebare that they were in triumph 237500 Sefferces, 7900 Bigats of filver coin, He divided among his horicmensevenby him treed to Shim treed to each Centurion trebble to much, Q. The honour of this triumph as it was less in regard of the place, and of the name that went of his acts as also because all men knew full well, that the charges went not out of the common Cheft or Camber of the City: to for number of enfigus, of chariots and (poils gained from the enemies, it was in manner equal and comparable to the other. And of money he brought well-near as much as Connelius: for or brais coin he had in shew 25,4000 Asses, of filver coin in Bigat peeces 53200, To common fouldiers or footmen, to Centurions and horsemen, he gate as much as his College, After this triumph there was a generall assembly held for the election of Magistrats : wherein were created Confuls, L. Furius Purpurio, and M. Claudius Marcellus. The next day after thele Preros were chosen, Q.F. abius Burco, T. Sem pronius Longus, Q. Minutius Thermus, M. Acilius Glabria,L.

Apuftius Fullo and C. Lalius. In the end of that former year, letters came from T. Quintius with this intelligence, That he had fought in battell ranged with King Philip within Theffulr, where the army of the enemies was defeated and put to rour. These letters were fifth read in the Senat by Sergins the Prator, and then by order from the LL, in the publike affembly of the people. For this happy fucces, it was ordained, That there should be solemn processions for five daies. Shortly after there arrived Embassadors both from T. Quinturs, and also from the King. The Macedonian Embassadors were brought without the City to the place or hamlet called Villa publica, where they were appointed their lodging, rich presents were given them, and allowed they were the charges for themselves and their train. In the Temple of Bellong the Senat was affembled, where there passed not many words by reason that the Macedonians promited, That the King should perform whatsover the L Senat would fet down, So (according to the ancient cuflome and manner) there were appointed ten Committees or Delegats, by whore advice and counsell T. Quintius the Generall, wasto present and tender unto Philip, articles and conditions of peace: provided, that in the said number of Delegats, P. Sulpitius and P. Valerius should be comprised by name; who when they were Confuls governed the Province of Macedony. The same day, the Cossans demanded and made suit, That the number of their Coloners of inhabitants might be augmented: whereupon an order was granted, That there should be a thousand new enrolled so the former: with this proviso, that in this number none of them should be matriculated, who after the Consulship of P. Sulpitus and P. Villius had been enemies to the people of Rome. The Roman games and plaies were that year exhibited as well in the Circus as upon the flage in the Theatre, by the Adiles Curule L.Cor- M nelins Scipio, and Cn. Manlius Volfo: which, as they were fet out with more state and magnificence : than ever before, o they were beheld with more joy, contentment, and pleasure, in regard that all things fell out to fortunatly in the wars : and they were renewed and represented all thrice over, As for the plaies called Plebeiisthey were fet forth no less than seven times one after another, Acilius Glabric and C. Lalius exhibited thole passimes: who also of their filver that arose of fines and forceitures, caused three cast images of brais to be made, and erected them to the honour of Gr res. Liber, and * Libera.

Now when L. Furius and M. Claud us Marcellus were entred into their Magistracy, and after question made concerning their Provinces, the senat passed a decree, That both of them joyntly should govern Italy; they requested that they might cast lots for Macedony and Italy together, N Marcellus more delirous of the twain of the Province of Macedony, alledged, that the pescewas not found but counterfeit, pretended, and deceitfull; and that the King would take arms and war again, incase the army were withdrawn from thence: by which words he put the LL, of the Senat into a deepstudy and suspence, what to do, or to think of it. And haply the Consushad obtained their request, but that Q. Martius Rex, and C. Atinins Labeo, two Tribunes of the Commons, protested, that they would oppose themselves and cross it by their negative voice, unless they might first propose unto the people to know, Whether their will and pleasure was to entertain peace with King Philip, or no? This bill being preferred and read in the Capitoll beforethe people, was granted, and all the tribes or wards, even five and thirty, every one gave their affir mative voice, His rogaffis [i.e. So be it as ye demanded.] And to the end, that all men might have 0 more cause to rejoyce that peacewas confirmed with Macedony, there came heavy news out of Spain, and letters were divulged abroad containing thus much, That C. Sempronius Tuditamuthe Vice-Prator in the hither Province of Spain, was vanquished in battell, that his army was difcomfitted and put to flight, and divers men of name and mark flain. That Tuditanus himself wascarried forth of the conflict grievously wounded, and soon after died. The Province of Italy was af figned for both the Confuls with those two legions which the former Confuls had in charge and

A order granted, that they should levy and enroll four new legions, whereof two should be sent whither it pleased the Senatto appoint, And T. Quintius Flamininus was commanded to rule his Province Rill with the same army, and his Commission of longer government was renewed. After this, the Prætors cast lots for the parting of their Provinces. L. Apustius Fullo obtained the jurifdiction of the Citizens of Rome, and M. Acilius Glabreo was L. Chief Juftice between Citizens and forrainers, Q. Fabius Buteo had the government of the base or farther Spain, and Q. Minutius Thermus of the higher or hither Spain. To C. Lalius fell Sicily, and Sardinia to T. Sempronius Lonous. And ordained it was, that unto Q. Fabins Buteo, and Q. Minutius, to whom the rule of the Provinces in Span befell, the Confuls should out of those four legions which they had enrolled. deliver one legion speece, which they thought good and of allies and of the Latine nation, four B thouland footmen befides, and three hundred horiemen to either of them. And these Prators were enjoyeed to go to their charges with all speed possible.

The war in Spain began aftefh, in the fifth after that the former together with the Punick war was ended. But before that these Prators went forth to this war (which may be counted as it were new, in regard that the Spaniards now first, and never before, warred in their own proper name, without either leader or army of Carthage) and before that the Confuls themselves departedout of the City, order was given, that according to the old custome they should provide for the prodigious tokens that were reported .L. Julius as he rode on hor eback into the Sabins country, was both himself and his horse under him strucken dead with lightning. The temple of Feronia in the territory of Capena, was likewise smitten and blasted from heaven. At the Temple of C. Moneta, the Iron heads of two ipears were fent to burn on a light fire, A Wolfhapned to enter into the City at the gate Efquilina and ranthrough the most populous part thereof as far as unto the market place, and so forward to the Tuscan freet, and from thence through the Melium, and pasfed forth again at the gate Capena untouched; and in manner without taking any harm.

These prodigious signs were purged by the sacrifices of greater beasts. At the same time Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, who had governed the Province of high Spain before Tuditanus, entred the City by order from the Senat in a kind of triumph, and carried before him in pomp 1515 pound weight of gold: of filver likewise in bullion 2000 o pound weight: and in coin 34550 deniers. L. Startinius from the nether Spain, brought into the treatury 50000 pound weight of filver, and never pretended any hope that he had to obtain a triumph. Moreover, of the prizes and spoiles D won from the enemies, hecaused two arches to be erected in the beast market, even before the Temple of Fortune, and the goddess Matura: and one besides in the grand Cirque or shew-place. And upon these arches he set up guilded Statues. These were all the affairs, to speak of that passed this winter-feafon.

There wintered at that time in Athens Quintius, And among many other futers that came unto him with their petitions, the Bootians exhibited a request, and obtained the same, to wit, that as many of their nation as had lerved in the warsunder Philip, might be reflored and fent home again unto them : which was easily granted by Quinting, not so much, for that he thought them worthy of that favour, but because he was to win the love and affections of the States in Greece unto the Roman name, now especially that he had some doubt of King Antiochus. They were Enotdelivered to toon, but feen it was, how little the Bootians would be beholding to him for it. For they sent presently unto Philip, and gave him thanks for the rendring of those men, as if they had been delivered by him, and not by Quintim and the Romans. And in their next affembly generall for their folemn election, they chose one Barcillas for their Bootarches, or Lord governour of Bantia; for no other reason, but because he had been the Colonell of those Bootians that bare arms for the King; but they passed by Zeusippus, Pesistratus, and others, that had perswaded to make a league with the Romans. This wrought discontentment in these persons for the present, and sear for the time to come. For thus they reasoned with themselves, If they would do thus while the Roman army lay encamped near to their gates, what should become of them when the Romans were departed into Italy, and whiles Philip was so near at hand to affift those Fthat fided with him, and to annoy those of the adverse part and faction? Therefore they complotted and concluded in the end to make away Barcillas, the head of the Kings bend, whiles the Roman forces were at hand. And to chusing a convenient and fit opportunity for their purpose, at what time as he returned homeward drunkfrom a publike folemn featt, accompanied with certampleafant and effeminat persons, who to make sport and mirth had been at that great seast ; he was torelaied and befet with fix armed men, whereof three were Italians, and three Ætolians, and formurdered. His train that attended him ran away, and raifed hue and cry, and called for help. Much trouble and hurly-burly there was throughout the City, much running to and fro with torch-light. But they that did the deed were escaped out at the next gate. In the morning betimes the people in great number assembled in the Theater, being called together by the voice G of the common Beadle, as if the murderers had been detected. Openly it was in every mans mouth, that he was killed by his own retinue, even those filthy wanton persons that he had about him: but secretly in their minds they deemed Zeusippus the author of the murther. For the prefent it was thought good to apprehend them that were in his train, and that they should be examined. Whiles fearch was made for them, Zeusippus came forth into the affembly, with the like intent to avert all suspition of crime from himself, saying, that men were much deceived to think that so horrible and strange a murder was committed by such weaklings & persons as they were.

The three and thirtieth Book of T. Livius. This he argued and discoursed by many likelihoods and probabilities to the same effect; by which H means some were verily perswaded, that if himself had been guilty of the fact, he would never have offered and presented himself in the face of the affembly, or broached any words at all of the murder, especially when no man urged him thereto. Others there were again, who madeno doubt but by this impudent face, his drift was to prevent an accusation, and to turn away allus pitten from himself. The innocent and guiltiess creatures within a while after being examined upon the rack and tortured, knowing what was the general opinion and conceit of men madetheir nie of the same forto bolt out and reveal the fact; and fo they named Zeufppus and Piffirms for the principals; without any prefumption or light given how they should seem to cometo the knowledge of anything. Howbeit Zen (appus accompanied with one Stratonidas) fled by night to Tanagra, fearing the remorfe and prick of his own confeience more than the appeaching and information of those perions who neither were party not privy to any thing, But Piffratus making no regard of these accusers, remained still at Thebes. Now had Zeussppus one bondslave, (whole hand was in all this action, and had been a contrier between) whom Pififtratus feared that he would bewray him, and by that very fear caused him to open and declare the whole matter. He dispatched therefore his letters unto Zeusippus, advising him to rid that slave out of the way, who was privy to their dealing; advertising him, that in his conceit he was not to meet to concealthe thing now done, as he was a fit instrument at the time to execute the same. The bearer of these letters he straightly charged to deliver them unto Zeusi ppus immediatly with all speed, Burke, because he could not spy a convenient time to meet with him himself, gave the letters to the very fame flave, whom he supposed to be most fast and trusty to his Master: adding moreover, and say. K ing, That they came from Pififtratus unto Zeusippus, and imported matter of great consequence. The bond flave promifed to deliver them incontinently. but being touched in conscience, he was so bold as to break them open; and when he had read them through, he fled back in great tear to Thebes (where he bewrayed Pififtratus.) Zeusippus troubled in spirit for the flight of his bondman, retired himself to Athens, supposing it a place of more security to live in, as a banished man, As for Pififtratus, after he had been divers times examined upon the rack, was put to death in the end. Thismurder wondrously estranged the Thebans and Becotians and set their hearts against the Romans; infomuch as they hated and detefted them to death, taking great indignation that Zenf.ppm (a principall and thief personage of their nation) had committed so soul and hainous a sal.

To rebell in open terms, they had neither sorce sufficient to maintain them, nor a principall head I. to direct and lead them. Whereupon they fell to that which is next coufin to plain war, evento thieving and robbing by the high waies side, in such fort, as they surprized as well some souldiers who lodged near unto them, and were their guests, as others that wandred and ranged abroad from the garrifons in wintertime, and travelled about their affairs, who otherwhiles were caught up by the way, and came short home. Some passengers were killed in the port-rode-waies, by those that lay in wait for them in notorious thievish corners: others were trained and led deceitfully through by-lanes into desert places, there to take up their innes and lodging, and then were murdred. At length they plaid these pranks not only of malice unto them but also forgreedy desire of booty and spoil, by reason that commonly these waisaring men went about their trade and merchandise, and therefore had some charge about them, and carried silver in their belts, M Now when as at first there were some out of the way, and every day more than other many men missing, and no manknew what was become of them, all * Bastia began to have an ill name, and the souldiers were more affraid to travell there, than in the enemies country. Then Quintins fent certain Embassadors to all the Cities for to make complaint of these robberies and enormities. Many footmen there were found dead about the mear or lake * Copais, where their carkafles were raked forth of the mud and mire, and drawn out of the standing water, tied and sasted as they were to heavy flones or some great vessels, that by their poisethey might be plunged, and fink to the bottom. Many such like outrages were found to have been committed at Acraphea and Coronea, Quintius at the first demanded to have the offendors delivered unto him, and for five hundred fouldiers (for fo many were caught up by the way and murdred) he enjoyned the Bao- N tians to make payment of five hundred talents of filver. But the Cities would do neither theore nor the other: only they paid with bare words, and excused themselves in that nothing had been done by publike warrant or counsell from the State. Whereupon the Embassadors were sent to Athem; and into Achea, to make protestation unto their allies, that they would pursue the Bootians with open war, upon good ground and just cause offered. And so after he had given commandment unto P. Claudius to go unto Acraphea with one part of his forces, himself with the other let him down about Coronea, and planted fiege unto it. But first the territory was laid waste, all the way as the two armies marched from Elatia in divers quarters. The Bootians plagued with these losses and calamities, seeing nothing but sear and slight in every place, sent their Embassizdors unto him: but when they could not be admitted into the camp, the Athaans and the Athenians were 0 fain to come with them. The Achaans were of greater credit, to entreat in their behalf: for unless they might obtain pardon and peace for the Bootians, they determined also to enter into the quarrel, and to make war themselves. By whose mediation the Bootians had access unto the Roman Generall, and audience granted. Who after they were enjoyeed to deliver up the offenders and malefactors to Justice, and to pay thirty talents for amends and fatisfaction, obtained peace:

After some few daies, the ten Delegats or Committees from Rome were arrived, by whose advice and counfell peace was articled and capitulated with King Philip, upon these conditions: Imprimis, That all the Greek Ciries, as we'l in Europe as in Afia, should enjoy their liberty, and live under their own laws. Item, That Philip (hould withdraw his garrifons out of as many of them as had been in subjection under him. Liem. That he do the like by those which were in Affecto wit, Euromos, Pedasa, Bargylla, Iassus, Myring, Abydus, Thassus, and Perinthus: all which, the Romans required to befree. As concerning the liberty and freedom of the Cyani, it was covenanted, That Quintins should write his letters to Printing the King of Bithynians, giving him to underfrand the advice and pleature of the Senat, and the ten Delegats aforesaid. Item, That Philip render all the prisoners and fugitive traitors to the Romans, and yield up all the covered ships with is hatches: and over and besides, one huge royall Galliace or Argosey, which by reason of the exceeding bigness was unweildy and of little use, and was directed with fixteen banks of oars on a fide, Item, That he should not have above five hundred men in arms, nor one Elephant at all, Item, That he should not war (but by leave and permission of the Senat) without the marches of Macedary. Item, That he payunto the people of Rome a thouland talents, the one half in hand, and the other at ten payments, within the term of ten years. Valerius Antias writeth moreover, that there was imposed upon him a tribute of four thousand pound weight of filver yearly, for ten years: and befides, twenty thousand pound weight presently. The same author faith, that expressly it was capitulated, that Philip should not war at all with Eumenesthe son of Attalus, who was newly come to the crown. For the affurance of these covenants, there were received hostages, and a-Cmongst them Demetrius King Philip his son. Valerius Antias hath written moreover, that the Mand Leina, and certain Elephants were given in pure gift to Attalus in his ablence: and that upon the Rhodians was bestowed Stratonicea, a City in Caria, with other Cities also which Philip had possessed. To conclude, that the Athenians received of free gift these Isles following to wit, Paros, Imbros, Delos, and Scyros. When all the States of Greece approved and thought well of this peace, only the Etolians lecretly muttered & found fault with this order fet down by ten Delegats abovelaid giving out, that they were but bare letters and vain words, shadowed with a counterfeit apparance of liberty. For

to what end, fay they, should some Cities be delivered to the Romans, and those not named ? others again be named, and yet order taken, that they without delivery should be free? but only D for this purpole, that those Cities which are in Asia should be set free, because they be far off and therefore in more fatery; but those that are in Greece, being not precisely named, should be seifed upon by them, to wit, Corinth, Chalcis, and Oreum, with Eretrias, and Demetrias. And to fav a truth, this finding fault of theirs was not altogether frivolous, and without occasion given: for some doubt there was of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias : because in the order and act of the Senat, by vertue whereof those ten Delegats aforesaid were sent from the City, all other Cities of Asia and of Greece were doubtless in plain terms freed: but as touching thesethree before named, the Delegats had in commission to take order, as they should see it stand with the good of the Common-wealth, according to their own judgment and discretion, and the trust that was committed unto them. For well they wift that King Antiochus would pass over into Europe, so " Eloon as ever he could bring his affairs about to his mind, and unwilling they were on any hand, that these Cities so commodious for his designs, should lie open and ready to his hand for to seize upon at his pleasure, So Quintius together with the ten Delegats sailed from Elatia to Anticyra, and from thence to Corine b, where they held their Councill and consulted of their affairs. Quintius would very often say unto them, That all Greece might be delivered and set at liberty, if they could restrain the tongues of the Æcolians: if they were willing that their good affection should be deemed fincere, and the majefty of the Roman name maintained among all: finally, if they would pretend and make it known abroad, that they were passed the seas to set Greece free, and not after they had shaken off the seignory of Philip, to translate it unto themselves. The other again contradicted nothing as touching the liberty of those Cities: howbeit, they made remon-Filtrance, that it was the fafer course for them, to remain awhile under the protection and safegard of the Romans than that instead of Philip they should receive Antiochus for their Lord. In conclusion decreed it was, That Corinth should be rendred to the Acharans, but yet so, that there should be a Roman garrison in the highest quarter of the City called Acrocorinthus. Item, That Chalcis and Demetrias should be retained still, untill such time as they were no more in fear and

doubt of Antiochus.

Now approached the ordinary solemnity of the Islhmian games, unto which at all times usinally there was great recourse of people, as well in regard of the naturall disposition of that nation (desirous to see such sports and passimes, wherein was represented the triall of masteries in all kind of arts, in all seats either of mere strengthor of agility and nimbleness of the body) as also so in respect of the commodious seat of the place: whereunto from all parts of Greece they repaired thinter by two divers and sundry seas. But being amused in expectation to know what the other of Greece, and what their own particular condition would be hereaster, divers men not only devised secretly with themselves, but also gave out and whispered in their speech and talk. Well, the Romans were set to behold this solemnity: and the publise Crier with a trumpetter went forth into the midst of the Cirque or shew-place, from whence the manner was to proclaime the sports and games aforesaid in a solemn section of words: and after he had by sound of trumpetter wand made

made filence, he pronounced with a loud vice in this manner, "Be it known unto all men, that the H "Senat of Rome, and T. Quinting the General of their army, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, do ordain, that the Corinthians, the Phocenfians, and the Locrenfians, be all free, and delivered frow all taxes what soever, and to live according to their own laws, Item, That the Isle Eul aa, the Magnefians, Thefialians, Perrhæbians, Acheans, and Phthiots do enjoy the "like freedom and immunity. And consequently herehearied all the nations which had been in " subjection to Philip. Upon this proclamation of the beadle there was such joy, that men were not able to conceive and comprehend it. Every man could hardly beleeve that he had heard the thing which he so wished and defired afore to hear: one looked upon another wondfing at the matter, as if it had been a vain vision or illusion of some dream: and well they trusted not their own ears in hearing that which particularly concerned every one, but enquired of them that flood next 1 unto them. The Crier was called back again: such a desire had each one not only to hear the glad tidings, but also to behold the happy meffenger of this their liberty: and no remedy there was, but once again he must publish and pronounce the same. Now when their joy was once confirmed they fet up fuch a shout, and followed it so with clapping of hands, redoubling the same so often, as evidently it appeared, how there is no earthly good in the world more pleasing and welcome unto a multitude than is liberty. After this, the games were performed in such halte, that neither the mind of any man was bent to intend, nor the eye busied to behold the fight thereof, so wholly had that one joy possessed them and forestalled the sence of all other pleasures and delights. But when the passimes were once ended, they all in manner ran apace to the Roman Generall, infach fort, that his person was insome danger of the multitude, crowding so hard upon him alone, for k defire they had to come unto him, to touch his right hand, and to cast garlands of flowers and labels of sundry colours upon him: but being a man fast upon three and thirty years of age, both the vigour of youth, and also the joy that he took for the accomplishment of so glorious anach, afforded himfirength enough to abide the prefs of the people, This gladness of all men shewed it fell not only for the present, but continued also for many daies space, entertained not only in thankful minds, but expressed also in joyful discourses: namely, "That there was one nation yet in "the world, which at their proper cost and charges, with their own pain and perill made war for "the freedom of others : who afforded this favour and pleasure not to the neighbours and bor-" berers only, or to those that were joyned near to them in the continent and firm land, but pas-"fed over the leas; to the end, that throughout the whole world there should be no unjust and I "tyrannicall government, but in all places, right, reason, and law, might prevail most and carry "greatest sway Lo, how by the only voice of one Beadle all the Cities of Greece and Asia areset "free. To conceive and enterprise so great a thing proceedeth from a brave mind and noble heart "but to effect the same is a fingular vertue and rare felicity.

This done, Quintius and the ten Delegats gave audience to the embassages of divers Kings and Princes, Nations and States, And first of all others were the Embassadors of King Antiochin Called in : who nied the same speech in manner that they had at Rome, vanting great words without any ground and substance of credit. But answer was returned unto them, not coverily by way of circumstance as aforetime (when Philip was on foot and things stood doubtfull) but openly in plain terms. Imprimis, That Antioches must quit and abandon all the Cities of Asia, which belon-M ged at any time either to King Philip or King Ptolomeus, Item, That he meddle not with any free City or State, and especially with those of Greece: but above all, warned he was and forbidden, either to pals over himself, or to fend any forces into Europe. After the Kings Embaffadors were licensed to depart, all the nations and states had a generall session and meeting together, which was the sooner dispatched, for that in the decrees of the ten Delegats all the Cities and States were pronounced by name. Unto the Orestians (a people in Macedony) for that they revoked first from the King, their own lands and priviledges were restored. The Magnesians, the Perrhabians and Dolopians were likewise declared free. Unto the people of The faly over and above the grant of their liberty, the Phthiotian Achaens were annexed, excepting the City of Theber in Philia and Pharfalus. As for the Etolians who required, that according to covenant Pharfalus N and Leneas should be rendred unto them, they were put over unto the Senat, But they awarded them the Phocenies and Locrenies, with other appurtenances adjoyned before by vertue of the decree, Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea (which also is a City of Peloponnesus) were rendred unto the Achaans, Moreover, these ten Delegats gave Oreum and Eretria unto Eumenes the son of Attalus but by reason that Quintius would not agree thereto, the matter was referred over to the Senat for to be decided : and the Senat granted freedom unto these Cities, together with Cariffus. Unto Plearatus were freely given Lingus and Parthennus, which were two nations in * Illyritum, and had been both subject to Philip. It was ordained also, that Aminander should hold those Castles still, which during the wars he had won from Philip. When the assembly was dissolved, the ten Delegats having divided between themselves their severall charges, departed every man to 0 fet free the Cities of their particular regions and quarters, P. Lentulus to Bargylla, L. Stertinius to Hephafra, Thaffus, and other Cities of Thracia; P. Villius and L. Terenius toward King Amiochus; and Cn. Cornelius toward Philip. Unto whom after Cornelius had declared his Commission concerning some smaller matters, and with all demanded of him, Whether he could with patience abide to hear counsell not only profitable unto himself, but also necessary? The King made answer again and faid, That he would not only give him the hearing, but also yield him thanks besides,

A in case he would deliver ought unto him for his good. Whereupon he perswaded him earnestly. that foralmuch as he had obtained peace already, he should fend his Embassadors to Rome, to Crave league also and amity: to the end, that if Antiochus began to flir, he might not be thought to have attended and waited for some occasions and opportunities to make war. [This conference and communication with, Philip was at Temps in Theffaly.] And when he answered. That he would immediatly dispatch his Embassadors Cornelius came to Thermopyla, where a solemn Diet and affembly of all Greece is wont to be held upon certain fet daies, and thither refort great numbers of people. Which meeting is called Pylaicum: where he advised the Ætolians especially to persever constant and faithfull in the amity of the people of Rome. Some of the principall Ætolians seemed to complain between whiles, that the Romans were not so well affected to their nation after vi-B ctory, as they were in time of the war: but others, more sharply blamed and reproached them, yea, and upbraided them with this, That Philip could not have been vanquished, no, nor the Romans ever able fo much as to pals over into Greece, without the help of the Ætolians, Cornelius forbaseto make answer again to those points, for fear of farther wrangling and altercation; and promiled, that if they fent to Rome they should obtain any thing that was reason. Whereupon by his advice and approbation there were deputed Embassadors. This was the issue and end of the war with Philip.

Whiles these affairs thus passed in Greece, Macedony, and Asa, all Tuscan in manner was gone out and rifen up in arms, by occasion of a conspiracy of bondslaves. For to enquire into these troubles and to repress the same there was sent M. Acitius a Prator (who had the civil jurisdiction Chetween Citizens and aliens) with one of the two legions of Roman Citizens, Some of them, who were already affembled together and grown to an head, he overcame in fight: of whom many wereflain, and many taken prisoners. Others he scourged and round truffed up, hanging them on gybbets, even as many as were the principall and chief of the conspiracy : and others there were

whom he fent home again to their Masters.

Now the Confuls were gone into their Provinces. Marcellus fo foon as he was entred into the marches of the Bois, and had over-wearied his fouldiers with marching all day long, fare him downupon a certain rising of a hill, and there as he was encamping himself and his men. Corolamusa Prince or great Lord of the Boil with a mighty power affailed and charged him, and flew upon three thousand of his men. In which sudden and tumultuary skirmish, certain brave men D of mark were flain; among whom were T. Sempronius Gracchus, and M. Junius Syllanus two Colonels of the allies: also A. Ogninus and P. Claudius two Knight Marshals or Tribunes of the second legion. Howbeit the Romans strongly fortified their tents and defended them valiantly, which the enemies upon their fortunat victory had long affailed to no effect. And in the same flanding camp he continued certain daies, whiles he cured his fouldiers of their wounds, and recoveredtheir hearts after logreat a fright. The Boil (as they are a nation that of all things cannot endure any tedious delay of time) dispersed themselves into their towns and forts. Then Marcellus presently crossed the Pa, and led his army into the territory of Comum, where the Insubrians lay encamped after they had follicited and caused those of * Comum to take arms. The legions * Come. made no more ado, but gave them battell in the very way : and at the first encounter the enemies E charged them so hotly, that they forced the forefront of the battell to give ground. Which when Marcellus perceived, fearing left being once discovered they should be repulsed and discomfitted, he made a cohort. of Marsians to make head; and at once set forth all the troops of the Latine Cavalry against them. Their first and second charge both, mightily impeached and quailed the enemy, advancing forward luftily and preffing upon them in great fury: whereby the rest of the Roman army taking heart again and being encouraged, at the first received them mansully and made refistance only, but afterwards followed fiercely upon them: infomuch as the Gauls were able no longer to abide their violence, but turned their backs, took them to their heels, and ran away by heaps. Valerius Amias writeth, that in this battell there were forty thouland men flain and above, five hundred and seven military ensigns taken, with 432 chariots: besides many chains Folgold, whereof Claudius presented one (very massie above the rest and of great weight) unto Jupiter, which was hung up within the Temple in the Capitoll, as he writeth. The same day was the Camp of the Gauls forced and raniackt, and the town of Comum also within few daies taken by affault. Upon this there were eight and twenty boroughs or forts that fell away and revolted to the Conful, But the Hiltoriographers agree not upon this, Whether the Conful led his forces against the Insubrians first, or the Boians; and whether he rased out the dishonour of a former foil and defeat by a fortunate victory in this battell: or contrariwife, after a prosperous fight atchieved before Comum, he blotted and defaced the same with a shamefull overthrow received at the Boians hand.

During this variable and alternative fortune, L. Purpario the other Conful, marched into Gthe Boians Country through the tribe Sappinia. And when he was approached near to a Castle called * Mutilum, he feared left he should be enclosed and intercepted by the Boians and Ligu- * Mutiling. rians: whereupon heretired with his forces the same way that he came, and fetching a great com- Blando, Medipals about through the open country in safety and security, he came at length to his Collegue. 474. up in arms to pill and spoil, and were at that time retired unto the forrests and glins out of the H way, After this the army marched toward the Ligurians. The Bolans making full account to affail the Roman army at unawares, which marched without good regard of themselves, and not close together (for that their enemies seemed to be far off) followed after through the blind and covertforreits. But when they law that they could not overtake them, they fudderly all at once putfed over the Poin imail bothoms and punts, and after they had spoiled and pilled the Levians and Libuans, as they returned from thence with a booty raifed out of the country, they chanced in the utmost frontires of Liguria, to light upon the army of the Romans in their march, Sooner and with more eagermeis fell they to fight, than if they had appointed both time and place, and been prepared aforehand to firike a battell. There it well appeared, of what force angeristo prickon and theren mensipirits to conflict. For the Romans more greedy of murder and bloudfred, than of victory, fought fo, as they scarce left the enemies one messenger to carry the news oftheir unhappy overthrow. In regard of these exploits, upon the Confuls letters brought to Rome, order ned it was, that there should be a solemn procession and thanksgiving to the gods for three dake. Shortly after Marcellus came to Rome, unto whom was granted a triumph with great confent of the LL, of the Senat; and whiles he was in his Magistracy he triumphed over the Insubriansand Comians, leaving for his Collegue good hope likewise of a triumph, because himself (tosaya truth)in that nation fought but unfortunately, whereas his Collegue fped well enough, and hada lucky hand, Much spoil of the enemies was carried in a pomp, upon the Chariots that were taken and won from them. Many enfigns and banners were born in a flew, befides in money to the value of 320000 affes of brasscoin; and 234000 bigate peeces of filver. The footmen had 800affes K given them apeece every horseman and centurion had thrice as much. The same year King Astrochus, whiles he kept his winter at Ephesus, assaided to reduce all the

on, As tor * Smyrnaand * Lampfacus, they flood upon their freedom, and challenged it, Doubled it was, and great danger, that if he should let them go clear away so, some Cities in Lalis and Ionia would take after Smyrna, and others in Hellesponens tollow the example of Lampface. Therefore both himself sent from * Ephesus to lay siege unto Smyrna, and gave commandment, That the forces which were at Abydus (leaving only a small gatrison behind) should be leaded ! the fiege and affault of Lamplacus. And yet he threatned and terrified them not so much with forces and violence, but affaired them rather by fair means, fending to them his Embaffadors, to as, partly by flattering and gentle words wherewith he entertained them, and partly by mild reproof for their rashness and obstinacy, he endeavoured to put them in some hope, that shouls they should have what loever they defired : and then, both they themselves, and all others should evidently fee, that they had obtained their liberty by the especiall grace and favour of the King, and not usurped and gained it by occasion of some advantage and opportunity. To this they anfwered again, That Aniochus ought neither to marvell, nor be offended and displeased at them if they could not wel endure the hope which they had of freedom thus to be deferred from time to time. Then he departing from Ephefus in the beginning of the spring sailed unto Hellespontus with M his fleet, His land forces he transported over to Madytos a City in Chersonnesus, and joyned them to his frength by sea. And because they shut the gates upon him, he environed the town with armed men, and when he was at the point to give the affault, and to bend his engins of battery against the walls it was surrendred into his hands, Upon the like fear the Inhabitants also of other Cities in Chersonnesus yielded themselves. After this he came to * Lysimachia with his whole power, as well of land fouldiers as fea-fervitors. And finding it abandoned, ruinar, and lying (as it were) along, (for but few years before the Thracians had forced, sacked, and burnt it) he had a great defire to rear and set upright again the t noble and famous City, seated in so good and commodious a place. And therefore he took great care, and employed all his endeavour to re-edifie the walls, to re-build the edifices, to redeem and ranfom the Lyfimachians that were inflare-N ry, to seek out all those that were dispersed over Hedespontus and Chersonnesus, and gather them together, yea, and to enroll new inhabitants upon hope of gain and profit, and by all means possible to store and people the City again. And withall, because he would ease them of the searchey had of the Thracians, he went in person with the one half of his land-forces to waste and spoil about the repairing of the City. About this time as L. Cornelius (being fent by the Senat to compose the controverses and variance between the two Kings, Antiochus and Ptolomeus) abode at Selymbria; fo of the ten Commissioners abovesaid, P. Lennilus departed from Bargylla, P. Villius and L. Terentius from Thasfins and arrived all three at Lyfimachia: where L. Cornelius likewise met them from Selymbria; and 0 a few daies after King Antiochus being newly returned out of Thracia. The first meeting and falltation between him and the Commissioners was friendly and courteons, yea, and there passed to and fro afterwards divers amiable kindnesses and loving entertainments mutually. But when they entred once to parl of their Commission that they had in charge, and of the present State of Asia, then there was fretting and fuming and their bloud up. The Roman Agents fluck not to tell him to his face that all that he had done, fince he took the fea, and departed with his fleet out of Spita

A was displeasant unto the Senat, saying, "That they thought it meet, that all the Cities should be " restored unto King Ptolomens, which had been under his dominion. For as touching these "towns, which fometime Philip had been possessed of, and which do to but had surprized and "feized upon, taking his time and vantage, when Philip was employed an ther way in the Ro-" man wars, it was no reason, nor a thing tolerable, that the Romans sincure to lo many years "space, by land and sea endure so great toil, and hazard such perils; and miler dot ve bes in the end "togo away with the fruit and reward of all the service. But fer the cate, the tromans would "take no knowledge of his coming into Afia, as a matter impertinent unio them, can they dif-"semble also, that now he is come over into Europe with all his forces both for a bound of and "little wanteth of making open war upon the Romans? As for Asia, it appertained not at all to the people of Rome, no ther had a senter out into "enquire what Antiochus did in Afia, than Antiochus to learch into the " Rome in Italy. As concerning Ptolomens from whom they compain that he and trace and call " ties; he did them to understand that there was amity between him and Pr. lorague and they were " now in terms of knitting themselves shortly in nearer bonds of alliance and affinity. Neither "fought he the spoil of Philip, and to enrich himself by his adversity and misfortune : or passed 6-C ver into Europe against the Romans * * * But when he was vanquished once, all that e- Somewhat "ver he had, by right and law of war, became the possessions of Selencins, and so consequently (as wanting in the procession appetrained unto him. And during the time that his processions and accordance Latine. "hetook it) appertained unto him. And during the time, that his progenitors and predecessors, "were busied and troubled with other affairs, first Prolomeus catched at some things, and Philip "after at other, and so between them they usurped and seized upon other mens possessions, and "namely of certain places near and hard by in Thacia, which without all controversie belonged "unto Lysimachus. Forto reduce which into their ancient State, he was thither come, and now "was in hand to re-edifie Lysima: bia anew, lately destroyed by the violence of the Thracians, to "the end, that Seleucus his fon might hold it as the royall feat of his kingdom. Thus as they continued arguing and debating for certain daies, there ran a rumor, but without any certain author, D that King Ptolomeus was dead: whereupon they could grow to no conclusion of all their parties: yet they made femblance on both fides, that they heard nothing thereof. And as well L. Cornelius. who was fent in Embassage to both the Kings, Antiochus and Prolomeus, requested respite of some small time to confer with Prolomeus, to the end that himself might be arrived in Agypt, before any alteration were made in the new possession of that kingdom: as also Antiochus made reckoning, that Agypt would be his, if this good occasion then were presented unto him. Therefore having dimiffed the Romans, and left his fon Selenous behind him with all the land-forces for to finish the building again of Lysimechia which he had begun, himself with all his fleet failed to Ephesus: and having fent his Embassadors to Quintius to treat loberly about a league and smity, he coasted along Asa, and so arrived in * Lycia, And when he heard for certain at * Parara that Ptolomeus was * Brieggia, Gi-E yet living he gave over his purpose of failing into Egypt: yet nevertheless he shaped his course & rave. fet fail for Cyprus: and when he had doubled the point of Chelidonium, he staid awhile in * Pam- * Patera. phylia about the river * Eurymedon, by occasion of a mutiny among the mariners & oar-men. From of the North thence he weighed anchor, and when he was failed as far as a place called The heads of the river part is called *Sirus I there arole a gust and searful tempest, wherein he had like to have been cast away and Caremon, and drowned with all his fleet. Many of his ships were run aground, & many of them swallowed up of the reft Scandothe leasto as there escaped not one of them by swimming to land. A number of men there perished, "Zacath, Thenot of bale mariners only, and unknown common fouldiers, but also of his near and special friends. ye of Having rallied the dispersed reliques of this shipwrack, seeing he had no means and was not able * Sangro. to reach and gain Cyprus, he returned again to Seleucia, with an army nothing so puissant nor so Fwell furnished, as when he fet out in his voyage. There he commanded his ships to be haled aland, and laid up in their docks (for winter now approached) & himself took his journey to * An- * Antiochia, tiochia, there to lye all that winter time. And in these terms stood the affairs of the Kings.

At Rome, there were first instituted in this year three Triumvirs called Epulones, to wit, C. Licinius Lucullus, T. Romuleius (who was the man that put up the bill for their creation) and P.Porcins Lecca, And by a law in that behalf ordained, these Triumvirs were allowed as well as a Bishop, the long embrodered robe of purple. But in this year great debate & variance there was between the Questors or Treasurers of the City Q. Fabius Labeo & L. Aurelius of the one side, and all the Priests on the other side. These treasurers were at some fault for mony, because they were minded and appointed to make the last payment unto certain privat persons, for the loan-filver which Cthey had disbursed for the wars: these monies the Treasurers demanded of the Augurs and Bishops, to furnish out the said paiment; for that during the wars, they only had not been contributers in any levy. The Priests appealed to the Tribunes, and called for their lawfull favour : but all was in vain, and to they were forced to fatisfie all the arrerages for the years past, wherein they had paid nothing. This year there died two Bishops, and new were installed in their rooms. M. Marcellus the Conful entred in place of T. Sempronius Tuditanus, who deceased Prator in Spain; and L. Valerius instead of M. Cornelius Cethegus. Q. Fabius Maximus also an Augur died a very young man, before he had born any office of State: but for that year there was not substituted a H

After this, M. Marcellus the Confulheld the folemn affembly for the election of Confuls, And new Augur in his room. Confuls were created L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Portius Cato. Then were the Prators chosen, namely, C. Fabricius Luscimus, Cn. Atimius Labeo, C. Manlius Volso, Ap. Claudius Nero, P. Manlius, and P. Porcius Lecca. The Ædiles of the chair M. Fulvius Nobilior, and C. Flaminius divided a mong the people 1000000 Modii of wheat, at two affes a Modius. This flore of corn had the Sicilians brought to Kome for the honour of C. Flaminius and his father. And Flaminius was content that his companion in office (hould reap a full part of the thanks for this gratuity. The games called Roman were exhibited in most sumptuous manner, and thrice represented all over again, The Ediles of the Commons Cn. Domitius Andarbus, and C. Sempronius, who also was the high Pa-I rith-Priest, and Superintendent, called Cario Max. called in question many of the City Bailiffs that gathered their rents for pastures, judicially to answer upon their accounts before the people, Three of them were condemned, and of their filver railed upon their fines, they built the Temple of Fannus in the Mand. The Plebeian plaies were renewed for two daies, and a folemn publike feaft was celebrated in regard of them.

The same day that L. Valerius Flaceus and M. Porcius entred their office, they proposed unto the Senst concerning the government of the Provinces. And order was given by the LL, of the Councill, that for a fmuch as the war increased so in Spain, as required not only a Consular army, but a Conful also for the Leader; the Confuls should either agree between themselves for the government of the two Provinces, to wit, the hither Spain, and Italy, or elle to cast lots therefore: K that he whole hap it was to rule Spain, should have with him two legions, five thouland Litine allies, and five hundred horse; and likewise to have the conduct of a sleet of twenty gallies of war: that the other Conful should levy and enroll two legions; which were thought sufficient to defend and keep France in obedience, confidering the courages of the Infubrians and Boii, were well cooled and abated the last year. Cataby lot had the charge of Spain, and Valerius of Italy. Then the Prators cast lots for their Provinces. To C, Fabricius Luscinns fell the jurisdiction over the Citizens of Rome: to C. Atinius Labco over the strangers. C. Manlius Volfo governed Sicily, and Ap. Claudius Nero the farther Spain, M. Porcius Lecca was affigned to rule * Pifa, to theen he might be upon the back of the Ligurians, and P. Manlius was appointed as an affiftant and to adjutor to the Conful in the higher Spain. As for T. Quintius, his Commission was renewed for one year longer, in regard that not only Aniochus and the Atolians, but also Nabis the Lacedzmonian Tyrant, were doubted and suspected not to stand found to the Romans; and for him were fet out two legions: and if need were of any supply to make up the companies thereof the Confuls were enjoyeed to enroll new fouldiers, and to fend them over into Macedony. Alio Appar Claudius had a warrant to take up 2000 foot, and two hundred horse, over and above that legion which Q. Fabius had. The like number of fresh horse and foot was appointed for P. Manlius to be sent into the higher Spain: and the same legion was granted unto him, which was commanded by Minutius the Prater. Moreover, P. Porcius Lecca was to have the leading of two hundred footmen and fifty horse, drawn out of the Gauls army, for to lie in Hetruria about Pife. Last of all, in Sardinas P. Sempronius Longus continued fill in place of command, Thus the Provinces M being distributed, the Confuls before they departed out of the City, by advice and counfell of the Bishops performed the solemnity of the facred Spring which was vowed before by the Prator C. Cornelius Mammula, according to the mind of the Senat and the good liking of the people, in the year when Cn, Servilius and Cn, Flaminius were Confuls: and so it was celebrated one and twenty years after it was first vowed. Much about this time was C. Claudius Pulcher, the ion of Appin, elected Augur, and invested in that Sacerdotall dignity, in the place of Q. Fabius Maximus, who

When as men began now to marvell that there was so little account made of the war beginalready in Spain, there were letters brought from Q. Minutius with news, That he had fought a fortunate field before the town of Turba, with Budares and Befasides, two Spanish Generals and great N commanders: that he had flain twelve thousand enemies, taken Budares the Generall himself prifoner and that the rest were discomfitted and put to flight, Upon the reading of these letters, less fear there was of Spains from whence they looked for great wars.

After the return of the ten Delegats or Commissioners abovesaid, all the care was, and no talk else but about Antiochus and his affairs. These men, after they had declared fitth how their proceeding went with King Philip, and upon what conditions they had granted peace, informed and gave them to understand, "That there was as great a war behind from Antiochin: " that he had passed over the seas into Europe with a mighty Armado, and as puissant an army "for land service; and had not been averted another way by a vain hope to invade and seize "upon Egypt, which he conceived of a vainer bruit and rumor of Peolomy his death, all Greece O "would have been anon on a light fire, and up in arms. For the very Ætolians themselves, a na-"tion naturally of an unquiet spirit, and incensed besides against the Romans, would not have " fit still and been in rest. Moreover, there was another malady and mischief as dangerous, teled as it were within the ribs & in the very heart of Greece : to wit, Nabis, the tyrant at this prefent " of the Laced amonians only, but shortly, if he may be let alone, of all Greece; who for avarice "and cruelty is equall to all the famous and noted tyrants that ever were: and if he be suffered to

A "possess himself of Argos, and to hold it as a fortress to command all Peloponnesus, when the "Roman armies shall be once transported home again into Italy, infaith, Greece may make "Imall boast of being delivered from Philip: for this they shall be sure of at least, if of nothing "elfe, to have a near-neighbour tyrant, inflead of a King far off, for to be their Lord and imperi-" only to command them. The ancient Senators, hearing these intelligences from grave perions ofgood quality,, and who made report of all things not by hearfay, but upon their own knowledge, were of advice and resolved to have a good eye and regard with all speed unto Antiochus, confidering the King was passed already into Syria, whatioever the occasion was. But as touching the Tyrant, after they had disputed and debated the matter long time, Whether they had fufficient cause already to determine upon some finall conclusion, or should refer unto the wis-B dome and judgement of T. Quintins the managing of those affairs, therein to proceed and do according as he should deem it good and expedient for the Common-wealth; in fine, they permitted him to use his own discretion concerning the Lacedamonian Tyrant: supposing that thematter was not of such weight and consequence as to concern the main state of the wealpublike to matterially, whether it were haftened or protracted; but rather it behaved them to be advised and consider well, what Annibal and the Carthaginians would do; if haply the war with Antiochus were begun and once afoot. They [at Carthage] that fided with the adverse fa-Gion of Annibal, had ient divers and fundry letters unto the principall LL at Rome, every one privally to his friends to this effect. That there palled messengers and letters from Annibal to Antiochas, and that there were Embassadors again that secretly came from the King to him. And like Casthere be some beafts so wild and savage as never can be tamed; so the courage and spirit of that man was fuch- as might not possibly be dulced or appealed. For he daily complained that the City languished and grew feeble with idleness, and by sitting still and doing nothing, was overgrown as it were with mols, and unpossible it was to raise and slir it up but with sound of armour and weapons. These advertisements carried likelihood of truth and good credit with them. inregard of the late war, so fresh in memory, which healone began first, and managed to the last. Over and befides, he had provoked by a late act of his many great and mighty personages, who fer their heart's against him. The order and degree of Judges at that time have thief sway and foveraign authority in Carthage: in this respect principally, for that the same Judges were perpenuall. The goods, the honour and reputation, yea, and the life of every man ay in their Dhands. He that displeased one of that bench, war sure to have all the rest his enemies and to beupon him: and there never wanted one promoter or other to carry tales and give informationto these judges against a man, if they saw them ill affected once and bent against one. During the time of this imperious and tyrannicall rule of theirs, (for as their power was exceeding alimeasure, so they bare themselves therein as outragiously beyond the limits of civility) it was Amilal his hap to be Prætor; and by vertue of his place he fent for one of the treaturer, to come before him: but he made no reckoning of his authority, and refused to obey: or the said treasurer was one of the contrary side : and because from the deginerarisho e treasurers they mounted presently into the highest order of the Judges, therefore he arried with him an havty mind already, in regard of the high room that he was shortly to step into. A = bal you may be E fire took this as a great diffrace and indignity to his person, and therefore he tent a purievant orferjeant to attach the body of the Treasurer aforefaid: and prefently calling the people to a generall'affembly, he commanded him there to be presented: where he accused and blamed the party himlelf, no more than the whole order and degree of the Judges: through whole intolent pride and excessive power, both laws and Magistrats were nothing regarded but trodden underfoor. And perceiving that these words of his tickled the itching ears of the people, confidering allo that their proud demeanor prejudiced the liberty of the meanest persons: immediatly he published a law, and got it enacted, That those Judged should be chosen every year, and that thenceforth one and the same man might not be a Judge two years together. Butlook how much thank he had at the Commons hands for this act, so much he offended many of the great Finen and principals of the City. Another thing besides he did, whereby he purchased to himself the ill will of some private persons, in tendring the common good of the weal-publike. The sinah: es and revenues of the State, partly, through negligence went to decay, and partly, were shared out in dividends between some certain of the head Citizens and Magistrats: and more than that, the money which by way of tribute was to be paid yearly unto the Romans, was too short and not to be found: and it appeared, that a fore levy would be imposed upon private persons fhortly to make those payments out of their own purses. Annibal, after he had cast up the books, and made an estimate and just abstract how much the rents and revenues of the City amounted unto as well from customs by sea as land, and to what uses they were employed; and perceiving thereby what was defrayed in the ordinary charges of the State and what went a wrong way, and G was averted by these theeves to their own selves, he pronounced aloud in open audience of the whole affembly. That the arrerages should be gathered up and brought into the common Chest: and so privat persons might be discharged and eased of their impositions of tribute, and the Common-wealth would be rich enough and able to perform and furnish out the monies due to the people of Rome. And as he thus faid, so he was as good as his word, and executed it acfordingly. Then these caterpillers, who for certain years lived by robbery of the common treasure, and fed upon the fruits of the City, fared spightfully against Annibal, as if he had done them great wrong in taking their own goods from them, and not proceeded in juffice to wreft u out of their hands their floin substance: and in great malice and bitterness ceased not to provoke against Annibalthe Romans, who were ready enough of themselves to pick some quarrellto him. to feek occasion of hatred, and to find ann hole in his coat. Seipio Africanus for a long timegare the deafear unto them, and missiked the courie: tor he supposed it was not for the honour and majetty of the people of Rome to Subjectibe unto those imputations charged upon Annibal toentertain the spight and hatred of men, and to interess and infert publike authority withinthenivat factions of the Carthaginians; and not to be content to have vanquished Annibal in war, uniess they also took upon them the persons of accusers, and preferred a slanderous libell & bill of inditement, and iware thereto hilla vera. But at length they wrought and brought about, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage, who in the Senar there might charge Annital categories cally, with plotting and practifing with Antiochus for to wage war against them. And theiethre were addressed to this Embassie, C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Callen who being arrived there, caused it to be given out to as many as should demand the cause of their coming, (and all by instruction from the adversaries of Annibal) that their errand was to compose and end the debates between Mafaniffa King of the Numidians, and the Carthaginians. This was commonly divulged and beleeved for truth. But Annibal found them firaight and fmelt this jugling and was not ignorant that he was the only man that the Romans thotat, and howlover pea e was granted to the Carthaginians, yet they continued an endless and inexpiable war with him alone Hill. Whereupon he resolved to trame himself to give place to the time and yield unto fortune. And being furnished aforehand with all things requifit to take his flight, when he had of K purpole all the day long shewed himself in the publike place of assembly very formally, totumby all inspition of his intended resolution, to soon as it beganto be dark night, in his Citizens gown as he went a lday, and attended in the Hall, he gate him forth thraight to the City gate, accompanied only with two persons, and those not privy at all to his purpose and designment. And having found his horses ready in the place appointed, he mounted and rode apace that night until he was come to a certain quarter of the territory of Voca: and by the next morning, he passed between Acylla and Thapfus, and recovered a tower or fort of his own; where he was imbarked in a thip ready rigged and appointed with fail and our to take lea and away. Thus departed Annibal out of Affrick, lamenting more often the hard hap and calamity of his country, than of his own friends and kinsfolk. And the same day he fell with the Island Cercina: where the Canha-L ginians found in the rode certain hulks charged with merchandite: and when at his coming athore out of his thip, there came many running toward him for to fainte and welcome him this ther, he charged his own company, that if any asked concerning him, they should make answer, That he went upon an Embassage to Tyrus: but fearing lest any of their barks should disachor that night and make report at Thapfus or Acylla that he was feen in Cercina: he canfed a beafto be killed forta rince, and invited the Masters of the ships and all the Merchants to supper; and therewith commanded all the fails and cross fail-yards to be had out of the veffels to make thereof a large pavillion, that they might fit in the shade at their supper: for that, as it fell out, it was then midfummer. And as the time and fuch provision as they had, would give leave, he ferouta feelt and banker; he spared for no wine, and continued the merriment far within night. Then M Annibal, to foon as he could efpy his timefor to deceive those that were in the harbor, weighed anchor. The rest were fast afleep; and when the next day they awoke and rouzed themselves, with their drunken and drouzy nois (and far forth day it was, and late ere they arose) they were fain to spend some hours in fitting their oars again in their right places, and the tackling of the shipsin good order.

In this while, at Carthage the ordinary multitude that used to frequent the house of Annibal, repaired as their manner was to his gate-house: and when it was voiced abroad, that he was not to be found all the company gathered together in the market place, feeking and euquiring for the principall and chief perionage of their City, Some gave out (as the truth was) that he was fled: 0ther faid plainly, that he was murdered and made away through the fallhood and villany of the N Romans; and this they picked not to avouch. There might a man have feen fundry and divers countenances (as it fareth commonly in Cities where there is fiding and parts-taking) as each one is affected to his own party and faction. At last, news came that he was seen at Cercina, The Roman Embassadors having upon audience given, declared in the Senat of Carthage, that the IL of their Senat had certain intelligence, that both aforetime, King Philip was by Annibal especially solo licited and fet on to make war with the people of Rome; and also now there hath been letters and messengers with reden escat from him to King Antiochus; and that he would neverrest untill he had set all the world together in arms: and therefore if the Carthaginians were desirous to content and fati fe the Romans, they should not suffer these parts of his to escape unpunished: then the Carthaginians made answer, and faid, That nothing of all this passed by publikecouncil O or confent or allowance of the State, howbeit they would be willing to do whatfoever the Romans thought to be reason.

Annibal this while had a boon voyage, and with amerry gale of wind arrived at Tyrns, where he was received of the Tyrians, the first founders of Carthage, as if he had been in another courty of his own received de was, I say, and entertained with all kind of bonour, befeeming a man to famous and renowned. Seipio Africanus for a long timegare the deafear unto them, and missiked the course: tor he supposed it was not for the honour and majelly of the people of Rome to Subscribe unto those imputations charged upon Annibal, toentertain the ipight and hatred of men, and to interess and infert publike authority withinthenivat factions of the Carthaginians; and not to be content to have vanquished Annibal in war, unless they also took upon them the persons of accusers, and preferred a slanderous libell & bill of inditement, and iware thereto billa vera. But at length they wrought and brought about, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage, who in the Senat there might charge Annital categories cally, with plotting and practifing with Antiochus for to wage war against them. And their three were addressed to this Embassie, C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Cullens who being arrived there, caused it to be given out to as many as should demand the cause of their coming, (and all by instruction from the adversaries of Annibal) that their errand was to compose and end the debates between Mafaniffa King of the Numidians, and the Carthaginians. This was commonly divulged and beleeved for truth. But Annibal found them straight and smelt this jugling and was not ignorant that he was the only man that the Romans thotat, and howlever pea e was granted to the Carthaginians, yet they continued an endless and inexpiable war with him alone Hill. Whereupon he resolved to trame himself to give place to the time and yield unto fortune, And being furnished aforehand with all things requisit to take his flight, when he had of K purpole all the day long thewed himfelf in the publike place of affembly very formally, to turn by all inspirion of his intended resolution, to soon as it began to be dark night, in his Citizens sown ashe went a lday, and attended in the Hall, he gate him forth (traight to the City gate, accompanied only with two persons, and those not privy at all to his purpose and designment. And having found his horses ready in the place appointed, he mounted and rode apace that night until he was come to a certain quarter of the territory of Voca: and by the next morning, he passed hetween Acylla and Thapfus, and recovered a tower or fort of his own; where he was imbarked in a ship ready rigged and appointed with sail and oar to take sea and away. Thus departed Annibel out of Affrick, lamenting more often the hard hap and calamity of his country, than of his own friends and kinsfolk. And the same day he fell with the Island Cercina: where the Canha-L ginians found in the rode certain hulks charged with merchandile: and when at his coming a-Thoreout of his thip, there came many running toward him for to fainte and welcome him this ther, he charged his own company, that if any asked concerning him, they should make answer, That he went upon an Embassage to Tyrus: but fearing lest any of their barks should disarcher that night and make report at Thapfus or Acylla that he wasfeen in Cercina: he caufed a beafto be killed forta rince, and invited the Masters of the ships and all the Merchants to supper; and therewith commanded all the fails and cross fail-yards to be had out of the vessels to makethereof a large parillion that they might fit in the shade at their supper: for that, as it fell out, it was then midfimmer. And as the time and fuch provision as they had, would give leave, he secuta feeft and banker; he spared for no wine, and continued the merriment far within night. No no, it is clean contrary: That law which ye have received "and admitted, that which by your suffrages you first granted, that which by the practile and ex-" perience of fo many years you have allowed and approved they would have you to revoke and abolish: which is as much to fay, as by anulling that one, to infringe, impair, and diminish the "authority and vertue of the reft. No law is there fo well devised, that is good, commodious and "agreeable unto all. This only is intended principally to be confidered, that it may be profitable "to the most part, and serve in general. For it as each person shall find an act prejudicial, hurtful, " and offensive to himself, he may be allowed by and by to undo and demolish the same to what "end should all the people affemble together to the making of those statutes, which they anon a-" gainst whom they were enacted may abolish & overthrow? But gladly would I know the great B 4 Occasion and cause, for which our dames in such trouble and uprore run out into the streets, and " have much ado to for bear the common place, and to mount up into the Roftra to make an ora-"tion to this audience? Is it for this to redeem out of the hands of Annibal, their fathers, their "husbands, their children and brethren, whom he keepeth prisoners? Nay, that calamity is far e-" nough off at this day, and far may it ever be I pray God from our City and Common-weal. And " yet when the time was of that hard fortune and calamity, you would not hearken to their pite-"ous and kind prayers in that behalf. But it may well be, that it is neither natural love and kind "affection, nor careful regard of their deer friends, but meer touch of confcience and fenfe of relie gion that hath brought them thus together in a congregation. And ready they are it may be to receive and intertain dame Cybele or Idea, coming from Pefeinus out of Phrygia. What honest Cucolour and shew, so much as in word only can be pretended to bear out and cover this muti-"nous sedition of women? Mary this (say they) that we may glitter in our golden jewels, and "shine in purple robes to be seen a far off: that as well on work daies as holy-dayes, we may be "fee up and ride in our coaches and chariots through the City, as it were in triumph, for the con-"queft and victory of a law by us repealed and disamulted: for winning from you, and wringing our " of your hands, maugre your beards, the liberty of your voices and suffrages: to the end that we " might not be flinted and gaged in our excessive expenses, in our dissolute profusion, in costly va-" nities and superfluities. Many a time ye have heard me complain of the wastful and sumpruous "bravery of women: and as often have you known me to inveigh against the lavish spending of "men, not privat persons only, but magistrats also in higher place: and how this City of ours is fick D " as it were at one time of two contrary diseases and maladies, to wit pinching avarice, and super-" fluous prodigality, two plagues I fay, that have been the bane and overthrow of all great Moa narchies and flourishing empires. These pestilent mischies I dread so much the more, as our " flate and common-weal encreaseth to the better; groweth wealthy every day more than other; et and as our dominion extendeth still farther and farther. And now that we are gotten over into " Greece and Asia, provinces full of all entifing pleasures and alluring delights of the world, now of that we are come to finger and handle the rich treasures of mighty Monarchs, I fear me that even "these things have rather captivated us, than we them. The goodly images, statues and pictures "that came from Syracula are (trult me truly) dangerous to this City, and threaten no less than fo " many enfigns of the field displayed against it. And I hear say already, that there are many, and Extootoo many, that praise and have in admiration the beautiful ornaments of Corinth & Athens, "and begin to make a scorn and game of the images of the Roman Gods made of potters earth a only, laughing much at them, where they fee them standing forth of the walls. Well, for my part "I had rather have these gods so propice and savorable to us as they be than such as those and so "I hope they will ever be, if we can fuffer them to abide (till in their usual shrines and places aca customed. No longer ago than in our fathers daies, King Pyrrhus sent his Embassador Cyneas of «purpole, and affaied by rich and goodly gifts, to tempt the minds not only of our men, but also of "our women. There was no law Oppia as then in force to bridle and keep down the costly pomp "and bravery of women: and yet not one of them all received ought at his hands. And what think " ye was the cause? even the same and no other, for which our ancestors in times past, never so " much as thought upon the providing of any such law. There was no pride then, nor riotous su-" perfluity to restrain. And like as the skill and knowledge of diseases, must præcede and go afore a their cures and remedies: even so evil desires and enormous lusts had need to bud forth & spring a before the laws, which should repress and cut them down. What caused the law Licinia to be " made, concerning 500 acres of ground, forbidding that no man should possess above, but the "exceeding covetonines of men, encroaching fill and laying land to land? What brought in the " law Cincia, as touching gifts and prefents, but this, that the Commons began already to be vaffals asit were and tributaries to the Senat. No marvail therefore it is, nor firange may it feem, that " neither the law Oppia, nor any other providing for the cutting off the unmeasurable expences of " women, was required and thought needful in those daies; when gold, when purple freely tendred G and offered unto them was refused. If now at this day Cyneas were come, and went with such a gifts round about in the City, he should find receivers enough of women, standing in every street " ready for him. And verily, with all the wit I have, I can not devile what the cause and reason a should be of many lustful defires and appetites that reign in this age. For say that if one of you "Were kept short and debarred of that, which another might lawfully have: peradventure there « might rife in your hearts (through infirmity) some shame and abashment in nature, or else dis-" Pleasage and discontentment in reason: so being all as ye are brought within one compass of fur-

Would ye(in faith) my masters and citizens of Rome, have your wives to strive thus, that the richer fort might delerve to have that, which no other I ce can reach unto: and the poor again, because by that means they would not be delpited, overif firein themselves to go above their calling and ability? Certainly I dare avow, if they begin once " to shame at that which is not shame-worthy, they will not abash at any thing, be it neverso of frameius, Have it the will out other own, to long as it lasteth and when all is gone, to her hus-"bands purie she will go. Alas poor man and wo begun is that husband, as wel he that is intrea-"ted by his wife, to firetch his purfettrings, as he that is not, when he shal see another manto give "her that which he would not allow himself. And even now ye see how openly in the street sun-" hame-faced as they be they are in hand with other womens husbands, yea, & that which more is, they keep an increating for to cals the law & for the favour of their voices only. For of lome they have got the good wills no doubt already whiles themselves wil not be intreated, but draw K " milery upon thee upon thy trate, and upon thy children, Wel, let the law once cease to set down " a gage and proportion of thy wives expenses, and never think to have remedy, and to flav the " fame of thy tell with all thou canft do Be not deceived firs, to think that the world will be eret again at the same pass, as it was before this taw took place. And as it is a safer course and lesse "dangerous to let a naughty and obstinat perion alone, that he be not called into questionatall; "than after he is once accused to suffer him to be quit and go away unpunished: even so thises-" ceffive fuperfluity, would have been more tolerable if it had not been medled & tempered with-" al, than it wil be now upon the .ery binding and curbing thereof: much like a wild and farage " beaft let loofe after it hath been wed up a time, and so made more fell and angry. To conclude "therfore of this opinion am I, that of no hand the law Oppia be repealed and so I pray all the L "Gods to vouchiafe for to bles and turn to good, whatfoever you do or go about. Whenhehad of thus faid, those Tribuns also of the Commons, who openly promised and protested to oppose "themselves, and to cross the repealing of the law, made some brief speeches to the same effect, . " parties. But now fith that the Conful M. Porcius Cato, a man of great reputation & gravity not only by his countenance and authority (which alone without any word at all spoken had been M " important enough & effectual) but alto in a long premeditate Oration framed with much fludy "and forethinking, hath impugned and inveighed against our proposed ordinance, I must of no " ceffity answer him again as briefly as I can. Who nevertheless hath ipent more words in reprowing and chaftifing the matrons & dames of the City, than he hath bestowed reason to the pur-" pose in distinating our new law & all verily for this intent, that he might leave it doubtful, whe-"ther the women had done that which he blamed them for, as induced by their own motives, or " seduced by us and our suggestions. As for me the protection directly of the cause I will take in "hand, and not buly and trouble my head in defence of our persons, against whom the Conful " hath rather glanced and girded at, by way of big words, than charged indeed by found ressons. " It hath pleased him to cal this, An assembly and mutinous meeting: yea, and otherwhiles heter- N "meth it, An infurrection and secession of women; because the wives in open place intreated you " to repeal that law, now in time of peace, in the flourishing and bieffed state of the Common-" weal, which during those troublesome daies of war, had been ena Sted against them. I wot full " well that both these words and other besides are very significant, sought ont, and picked for the " purpose, to enforce and aggravate the matter. And we all know, that M. Cato is an Orator not "only grave and earnett but otherwhiles also fell, sharp and birter, how ever otherwise by natural disposition he be of a mild spirit and courteous enough. But to the point. What new & strange " thing is this that our wives have done, in coming abroad and affembling themselves in compa-" niessabout a matter that fo much concerneth and importeth themselve? What were they no " verseen before now, abroad in open street? I will take the print O Cato to turn over your own O " book of Originals against your self. Listen and mark how often they have done the semblable, " and alwaies truly for the common good and benefit of the State. And first and foremost, in the " very beginning and infancy of this City even in the reign of K. Romulus, when the Capitol was Ctaken and held by the Sabins; when in the midst of the Common place, they were ranged in bat-" tel array and ready to fight a bloudy field, was not the quarrel ended and the conflict flayed by "the dames and wives that ran in & put themselves between the two armies? After the KK, were

"driven out and expelled, What hapned tho? When as the legions of the Volicians under the con-"duct of C. Martins incamped within 5 miles of Rome, were they not the matrons of the City that " rurned back this army, which doubtless would have forced our City & put it to ranfack? And " is not this likewise as true, that when the Gauls were possessed of Rome and masters thereof the " dames of the City and none but they, even by the content of all men, came forth into the open " freets, made a contribution, and laid down that gold which paid for the ranfom and redempti-"on of the City? No longer fince than in the last Punick war (because I will not stand to much "upon antiquities) was it not thus, that not only when the City was at a fault for money, the "widows stocks supplied the want of the common treasure? but a so at what time as we were "driven to feek for new Gods, and to fend for them afar off to fuccour us in our extremities; all B" the wives & matrons of the City went to the Sea fide forto receive the goddels Mother Idea? The occasions (qd, he) are different, and the case is not alike. Neither is it my purpose or any barrof my meaning to compare causes, and to prove they are all one. This only I stand upon, and "take it fufficient to excuse and cleer the women, for bringing up no strange novelty, in that they hewed themselves in open place. To proceed therefore seeing that no man made any wonder then, of that which women did in undertaking the affairs that concerned all alike as well men "as women: marvail we now that they do the lemblable, in a cause that properly and peculiarly " pertaineth to them elves? And what great thing was it they did? Now in good faith we are too "coy and squeamish of our hearing, and our ears over nice and delicate, if when masters disdain "not to hear the praiers of their fervants and flaves, we form to give ear to the requests of ladies C" and dames of honor. But now I come to the matter in question, in regard whereof the Conful his Oration confifted in two points. For first, he took it very ill that any law at all once enacted "fhould be rovoked: and secondly he stood upon this that above all others the law devised and "made for repressing the superstuous ornaments and attire of women should remain in sorce for "ever. So it should seem, that the first part (a common defence as it were, of all the laws) was a " speech befitting the place and person of a Conful: but the other against the exceeding pomp of "women, more properly became a man (as himself) of most severe life and precise carriage. And " therefore it is great doubt and to be feared, left we should seduce you into some errour, if we " lay not down and thew plainly the vanity and defect both in the one and in the other. For as I "contess, that of those laws which are devised and established not for a time and by occasion of D fome particular occurrence, but for ever and to the perpetual good of a City, none ought to be "abolished; unless it be so that by use and experience the same be checked and found hurtful, or " by some change of the State become needless and superfluous: so I see evidently, that those stase tuts and ordinances which are brought in to fit and serve some seasons, are mortal (if I may so "lay) and mutable with the times. And oftentimes we see that war disclaimeth those laws which a peace proclaimeth; and peace pulleth down that which war fet up: like as in the government candrale of a ship, one thing is requisit in fair weather and calm Sea, another in foul and trouble-"lome tempelts. These things thus being in nature divers and distinct, let us consider I pray you, of whether fort is this law that now we are in hand to revoke. What? is it one of the ancient and royal laws made by the Kings, and equal in time with the foundation of our City? or (that E a which is the next in time and anthority) was it fet down and written in the twelve Tables by .. the Decemvirs, created of purpote to devife and make laws? Is it of that nature without the "which as our ancestors were of opinion, that the honesty and honour of matrons could not , be preserved: so we are to fear likewise lest by the repealing thereof, we overthrow the mode-" fly, chastity, and integrity of maried women? Why? who knoweth not that this is a new law " of 20 years standing and continuance and no more, made whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius a were Confuls? And feeing that without it wives lived so many years before in good name and a fame, and in passing good order: tell me what danger can ensue, and why we need to sear lest if at be anulled, they should break out to al loosenes and disorder. Mary, if this law had been made at first, to gage the wantonness of women, believeme then it were greatly to be doubted, that f a the putting down thereof would thir them up again to their former outrage. But to what end "It was devised, the time it self is able to shew and testifie. Annibal being in Italy, had won a vi-"ctory at Canna: he was now mafter of Tarentum, Lord of Arpi, and possessed of Capua: every hourmen looked when he would march forward and advance his entigns against Rome: our ala lies were revolted and gone: touldiers we had no more of our own to supply and make up the a decaied bands: no mariners and Sea fervitors could we find for the maintenance of our Arma = ie do; all our treasure in the City Chamber was spent and consumed. Driven we were to this " exigent, as to take up bondflaves for to ferve in wars, and to buy them of their mafters for day, " yea, and to make payment of their price after the war was ended. For want of money also the 6 Publicans and Farmors of our demain and publick profits, undertook to lerve the army with Ga corn, and to furnish us with all things needful for war at a certain price, and gave us the like day " and time of payment. The Gally flaves that ferved at the oar we found and maintained with our own proper and private charges; and a rate and proportion was fet down according to our revenues and worth in the subsidy book, what number every one should be charged with. "All the gold and filver that we had in private we brought forth in common, and the Senators themselves led the way first, and gave good ensample. The widdows and orphan Children brought in their flocks of money to the City Chamber. Streight order was given, that Nnn 3

" we should not have in our houses either of gold or silver, wrought in plate or otherwise above H "io much, nor of filver and brais in coin and currant money beyond a certain proportion limit. ted. Arfuch a time, our dames (belike) were fet all upon their braveries, pruning, trimming, and c' tricking themselves, in such fort, as the law Oppia must needs be devised, there was no other remedy to keep down their excessive pride and superfluous expence in their actire and ornaes ments: even then, I fay, when by occasion that the solemn feath and sacrifice of Ceres was dis-"continued, by reason of the general mourning and heavy chear of all the wives of the City, the "Senat was fain to take order, that they should finish and end their forrowful mourning within thirty dayes. Who is so blind that seeth not, how in regard only of the poverty and extream * calamity of the City, and because all the monies of private persons should be converted into 2. common flock, and for a publick use, this law was first framed, drawn, and set down, so long t "only to fland in firength and vertue, as the cause of penning and writing it should endure and "continue? For otherwise, if those acts and decrees of the Senar, if those orders and ordinances of the Commons, respective unto that present time, should be in sorce, and observed for ever: Why make we paiment of the loan money unto private men? Why do we let and to ferm let our commodities, our cultomes and revenues of the City, unto farmers for ready rent? Why put "we forth our publick works for present money paid down upon the nail? Wherefore buy we or not flaves to ferve in our wars? Laftly, why are we not put to find mariners and oarmen, at our " own proper charges, as then we did? All other estates and degrees, all men else, of what calling " foever, feel a great change in thestate of the City, from wo to weal, from advertity to prosperi-"ty; and shall our wives only miss the good thereof, and not once tast nor enjoy the smits of g " peace, and publick repose and tranquillity? Shall we that are men, be in purple and scarlet? shall we wear our embrodered gowns and robes when we are Magistrats? shall we put on our rich amyces and copes, when we exercise the function and ministery of the high Priests? shall our " children go in their fide garments, purfled afore with purple? shall we permit and priviledgethe 66 head Officers and Magittrats in our Colonies and Burrough Towns? nay shall we suffer herest .. Rome the Masters and Constables of every parish, the meanest and basest officers of all other to " wear embrodered gowns, & fludded with purple? and not only fo, for to grace and credit themce felves, with these goodly ornaments and badges of worship and honour during their life, but al-66 fo after their death, the same to be burned and buried with them? And shall we debar and sor-" bid our women only to use purple and scarlet in their apparel? And when you the husband may I "have purple and scarlet, carpets, counter-points, and foot-cloths, what reason is there to deny coyour wife, the miltress of the house, a gown or mantle of the same? And shall your horse be trap-6. ped and barbed more richly, and better let out with his capaciton, than your wife arraied in her ce apparrel? But in truth, for purple and scarlet, which are the worse for the wearing, and waxeth "bare, me thinks I fee fome reason, such as it is (although it be very hard) of sparing and restraint: as mary torgold wherein little or nothing is lost but the fashion and workmanship, what niggaras dile, what milery is this, to make spare of it and to deny it them? Nay, I dare avow and abide by it there is great benefit and use thereof in time of extremity; and it may help at a pinch both in "publick affairs, and in private occasions, as ye have found by good experience. But Carolaid 66 moreover, There would be no emulation and envy between this good wife and that, if neither M 66 one nor other were allowed that liberty of apparel and ornaments. True it is, but inflead therees of they all are mightily discontented and grieved at the heart in the mean while, disdaining to se see the wives of our allies of the Latine name and Nation, permitted to wear those ornaments a which they are forbidden to have, to feethem, I fay, all gorgeously fet out with spangles and .. jewels of gold, clad in their purple and scarlet cloths, riding in their coaches all over their cities, whiles they at Rome take pains to go afoot on their ten toes, as if the State of the Empire were ce seated in their Towns, and not in this their own City of Rome. This indignity were enough to "wound the hearts of men, and make them b'eed; what hurt doth it then, think you, to filly women, whom small matters, God wot, are wont to trouble? Alas poor souls : no magistracy and place of government in State, no facerdotal dignities in the Church, no triumphs no ornaments N " and titles of honour, are they capable of, no gifts, no spoils and prizes gotten in wars, can fall to ce their shares. Neatness and fineness gay garments, trim attire, and gorgeous habiliments, are the a honour and ornaments of women: in it they take delight, on it they fet their hearts, of it they make their joy. And therefore well have our ancestors called all furniture for the decking of . women [Muncus Muliebris.] What lay they off in time of forrow and mourning, but their gold ... and purple? what put they on and refume again, when their mourning is past, but their gold and a purple? what hang they on them befides in time of publick joy and folemn processions but their ce better apparel, their richest attire & most costly ornaments? But peradventure, after ye have once cc repealed the law Oppia, it will not be in your power to over-rulethem, if haply you should force bid them to wear any thing that now the law restraineth them of. And perhaps some shall have " more ado with their daughters, their wives, and fifters, and find them less tractable and pliable c. unto their minds than now they are, Never fear that: women cannot shake off their obedience, , so long as their Governors (be they fathers, husbands, or brethren) are alive; nay, of all other athings they abhor and cannot brook to be at their own liberty, when it cometh by the death either of husbands or parents: Widows state and Orphans life, they may not abide. Be suretherefore, they had rather have their ornaments and attire to be at the disposition of your selves, than

"of the law. And therefore, to speak a truth, you must in equity and reason protect and defend "them in kindness, and not oppress them with hardness and bondage: delight ye must to be called "their fathers and husbands, rather than their Lords and Masters, It pleased the Contul erewhile "to give them hard words and odious terms, calling this their meeting, A mutiny of women, and "a very infurrection and departure of theirs: and danger there is, no doubt, left being up once, they "will feize upon the mount Sacer, as sometimes the Commons did in their furious anger, or elle possess themselves of the Aventine, and there encamp and keep an hold. Well, this weak and "teeble fex, born to bear, must suffer and endure whatsoever ye shall ordain and set down against "them, But take this withal at the loofe for a final conclusion, that the greater power and autho-" rity ye have over them, the more discretion and moderation ye ought to use in that soveraignty g "of yours. After debate of words passed in this wise, in favor and disfavor of the law, the day following the women flocked in greater multitudes into the open freets, and banding themselves together, as it were, in one troop, they befet the dores and houses of the Bruti, who by interposing themselves, had hindred and crossed the bill preferred by their fellow Tribuns: and never gave they The law Oppid over to keep this flir, until those Tribuns slaked in their opposition, for to inhibit the same, Which repealed. done, there was no doubt then, but all the tribes with one voice would abrogate and abolish that law. Thus twenty year after the enacting thereof, it was repealed and anulled.

M. Porcius Cato after the abrogation of the law Oppia, prejently departed with a fleet of five

which place he commanded his forces to affemble: and after by vertue of an edich tent out along the Sea coast, he had gathered together vessels of all forts as he loosed from Luna; and proclaimed that they should all follow after him to the Port of Pyrenew, from whence he purposed to let forth against the enemy, with an Armado of many sail, and well appointed. Who having passed beyond the mountains of Liguria and the gulf of Gaul, arrived and met all together, at the day

gartison that held the fortrets. From Rhoda with a good gale of wind, they failed to Emporia.

Where, all the whole army, excepting the mariners, were fet a land. At the same time Emporie were two Towns, separate one from the other by a wall. The one of them was inhabited by

Greeks, who came from Phocas, from whence the Massilians also are descended: the other was possessed by Spaniards. But the Greeks Town lieth out into the Sea, so as the whole compass of the wall is not hart a mile about : but the Spanish Town seated farther into the Land, and divided from the Sea, is defended with a wall three miles in circuit. A third fort of Roman inhabitants

Pompeys children. And at this day, they are confused and mingled one with another, and become one entire body, by reason that first the Spaniards, and afterward the Greeks, were made free denizens of the City of Rome. A man might well marvail, feeing how open they lie of the one fide to the main Sea, how exposed they are on the other side to the danger of the Spaniards, a Nation so and twenty Gallies, whereof five were let out by Allies, and arrived in the Port of * Luna, to * Porto Peners, and place appointed. From thence they came against * Rhoda, where they expelled the Spanish * Rasea.

fierce and warlike, what thing it was that garded and protected them? Discipline it was and good government, and nothing elfe, which maintained and preferved them in that weakenes of theirs; discipline I say, which is ever best intertained of them, who live in sear of the mightier that are round about them. One quarter of the wall looking to the fields, is passing strong and exceeding well fortified, having but one gate in all that fide; which ordinarily is alwayes warded by one of the Magistrats. In the night, one third part usually of the citizens kept watch upon the walls. And this watch they maintained not for cultome and fashion, nor by vertue of any law: but they performed it with as great care, yea, and went the round and faw to the fentinels with as much diligence, as if the enemies were hard at gates. A Spaniard came not within the City; neither went they forth themselves, unless it were upon just occasion. But on the Sea side the issue was open for any manat his pleasure. By that gate which turneth toward the Spanish Town, they never used to go forth but in great number, even a third part welneer of the Townsmen, and those who the night before had watched upon the walls. And this cause induced them to go abroad, for that the Spa-

Fuards being no men at Sea. gladly would traffick and trade with them: willingly buying of them their strange merchandise from forein parts brought in by ships: and venting unto them again their Land commodities and fruits arising of the main. The defire of this mutual commerce and necessary intercourse was the cause, that the Spanish Town was open to the Greeks. And in greaterfalety and security they were also, by reason that they were shadowed under the wing of the

Romanamity, which they intertained with as great loyalty as the Massilians, although they were nothing so mighty and puissant. And even at this time they received the Consul and his army with great courtefie and liberality. Cato sojourned there some sew dayes, whiles he was advertised by hiseipials where his enemies abode, and what their forces were : and because he would not be idle whiles he Rayed there, he bestowed all that time in training and exercising his souldiers. It hapned to be that season of the year, when the Spaniards had their corn within their granges ready for the thrashing floor, whereupon he forbad the compurveiors to provide grain, and sent them home to Rome. War, faith he, shall feed and maintain it self. Being departed from * Emporia, * Emporium he wasted and burnt the territory of the enemies, forced them to run away in every place where he Stephano.

came, and out them in exceeding fright. At the same time, as M. Helvius departed out of the farther Province of Spaln with 6000 Clusio. garrion souldiers delivered unto him by the Pretor, he was encountred by a great army of the Celtiberians, before the Town Illiturgum. Valerius writeth, that they were 20000 flrorg: that it 12000 of them were flain, the Town Illiturgum won again, and all above 14 years of ageput to the (word. From thence Helvius marched to the camp of Cato: and became the countrey was cleer from enemies, he fent back the garrison into the nether Spain, and took his journey to Rome, where he entred the City Ovant in pety triumph, for the happy success atchieved in his affairs. He brought into the treasury, of silver in bullion or Ingots, 14732 pound weight: of silver oin 17023 bigate peeces: and of Oscane silver 120338 pound weight. The cause why the Senatdenied him full triumph, was this, for that he warred under the conduct and name of another, and not in his own province. But it was two years before he returned, by reason that the year between he was stayed there, lying sick of a long and grievous disease, and put over his government to Qu. Minutus his successor, Whereupon Helvius likewise entred the City of Rome in that manner of triumph, two months only before his fuccesfor Q. Minutius triumphed. He likewise brought into the Chamber of the City 34800 pound weight of filver in mass: of bigats in coin 78000: of Ot cane filver 278000 pound.

All this while the Conful lay encamped in Span not far from Emporia. Thither repaired unto him from Bil stages a Prince of the Hergets, three Embassadors, whereof his son was one: com. plaining that their forts were affailed by force of arms, and they had no other hope to make refiftance, unless they might have a guard of Roman fouldiers to defend them, 5000 fay they will be infficient: for never would the enemies abide by it if such a power came against them. The Conful aniwered them and faid, that he had a feeling and compassion of the peril or fear (whether it was) wherein they flood: howbeit, he was not at that time furnished with such forces, that he K might taiely spare so many out of his main army, thereby to dismember the same and to empair his flrength, confidering a mighty hoft of his enemies was not far off, with whom he looked every day, and he knew not how toon, to joyn battail in open field with banner displaied. The Embassa dors hearing this, tell down proffrate at the Confuls feet, and shed tears, humbly befeeching him not to forfake them in this piteous plight. " For whither (fay they) shall we go, if we be repul-" sed from the Romans? No allies we have besides, nor other hope in all the world. This danger we might have avoided wel enough, if we would have been falle and disloyals if we would have " banded and rebelled with other Spaniards : but no menaces, no terrors prefented unto us, could "drive us to renounce our fealty, hoping alwayes that we should have help and succour enough "from the Romans; but now if no heip, if no rejief come from thence; if we be denied at the L . Confuls hand; heaven and earth we call to witnes, that we must be forced, full against our wills "and upon mere necessity, to revolt from the Romans, for fear we drink of the same cup that the "Saguntins have done afore us; and choose we will to die with the rest of the Spaniards for company, rather than perish alone by our selves. So for that day they were dismissed withoutother answer. But all the night following the Conful was much distracted in mind, and careful in both respects. Unwilling he was to cast off his allies and see them destitute 3 and as unwilling again to break his army confidering that in fo doing, he might either delay the opportunity of giving b trail or endanger himself in the very instant of conflict. But at length he relolved in no wife to diminish his own forces; doubting left in the mean while he should receive some dishonorat the enemies hand. As for his affociats, he thought it ben to intertain them with good hopes, for M want of better helps; confidering that oftentimes and especially in war, outward semblances and vain thews, are held and taken for truth and fubitance, and ferve the turn well enough : and when a man is throughly perswaded that he hach aid and succours the very trust and confidence thereof hath ministed heart to give the venture of some exploit and preserved him as well as thething it felf. The next morrow he delivered this answer unto the Embassadors, That albeit he seared to abate his own firength, in ferving other mens turn with any part of his forces, yet he had at this present more regard of their occasions and dangerous estate than of his own. Whereupon he gave commandment, that a third part of all his bands and companies should have warning to bake and dresse viands with all speed, for to bestow and lay in the ships; and streightly he charged, that they should be rigged and ready appointed against the third day; and willed withal, two of the N Embassadors to report to much to Bilistages and the Hergets. As for the young Prince his son, he detained fill with him, used him graciously, and betto wed favours and rich gifts upon him bounteously. The Embassadors took not their leave nor departed, beforethey faw the souldiers embarked : and thus by making relation hereof as a thing affired and past all peradvenure, they filled the heads not of their own friends only, but also of the enemies, with the bruit of Roman aids coming neer at hand. The Conful now when he had let this countenance of the matter, and made fufficient semblance to serve his purpose, gave order that the fouldiers should be disbarked again & fet a land: and himself seeing now that the time of the year approached commodious for action and execution of martial affairs, diflodged and removed his flanding winter camp withins mile of Emporia From whence (as any occasions and opportunities were presented) heled fortho his fouldiers a foreging and plundering into the enemies land, fometime one way and fometime another, leaving alwayes a competent guard to defend the camp, Ordinarily their manner was to fleal out by night, to the intent that both they might go on fill farther from their leaguer, & lo forprise the enemies at unawares and unprovided by which means not only his new & raw souldiers well exercised, but also many of his enemies were caught up and came short home: whereupon rhey durst no more peep out of their forts & holds of defence. Now after he had made sufficient Aproof of the hearts as well of his own men as of his enemies, he commanded all the Marshals. Colonels, Horlemen, and Centurions, to affemble before him: and unto them he made this speech. The time (quoth he) is now come, that you to often have wished for; in which you may shew The Oration wat full your vertue and valour. Your fervice hitherto hath been more like the manner of for- of Cato to his "ragers than warriors: but now shall ye come to a main battail, and as enemies, fight hand to Captains and "hand with professed enemies. From henceforth you may if you will, not wast their fields only gallanes. "and poil their territory, but rantack the pillage of rich and wealthy cities. Our fathers before "us and anceltours in times past, when as in Spain there were both Generals and armies of Car-"thaninans, having themselves no leaders and commanders, no souldiers and forces there, yet " would they needs have this article among others capitulated in the accord and composition R " with the Spaniards, That the River of Iberus should limit their Seignory and dominion, Now "at this day, when two Pretors and a Conful, when three entire Roman armies have the go-" vernment and charge of Spain; now, I (ay, after ten years space almost, wherein no Carthagi-"nians have fet foot and been feen in all these quarters of both provinces, we have lost our feig-"noty on this fide Iberus. This must be recover and win again by force of arms, by manhood and "valour: yemult I fay, compet this nation, more rath and inconfiderate in rebelling, than con-"Hant and resolute in maintaining war, for to receive once more the yoke of subjection, which " they have shaken from off their necks. Having exhorted and encouraged them in this manner, begave them to understand, that he would fet forward in the night and lead against the enemies camp. And so he, let them depart to refresh their bodies. At midnight, after he had devoutly taken with him the figns and approbations of the birds for his better speed, he put himself in his journey; and because he might be seized of some place to his liking before the enemies should dekry him he fet a compais in his march, and led his fouldiers clean beyond their camp. And having by day light fet his companies in battel array, he fent out three cohorts, even close to the rampier and trench of the enemy. The barbarous people wondering to feethe Romans shew themieles behind at their back, ran to and fro to take arms. Mean while, the Conful held his men with thele and fuch like speeches: "My fouldiers (quoth he) there is no other hope now "leit, but in mere strength and valour, and I of very purpose have wrought it so. Between us "and our camp the enemies are encamped all: behind at our back we have our enemies Land. "The bravest courses are ever safest, namely, to build and ground our hope surely upon vertue, D And herewithal he gave order, that the cohorts aforefaid (hould retire of purpose to train forth the barbarous people, by making femblance of retreat and flight. And so fell it out in very deed as he thought and supposed : for they imagining that the Romans for very fear were retired, issued forth by heaps out of the gate, and bespred with armed men all the ground, that lay between their own camp and the enemies battel. And whiles they made great half to embattel themselves, the Conful who was already arranged in battel array, and in all respects well appointed, charged upon them before they were marshalled and set in order. First he put forth the corner and wings othorsemen from both points and flanks of the battail but they of the right side were straightwayes repulied, and by their hafty and fearful retreating, caused the footmen also to be mightily affraid. Which the Contul perceiving, he commanded two elect cohorts of footmen to wheel about the right flank of the enemies, and to she w themselves at their backs before the other companies of foot encountred and charged one another. This juddain terror affrighted the enemies, but fet all upright again and recovered the battail of the Romans, which through the fear of the Cavalry began to shrink and go down. Howbeir the horiemen and sootmen both of the right point, were to troubled and to far out of order, that the Conful was forced to pluck tome of them back with his own hand, and turn them with their faces affront the enemy. Thus all the while that the shot lasted, the skirmish was doubtful: so as now the Romans in the skirmish shad much ado to make head and stand to it in the right side, whereas the fright and slight first began. But on the left and all affront, the barbarous had the worst, and with great horror they looked behind and faw their enemies how they played upon their backs and refted not. After they had done with flinging their iron darts and lancing their fiery javelins, they drew their (words; and herewith began the conflict afresh. They were not wounded now from a fir off by blind chan e andhap-hazard they knew not from whence; but foot to foot they flood, and hand to hand they coped and let drive one at another: no hope at all was now but to trust in pure strength and main force. The Conful feeing his men wearied, encouraged and refreshed them by sending for to relieve and maintain the fight, certain cohorts out of the rereward. This new battaillon well in heart, and with fresh weapons, charged the enemies toiled and tired: and being ranged in pointed wife like a quoin or wedge at the first hor onfet brake their arraies: and being once difordered, they put them to flight, and in scattering wise they ran as fast as their legs would carry them, to their camp. Cate feeing them flie on all hands, mounted on horseback and rode himselftothe second legion which was in the rereward for supply, and commanded to advance the standards and enfigns before him, to march apace, and to approach the camp of the enemies for togive an affault. If he elpied any one to flep out of his rank he would ride before and rap him with his light javelin that he had in his hand; commanding the Marthals and Captains to chathre him for it. Now was the enemies camp at the point o be affaulted, and the Romans were withstones, pikes perches and all kind of weapons set back and driven from the trench. But when this fresh legion approached neer, then both the assailants were more encouraged, and also the enemies fought more luftily in defence of their rampier. The Conful cast his eye all about him, to fpie how to break in at some place or other where least resistance might be made: and feeing the guard thin about the left gate, thither he conducted the Principals and the Hallari of the second legion: but the corps de guard which warded that gate, was not able to endure their violent charge. The rest on the other side, seeing the enemies within the rampier, abandoned the camp, and flung away their enfigns and weapons. The fouldiers of the fecond legion followed the chafe and killed them as they ran away, whiles the other ranfacked and rifled their tents, Valerius Antias writeth, that there were 60000 fell that day upon the edge of the fword, Cato himlest (that never loved to make the least of his own praise-worthy acts) faith, there were many flain; but letteth not down what number. He is thought to have performed that day three peeces of fervice worthy of great praise and commendation: first, in that he fet a compass with his army far from his ships, far from his camp, and gave battail in the midst of the enemies, where his men could repose no hope at all but in their own vertue and valour: secondly, for sending those co. horts behind the enemies to charge upon their backs: and thirdly, for that he caused the second legion to march a great pace under their colours displaid, ranged as they were and ordered in battail array, for to approach and affail the gates of the enemies camp, whiles all the reft were disbanded and spread all abroad to pursue the enemy in chase.

After this victory atchieved, he fat not fill in rest and repose, but having sounded the retrest and brought his own fouldiers loden with pillage into the camp, he allowed them fomelew hours for their night fleep, and led them forth into the territory of the enemy to fortage and spoil: which was as effectual to enforce the Spanish Emporitans, and all their neighbour borderers to yeeld subjection, as the unhappy battel fought the day before. Many also of other Cities, which were retired to Emporia for reluge, rendered themselves to his devotion: whom heentertained all with gracious words, and when he had made them good cheer, bestowing wine and cates plentifully upon them, he sent them home to their own houses. Then immediately hediflodged and removed his camp. And all the way as he marched with his army there reforted Embaffadors from divers States that yeelded themselves unto him. By that time that he was comeas far as Taracon, all Spain on this fide Iberiu, was wholly subdued: and the barbarous people brought in as presents unto the Consul, all the captives and prisoners, as well Romans as Allie, and namely, Latins, who by many and fundry chances had been taken in Spain. The bruit went commonly abroad, that the Conful would lead his power into Turder ania. There was a falle alarm [likewise given, and spoken it was, That he would visit the mountainers that lay out of the way. Upon this vain and headless rumour, there were seven forts belonging to the State of the Bergistans that revolted from him: but the Consul led his army against them, and without any memorable battel reduced them under obedience. And the Conful his back was no fooner turned, and he gone to Taracon, but they rebelled again, even before he was departed from thence in any other expedition. Subdued they were the second time, but they found not the like favour as before, to have pardon: for they were all fold like flaves in open market, under the garland because they should not thus every while trouble the peace.

In this mean time P, Manlius the Pretor, after he had received the old army at the hands of Q. Mutius whom he succeeded, and joined thereto the other army of old souldiers belonging to M Appius Claudius, and which were come out of the farther Spain, he made an expedition into Time detania. Now these Turdetans of all other Spaniards are counted to be the worst souldiers, howbeit, in confidence of their great numbers and multitudes they came forward and encountred the Roman forces. But the men of arms had no fooner charged them, but prefently, they were difarraied. As for the footmen, they fought in manner not at all. The old approved fouldiers, who knew the enemies very well, and were experienced in feats of arms, made a quick dispatch of this skirmish, and soon put all past peradventure. Howbeit, the war was not so ended, nor determined in one battel. The Turdetans levied and waged 1000 Celtiberians, and to maintained war afresh with forrain mercenary forces.

The Conful being stung already with the Rebellion of the Turdetans, and supposing that other N Cities would do the like, upon any good occasion and opportunity, disturnished all the Spaniards on this fide Iberus of their armor and munition. Which they took for such an indignity that many of them for very melancholly killed themselves : a martial and warlike nation, that thought they were as good be out of the world as turned out of their arms; and reckoned no life without their weapons. The Conful having intelligence hereof, commanded the Senators of all those Cities to repair unto him : and when they were affembled together, he used this speech unto them. "It " concerneth you (qd, he) no less than us, to give over this rebelling and warring. For never yet "to this day have yeentred into the action, but with more loss and damage of Spaniards, than "toil and travel of the Roman army. To prevent this mischief that it should not happen, I sup-"pose one good way it is, to contrive and work so, that ye might not possibly be able to rebel, o 6. Effect this I would fain, by the easiest mean and course of all other. Affilt me I pray you herein "with your good counsel: I affure you I will not be directed by any advise more willingly, than by that which you your selves shall give me. When they held their tongues, and would not speak 2 word, he faid unto them again, that he was content they should pause upon the matter, and consult therof a few daies. When they were called again & kept filence in this second meeting and confe rence as wel as in the formershe made no more ado, but in one day rased the wals of al their Ciries which done, he went forward against those that hitherto were not come in, not yeelded obedience: and into what quarters foever he came he received all the States one after another there bordering and adjoining, into his protection; lave only Segeffica, a wealthy City and of importance, the which he forced with mantelets and rolling pavoites, and such like fabricks. More difficulty in subduing their enemies he found, than others afore him who first came into Spain; in this regard, for that in times past the Spaniards at the beginning revolted unto them, as being weary of the tedious yoke of Subjection under the lordly government and tyranny of the Carthaginians. But Caro had more ado with them now, in that out of liberty and freedom, which they had ufurped and been used to, he was to ingage them (as it were) bond, and to bring them again to servitude. Besides, he found all out of frame and order, whiles tome of them were up in arms, others g were forced by fiege to revolt, as not able to have held out long unless they had been releved and fuccoured in time. But of this nature and courageous mind was the Conful, that he would himfelf in perion be prefent and manage all affairs, as well those of imallest moment, as also those of greatest weight and consequence: and not only devise and give direction what was best to be done, but would himselfier to his hand, and execute most of the exploits and effect them fully. There was not one amongst them all that he commanded with more severity and rigour, than his ownfelf. In living neerly, in spare feeding, in much watching, in painful travel, he strived to surpass and ourgo the meanest common fouldiers. And no priviledge challenged he, no advantage fought he to himself in his whole army above others, but only honour and soveraign command. The Pretor P. Manlius had the more trouble in his war-fervice, by reason of the Celtiberians,

C whom (as it hath been faid before) the enemies had levied and hired with their mony, And thereforethe Conful being tent unto by the Pretor his letters, led his legions also thicker, Being there arrived, (now the Celtiberians and Turditans were severally encamped apart one from the other) the Romans fell presently to maintain light skirmishes with the Turditans, and ever and anon charged their corps de guard: and how rainly and inconfideratly foever they began the game, yet they ever went away winners. As for the Celtiberians, the Conful lent certain Tribuns or Knight Marshals unto them to empar e, giving them in charge to make them an offer and tender unto them the choice of three conditions. First, if they could be content to arrange themselves to serve under the Romans, and to receive at their hands double wages to that they bargained for with the Turditans, Secondly, whether they would be willing to go their waies home under fafe conduct and publick fecurity, besides that their siding with the Roman enemies should not be laid to their charge, nor bring them within the compais of any danger. Thirdly, if they had more mind to war, than, that they should set down some time and place, when and where they might come to an iffue, and trie it out in a fet battail. The Celtiberians required to take a day for to confider better upon these points. So they assembled together in countel, with great trouble and coninfion, by reason that some Turdetans were thrust in among them; upon which occasion, they might worse grow to any conclusion. Now albeit uncertain it was, whether there would be any war or peace with the Celtiberians, yet the Romans gathered their provision out of the territory and borroughs of their enemies, like as in time of peace: yea, and more than that, they entred oftenimes within their fortifications and defences, as if there had been some common traffick and commerce agreed between them, by way of private truce. The Conful feeing he could not draw the enemy to a battail, first led certain companies lightly appointed with banners displaied, to raile booties in one quarter of the country, which as yet was free, and not rafted of the wars: but afterwards hearing that all the bag and baggage and other carriage of the Celtiberians was left at Saguntia, he set torward thither to give an assault to the Town. But seeing that nothing . would move and ftir them, he paied not only his own touldiers their wages, but also the Pre- andaluga Metors army their due, and leaving the main hoft in the Pretor his camp, himself returned to the tall. River Ebre, accompanied only with feven cohorts. With these forces, as small as they were, he woncertain Towns, and there revolted unto him the Sedetans, Aufetans, and Suefferans. The Lacetans (a Nation living out of the way after a favage manner within the wilds and woods)kept fill in arms, not only upon a natural and inbred wildness, but also upon a guilty conscience, in the whiles the Conful and his army was emploied in the Turdulois war, they had made juddain Indes and in urfions into the Lands of their Allies, and pitifully wasted the same. And thereore the Conful advanced forward to affault their Town, and led against it not only his own cohorts and bands, but also the youth of his Allies, who had good cause to be angry, and to op-Pose themselves unto them. The Town which they inhabited, lay out in length, but was nothing to wide and large in breadth: and within one half mile or lefs, he pitched down his enlight, and planted himself. There he left behind a guard of choise companies, and streightly thi ged them not to flir out of that place, before he came unto them himself, The rest of his forces he led about unto the farther fide beyond the Town. Of all the aid fouldiers that he had about him, the greatest number were the youth of the Suessetans, and those he commanded to approach the wall for to give affault. The Lacetans, when they took knowledge of their armor and colours, calling to mind how often they had overrun them at their pleasure, and wasted their lands without the k or empeachment, how many and fundry times they had in ranged battel difcomfired & put them to flight, all at once fet open the gate, and fallied out upon them. The Sueffelans were to little able to tuftain the forcible charge of their onfet, that they hardly could abide their very show & first cry. The Co. seeing now, that come to pass indeed which he suspected would be for rode a gallop upon the spurto those faid cohorts of his own that were lest on the others fide under the Town, and taking them with him ingreat halt, whiles all the Townsmen men thread abroad in following the chase after the Snesserans, he led them into the Town at a place where there was no noise, no thirring, and not a man to be seen; and made himself matter of all before the Lacetans were returned back: but within a while he received them to mercy upon their submission: who, poor men, had nothing to yeeld and lole but their bare armor and wear pons. Immediatly he followed the train of this victory, and led his forces against the hold or throng Town of Vergium. This was a receptacle and place of fure receit for certain Rovers and Theeves, who from thence used to make many rodes into the peaceable parts of that Province. The principal and chief person of Vergium quit the place, and betook himself unto the Consul and began to excuse as well himself as the Townsmen; saying, that the government of the Town and the state thereof lay not in their hands. For why? these robbers after they were once received in among them, seized themselves wholly of that strength, and had all at their command. The Conful willed him to go home again, and to devile and forge some likely and probable cause why he had been abient and out of the way; with this charge and direction, that when he fawhim approach under the walls, and the robbers aforefaid wholly amused and occupied indefence thereof, then he should remember to join with the rest of his part and saction, and be possessed of the fortress and hold of the Town, This put he in practise and execution accordingly, So while the Romans of one fide scaled the walls, and they on the other fide had taken the fortress, these barbarians were juddainly at once surprised with a two-fold sear before and behind. The Conful when he had gotten the place into his own hands, gave order, that all those who were gotten into the Caltle and held it, should remain free, themselves and all their kinted, and likewise enjoy their goods. The rest of the Vergetans he commanded the Treasurer to sell and make more of them. As for the Rovers, they juffred according to their deferts. After he had fet the Ptovince in quiet, he laid great tributes and imposts upon the mines of iron and filver: which being once ordained and established, the whole province grew in wealth and riches, every day more than other. For these his exploits archieved in Spain, the LL, of the Senat decreed, that there Thould be a folemn procession at Rome, to endure for three dayes.

The four and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

The same winter, L. Valerius Flaccus the other Confol, fought in France 2 fet field with the power of the Boians, neer the forest of Litania, and wan the victory. And by report, there were eight thouland Gauls there flain: the rest abandoned the war, and slipt every one into their own t Hamlets and Villages, The rest of the winter the Cos, kept his army at Placentia and Cremonasbout the Po, and repaired in these Cities whatsoever had been decaied and demolished during

The affairs in Italy and Spain standing in these terms: when T. Quintius had so passed the winter in Greece, the letting afide the Erolians (who neither had been recompensed according to the hope that they conceived of the victory, nor yet could long time like of repose) all Greece throughout in general enjoying the bleffing of peace and liberty, flourished and mainteined their state exceeding well, admiring no less the temperance, justice, and moderation of the Roman General after victory, than his valour and prowess in war: there was an Act of the Senat of Rome brought and presented unto him, importing thus much, That was was determined against Nabin M the tyrare of the Lacedemonians. Which when Quinting had read, he published and proclaimed a general Diet or Councel at Corinth against a certain day, when and where all the States associate should affemble by their delegats and Embassadors. Now when there was met together from all parts a frequent number of Princes and great personages, in such fort, that the very Ætoliamallo were not absent, Quintius used unto them this or the like speech, "The Romans & Greekshave warred against King Philip as ye well know; and as with one mind and common counteithey " have so done, so either of them had several quarrels unto him, and privat causes and occasions "by themselves to take arms. For Philip had broken the league and amity with us Romans, one "while by fending aid and maintenance to the Carthaginians our enemies: otherwhiles by affail-"ing our allies in the fe pirts: and to you wards he hath so demeaned himself that albeit we could N "forget and put up all the wrongs that he hath done unto us, the very injuries that yehavere-" ceived at his hands, minister sufficient cause unto us to war against him for your sake. As for this dayes confultation, it refleth wholly in your felves. For, this I propound unto you, Whe-"ther your will is to luffer Argos (which as ye know your selves Nabis the tyrantholdeth) to " remain (till under him in obedience : or whether you think it meet and reason, that amost noble "and ancient City as it is, feated in the very heart of Greece, should be reduced unto liberty, to "enjoy the fame condition and flate wherein other Cities of Peloponnesus and Greece do fland. "This con ultation I say, as you well see, entirely toucheth you and your good, and concerneth us Romans no farther than thus, that by the fervitude of that one only City, we can not have "the full and entire glory of fetting Greece wholly in liberty, But if you regard not the flateof O that City, and are not moved with the example thereof and the danger, for fear the contagion "of this mischief spred farther: we for our parts are content, and take all in good worth, and will " not fet you down and teach you what to do. Only I require your advice in this point, minding to relolve upon that, which the Major part of you shall carry by voices. After the Roman General had ended his speech, all the rest began to deliver their opinions. And when the deputed de egate or agent for the Athenians had magnified and extolled as highly as possibly he could, the good demerits of the Romans towards Greece, yielding them great thanks, that upon their request they had granted them aid against Philip, and Without any petition at all, offered their help and incour against Nabis the tytant; and seemed therewith to be offended and displeased at some. who neverthelels in their talk and speeches found fault and carped at these so great favours and deletts I yea, and spake badly of suture events, whereas it behoved them rather to acknowledge and confess how much they were bound and beholden already to the Romans for good turns past: it well appeared that he pointed out directly the Ætolians, and girded at them. "Whereupcon Alexander, a principall and chief man of their nation, inveighed first against the Athenians, "who having been in times past the head Captains and maintainers of freedom, betraied now the "common cause for love of their own privat flatteries Moreover, he complained that the Acha-B"ans, who first terved Philip in his wars, and at the last (when they saw him down the wind and a fortune to frown upon him) fell away like disloyal traitors & possessed themselves of Corinth to "theirown behoof practiong also to compass and gain unto them the City of Argos. As for the " Etolians, the first and principal enemies of Philip, and alwaies allies and friends to the Ro-"mans, how foever they had expresly and precisely covenanted in the league, to enjoy their towns "and territories, after Phil, was vanquished, were notwithstanding put besides Echinum and " Phar alus. He charged the Roman with fraud and deceit, who pretending an outward shew a Waintitle and colour of liberty, held the Cities of Chalcis and Demetrias with flrong garrisons: "and yet when Philip made some stay and halting to withdraw and void from thence his armed "guards, they were ever wont to object and lay, that Greece would never be in freedom, so long as Chalcis, Demetrias, and Corinth were in his hand: and finally he alledged against them, that un-"der pretence of Argos and Nalis, they fought occasion to remain Rill in Greece and keep their "armies there. Let them (quoth he) transport their legions once into Italy, the Ætolians would "then undertake and promife, that Nabis should remove his garrison out of Argos, upon compo-"fition and with good will, or elfe they would compell him by force and arms, to be over-ruled "by the puissance of all Greece united together in one generall consent. By this vain babble of his, he rouled Aristenius first, the Prætor of the Achæans, who spake in this wife. Never will Jupiter Op. Max. quoth he, and Queen Juno the Patronels of Argos, suffer that City to be the recompence or prize between the Lacedamonian Tyrant, and these pilling and thieving Etolians: to be brought to this hard point and these terms of extremity, as to sustain more milery and calami-Dty when it is recovered by us, than when it was won and taken by him. O Quintins, it is not the sea lying between us and them that can defend us from these robbers. What will then become of usincale they should make themselves a fort and Castle of strength in the midst of Peloponnesus? Nought have they of the Greeks but their language, like as they carry nothing of men but their shape and visage. For look into their manners, their fashions and behaviour, they are more rude and cruell than any barbarians, nay, they are more favage than the most wild and ravenous beasts that be. We befeech you therefore O Romans, both to recover Argos out of the hands of Nabis, and allo to establish the State of Greece in such fort, that we leave these parts also safe and secure enough from the robberies and theeving hostility of these Æcolians. The Roman Generall Quintim, feeing them of all fides to blame and rebuke the Ætolians, faid, that he would have answered E them himself, but that he perceived them all so hatefully bent against them, that more needfull it was that they were to be appeared, than farther provoked. And therefore holding himself tatisfied and contented with that opinion which was conceived of the Romans and Æcolians, he said, that he would demand what their pleasure was to advise, concerning the war against Nabis unless he rendred Argos to the Achæans? And when they all were of one mind to make war, he exhorted them to fend aids proportionably to the power and firength of each State and City. To the Ætolians helent an Embaliador, more to discover and lay open their intention (as it fell out accordingly) than upon any hope he had to obtain ought at their hands. Unto the Provolt Marshals of the camp, he gave commandment to fend for the army from Elatia.

About this time, when the Embaffadors of King Antiochus came unto him to treat about f alliance and a league, he answered, That he could say nothing to them nor determine of that point in the absence of those Delegats abovesaid; and therefore they were to repair unto the Senat of Rome. Then, himself in person prepared to make an expedition and oyage gainst Argos, with those forces which were brought from Elavia. And when he was about (In a. Ariftanus the Prator, with 10000 foot of Achaans, and 1000 horsemet him in the way: and cost far from thence they joyned both theirforces and encamped together. The next day after they came down into the Plain of Argos and choice a place to fortifie and lye in leaguer about four miles from Ar-Sor Now was Pythagoras the Captain of the Lacedemonian garrison, who had both married the tyrant his daughter, and was his wives brother befides. This Pythagoras against the coming of the Romans, had fortified with strong guards both the Castle's (for two there are within Argos) G and other places, which either had easie accels or were suspected, But as he was employed in these provisions and preparations, he could not diffemble and hide the fear which this arrivall and approach of the Romans strake into him: and beside this forrain terrour from without, there hapned also an intestine mutiny within. There was one Damocles an Argive. (a young Gentleman of more spirit and courage than wisdom and discretion) who at the first by interposing a mutuall and reciprocall oath, had conferred with certain persons of good sufficiency, about expelling the gamion: but whiles he fludied to frengthen the confpiracy and his own fide, he was not well

affured of their fidelity, and could not judge which of them were true and which not. As hetal, H ked upon a time with his complices, the Captain of the garrison sent for him by one of his guard; whereupon he perceived that his complot was revealed: he exhorted therefore the confinators that were in the way to take arms with him, rather than to die by torture upon the rack; and fo with some sew about him he marched forward into the market-place, crying often aloud, That as many as loved the fafety of the Common-weal should follow him as their head and maintainer of their liberty: but no man moved he with his speech to go after him and take his part; for no hope faw they of any fuccour at all near at hand: fo far off were they from making good account of a fure guard of defence. And as helpake those words, the Lacedamonians were come round about him, and killed both him and his fellows. After this were others also apprehended; the most part of them were slain, and some few cast into prison, A great number the night following flid down the wall by ropes, and fled to the Romans. Their affured the Romans, that if their army had been near the gates, the commotion and conspiracy aforesaid would have taken effectiand in case their camp approached nearer, the Argives would not be in quiet, but make some infurrection: whereupon Quintius fent out the footmen lightly appointed, together with the horsemen; who skirmished with the Lacedamonians about Cylarabis (a publike school and place of exercise about a quarter of a mile out of the City) who were sallied out at the gate, and without any great difficulty chaled them within the town: and in that very place where the conflict was. the Roman Generall encamped. One day he spent in escouting an espiall, whether any new trouble and uproars arose among them within the City. But when he perceived once that they were all amort for fear, he affembled a Councill to take advice, Whether he were best to give the af-k fault upon Argos, or no? All the heads of Greece, (except Aristanus) agreed with one accord, that fince there was no other cause of war elsewhere, it should begin there especially. Quinting in no case would like of that course, but willingly he gave ear with evident approbation unto Aristanus, as he discouried and reasoned against the generall opinion and consent of them all: and over and besides added this of himself, That considering the war was enrerprised and taken in hand in the behalf of the Argives against the tyrant, there was nothing less beseeming and more without sence, than to leave the enemy himself, and to affail and batter the poor City of Argos, Fothis part he would fight at the head, even against the Lacedamonians and their tyrant, the principal cause of this war. Then having dissolved the Councill, he sent certain cohorts lightly appointed to purvey store of grain. As much as could be found ripe in those parts was cut, mowed, and reaped down immediatly and laid up: all that was green they trampled under foot and spoiled that the enemies foon after might have no good thereof. So he diflodged and removed from themes and having passed over the mountain Parthenius, at three daies end he encamped in the territory of Carra near to Tagea. In which place he expected the aids of his allies before he would invade the territory of the enemies. From Philip there came a thousand and five hundred Macedonians, and of Thessalians forty horse. The Roman Generall staid not now for succours of men (whereof he had inflicient and plenty) but for his provision of victuals, which he had commanded the towns bordering near hand to furnish him withall. Besides, there came great forces by sea, and met him there: for by this time was Lucius Quintius arrived with forty fail from Lencas: also eighteen covered ships of Rhodes. And now also was Eumenes the King, about the Islands Cy-M clades, with ten close hatched and decked ships, thirty gallions, with other smaller vessels among of fundry fores. Likewise of Lacedamonians that were exiled and banished persons there were very many; who chased and driven out by the oppression and wrongfull dealing of their tyrants, repaired now into the Roman Camp, in hope to recover their native country again. Now a great many had been expulsed in divers and lundry ages, since time that the tyrant first usurped sule, and were possessed of Lacedamon. The chief of these exiled persons was one Agestpolis, a manto whom by right of delcent and linage the inheritance of the kingdom of Lacedamon appertained. He whiles he was but an Infant hapned to be expelled by Lycurgus after the death of Gleoment, who was the first tyrant at Lacedamon.

The tyrant befet thus round about with wars threatning both from sea and land, and defiture in manner of all hope, (considering the proportion of his forces to the power of his enemies:) N yet nevertheless neglected not to wage war, but levied out of Creta one thousand more (even the chosen flower of all their youth) to the other thousand that he had from thence already. He had besides of mercenary souldiers three thousand in arms: also ten thousand of his own subjects and Citizens of Lacedamon, together with those that he had taken out of the burroughs and villages in the country. Moreover, he fortified the City with trench and mure. And that there might arise no trouble and stir within the town, he held the spirits of men in awe with fear of sharp and rigorous punishments. And for a fmuch as he could not hope nor imagine that they defired and wished his good and safety, for that he held some Citizens insuspition and jealousie: after he had brought forth all his forces into the plain, which they call * Dromos, he commanded the Laceda O monians to affemble together without any armour and weapons to an audience; and when they were affembled he environed them with his armed guard. And after some few remonstrances by way of a short preamble, Why they ought to hold him excused at such a time if he seared every thing, and made all fure as well as he could: confidering withall, it was expedient even for them also (as many as the present state of the world might bring in suspition) to be kept short for being able to execute any attempt rather than be surprized in the midit of their practises and complots,

A sudio be punished accordingly: even for this cause (quoth he) I will have certain persons in safe custody and durance, untill such time as the tempest be overblown which now is coming. And when the neemest be orce reputifed, from whom teis danger there will be, in case dometicall treations may be prevented) then incontineatly will I enlarge them and set them at liberty. This said, he commanded the names to be called of sourcore or therebout of the principall of the youth; and as every one of them answered to his name, he dapt him up saft in prison: and thenext night side of the supplement of the principall of the youth; so the supplement of the principall of the youth; so the were the Burghers and Vilagers, a kind of peasants and country kerns) were accused to have intended to flie unto the enemy and to band with him: who likewise were whipped & storage throughout all the streets, and then put to death. By the featfull example of this cruelty, the concord quetch not give attempt of any new designments tending to change and alteration. His forces he kept within his strength and places of defence, for neither thought he himtlest frongenough to enter the field and sight a set startly, nor durit abandon the City, seeing the minds of men so watering, and their affections so unconstant.

Quintim having made his provision and set all things in good order, departed from his standing camp, and the second day came to Sellacia upon the river Oemus: in which very place Antigonus fometime King of the Macedonians flruck a battell (men say) with Cleomenes the tyrant of the Lacedomonians. And there, having intelligence, that from thence be was to mount up an hard aftent and narrow paffage, he fet a short compass through the mountains, having sent before C certain men to levell the ground and make the way even, and so got into a large and broad portgate, untill he came to the river Eurotas, which runneth in manner hard under the walls of the City of Sparta: where, as the Romans were pitching their tents, even as Quintins himself with the horsemen and light van-courriers gone before, the Auxiliaries of the tyrant charged upon them: who looking for nothing less, because no man had encountred them all the way as they marched, but passed on in their journey as in a peaceable country, were much troubled and affrighted herewith. This fear of theirs continued a good time, while the horsemen called upon the sootmen, and they again unto the horsemen; and both the one fort and the other trulled in themselves but little or nothing at all. At length the standards of the legions with their enligns came forward; and were within fight, and so ioon as the companies of the vanguard advanced forth to fight, D they who erewhile terrified others, were driven infearfull haste themselves into the City. The Romans being retired to far from the wall, as that they were without dart-shot, stood a while ranged in battellarray. But after that they faw none of the enemies come abroad against them, returned to their leaguer. The next day after Quinting took his way and marched with his army in order of battell along the town fide, near unto the river hard at the foot of the hill Manalus. The companies of the legionary footmen led the march in the vanguard, the light footmen and the horsemen followed in the rereward, and flanked the rett. Nabis kept within the walls his mercenary fouldiers (in whom he reposed greatest confidence) arranged under their entigns, and in readines to fight, purposing to charge the back of his enemies. And the rereguard of the Romans was not so soon passed by, but they tallied out of the town at fundry places at once, with as tumul-E tuous a noise as they made the day before. Appins Claudius had the leading of the rereward who having prepared beforehand the hearts of his fouldiers, and advertized them to be prest and ready for what occurrent loever might happen presently turned the enfigns, and set a compass with the whole army to make head against the enemies. Whereupon there ensued a hot fight which endured a good time, as if two armies had directly encountered one another. In the end, the souldiers of Nabis began to give ground and flie: in which flight of theirs they had made lefs hast, and better faved themselves, but that the Achazans who were acquainted well with the ground, and knew the coasts of the country, hotly followed the chase: their made a soul slaughter and butchery among them; and the most part, such as were dispersed here and there in their flight they disarmed. Then Quintius encamped near unto Amyela, and having harried and wasted all the territory from dabout the City (which places were very well peopled and very pleasant:) when he saw no enemies is the out at the City gates, he removed his camp hard to the river Eurosas. From whence he made excursions, wasted all the vale lying under the hill Taigetus, and the lands butting and adjoyning close to whe sea.

And being afterwards advertibled, that the town of the fowns, that on the least town of the fowns and the first place of fafe retreat and refuge unto the Lacedemonians in all their exploits and firvice at fea, and that the Romans lay encamped not far from the fea fide; he refoleved to stail the wind life for tible means. This town at that time was very strong, twell peopled with Citizens and other inhabitants, and sufficiently furnished with all warlike provise on and munition. Cand invery good time it fell out, that as Quimins was entred into this difficult enterprise, King Emmons and the Rhodian sleet arrived. red at one time to enter the town, both from the haven (where the passage was more plain and et li tie) to the end, that the enemies might abandon the defence of the more open place; and alfoat the breach made in the wall : and they miffed but very little of entrance there where they intended, but the hope they conceived of yielding the City, which anon was croffed again, and turned to nothing, flaid their violence and heat of affault. Dexagoridas and Gorgopas governed the town then in equall authority. Dexagoridae had dispatched a courrier to the Roman lieutenant, to fig. nific that he would betray the town and when the time and place of execution of this defignment was agreed upon between them, the traitor was killed by Gorgopas: by occasion whereof the City was the better defended with more carefull heed by him alone; yea, and the affault therof had been more difficult, but that Titu Quintim came to succour and help with four thousand chosen souldiers. He was no sooner discovered with an army arranged in battell array from the brow and top of the hill that is not far diffant from the town; whiles L. Quintins withall from another fide followed the affault with his ordnance and artillery both by sea and land, but Gorgopas shen began himfeli to despair in very deed, and was driven perforce to take that very course, which in another he had punished by death: and upon composition that he might depart and have away with him those fouldiers which he had in garrison, he delivered up the City to Quintim.

Before that Gyttheum was rendered, Pythagoras left as Captain at Argos, leaving the guard and defence of the City unto the charge of Timocrates of Pellena, came with a thousand waged fouldiers, and two thouland Argives unto Nabis at Lacedamon, And Nabis like as at the first arrivall of the Roman fleet, and the furrender withall of the towns flanding by the fea fide, was muchaffrighted, to he had recovered again some little hope and was well quieted in mind, so long as Gp-K theum held out fill, & his garrison within the town kept their own, But after he heard once that it also was yielded unto the Romans and lost; seeing no hope left by land side, which was wholly possessed by the enemies, and that he was altogether shut up from the sea, he thought it best to yield mire ortune. And first he sent an herald into the camp, to know whether the enemies would Forme a winffer him to fend his Embassadors unto them. Which being granted, Pythagoras repaired anto the General with no other charge and commission, but only to request that theter av night pari with the Roman Generall, Hereupon the Councill was affembled and generally opined it was that there should be granted unto him a conference; infomuch, as both time and place was agreed upon and appointed. Now when they were come to the hils standing in the midit of that quarter, with some small companies of souldiers attending on either side upon them; I. they left their cohorts behind them, standing in guard, within the open view and fight of both parts: and then Natis came down with a certain chosen guard for his body; and Quintimaccompanied with his brother, Eumenes the King, Sobilars the Rhodian, and Arifthenus the Prator of the Acheans, with some few Knight Marshals and Colonels, And then the tyrant being purto his choice, whether he would speak first, or hear another, began his speech in this wise.

But come on those persons whom "in a generall affembly you caused to be attached, and promised in the presence of all the Citi-"zens to keep them fafe and fure in ward: come on, I fay, command them to be brought forth "now bound as they be; that their poor fathers & mothers may understand they are alive, whom "they have mourned for so much , without cause, as if they had been dead, But you will say, set case "all this be true what is that to you Romans? Dare you indeed speak out and say so much to those "that deliver Greece and fet it free? to those Isay, that for the freedom thereof have passed the G"feas.have warred both by land and fea? And yet all this while(fay you) I have not directly & tru-"ly wronged you nor properly infringed & broken your friendship and amity. No have you not? "How often would you have me to convince you of the contrary? But I will not use many words "& much circumstance, but come to the very catch and point of the matter. What be the things "Ipray you, wherewith friendship is commonly broken? I take it they are these two especially, "namely, if you take my friends for your foes; and joyn your felf to my enemies. You have done into our fociety and alliance by the very fame conditions and covenants that Lacedamon was H "you I iay our allie, have forced a City allied unto us Again, with Philip our enemy, you have not only concluded amity, but (God iave all) contracted alliance and affinity by means of Philocles "a Colonell and Commander of his: and making war against us, you have kept the seas all about 66 M. lea with your men of war and rovers: and I think I may fafely fay, you have taken pilloners. "and killed more Roman Citizens than Philip himself, And the whole sea-coast of Macedony hath "less insested our ships that vie to bring provision unto our armies, and been more safe for passage than the promo mory & cape of Males. Do you forbear therefore to make fuch vaunt of fideli-"lity: spare you, of all other, to speak of the rights of alliance; and laying off the mask of popular " language and civil lipeech, talk as a tyrant and enemy as you are, Upon this, Ariftensa dealt with Nabis, one while admonishing and advertising him, another while requesting and entreating him, I now that the opportunity was offered, to provide for himlelf and his whole estate: he beganto discourse unto him of the Tyrants of all the states confining thereabout one after another by name, who when they had refigned up and laid down their absolute soveraignty of command. and restored liberty to their subjects, passed their old age among their Citizens, not only in repose and security, but also in great honour and reputation. These words uttered & heard between them to and fro, the night drew on apace & parted the conference. The morrow after, Nabis promiled feeing the Romans would have it fo, to quit the City Argos, to withdraw his garrifonfrom thence, and to deliver again all the captives and fugitive traitors that were under his hands: and if they demanded any more of him, he requested that they would set it down in writing, that he might consult thereof with his friends, So, both the Tyrant had respit and time granted to take ad- K vice, and allo Quinting face in Councill with the principall heads of his allies what to do. The most part were of opinion to maintain the war still, and to kill the tyrant out of the way; for never would the liberty of Greece be otherwise firm and fure: and better far had it been, never to have entred into arms with him, than being once begun, to give it over. And he will, fay they, be greater and more strong hereaster, as if his tyrannicall government were approved, and no doubt he would vouch the people of Rome for author of his unjust rule and dominion, and will induce and incite by his example many in other free States and Cities, to lie in wait to work means tooverthrow the liberty of Citizens, and to bring them into thraldom and bondage. The Generall, of himseltwas more affected and inclined to peace: for he saw, "that if the enemy were once di-"ven within the wails, there was no way but to lie in fiege against the City, and that would re-L "quire long tract of time: for a fmuch as it was not Gy:theum (and yet that was betraied and ren-"dred and not forced by affault) but Lacedamon, a most firong town both for men and munition, "that they were to lay fiege unto and affault. And whereas the only hope was, that when they ce approached with the army, there might some dissention and sedition have risen among them-"felves within: now when as they faw the enfigns in manner advanced hard to the Citygates, "there was not one that mutined or flirred at all. He added moreover and faid, That Villim the "Embassador newly returned from Antiochiu, reported, how all was not found there, nor the " peace like to continue : and that he had passed over into Europe with far greater forces both for " land and at lea than at any time heretofore: and if (quoth he) the army should be wholly emof ployed in the fiege of Lacedemon, what other power have we to maintain war withall again th 64 fo puissant and mighty a Prince as is Antiochus? These were the remonstrances that openlyhe gave out; but secreely he was troubled in mind for sear lest a new Consul should come in his place, and have the government of the Province of Greece: and so he should leave unto his successon, the honour of the victory of a war commenced by him, and in good forwardnels. But whenhe perceived that his allies were nothing inclined to his waies, notwithstanding all his contradiction and bending to the contrary, by making semblant that he now drew with them and was of their mind, he won them all to approve his defignment and intention, "Well, Godfpeed out " hand (quoth he:) let us besiege Lacedamonfince ye will needs have it so: but considering that "the laying fiege unto Cities, is a thing as ye well know, that goeth so slowly forward, and of "tentimes maketh the affailants fooner weary than the defendants: you ought even now to call N this account presently with your selves, that we must lie all winter long about the walls of Lac demon. And were there nothing but travell and perill, that during so long time we were to endure, I would exhort and encourage you to suffer and abide the same, with stone bodies and resolute minds. But besides all that, we must be at great cost and expences about sabricks, "engins, and instruments of artillery, requisit to the assault of so great a City: we must I say be " provided of victuals good store against winter, as well to serve us as you. Bewell advised "therefore to the end that you should not suddenly in haste huddle up these matters, or after ye "are once entred into the action, give over and abandon it with shame) that yed patch "your letters aforehand every one to the State wherein he liveth, and found them to the depth, "how their hearts ferve them and what strength and forces they have, Of aids & succours I have 0 "enough and to spare: but the more in number we are, the more maintenance shall we need, As "this time the retritory of our enemies hath nothing but hare foile and naked ground: and "withall, the winter is coming on apace, all which feason, carriage (especially far off) is combrous and hard. This Oration at the first cansed them every one to regard and look homeward to domesticall difficulties and inconveniences, namely, the idleness, the envy and backbing of those which carry at home, against them that are employed in warfate : the common liberty

(which causeth men of one society and commonalty hardly to accord and sort together) the publike want of treasure, and the niggardice of private persons, when they are to part with anything out of their own purses. And therefore suddenly changing their minds, they put to the discretion of the Roman Generall, to do and determine what he thought expedient for the good of the people of Rome and their allies. Whereupon Quintins taking the advice only of his own Lieutenants and Provost-Marshals, engrossed these Articles and conditions following, according to which peace should be concluded with the Tyrant. Imprimis, That there be a truce made for the term of fix months between Nabis and the Romans, King Eumenes and the Rhodians, Item, That both T. Quintius and Nabis should immediatly send Embassadors to Rome, that the peace might be ratified and confirmed by the authority of the Senat, Item, That from that day forward, where-R in the conditions put down in writing should be presented unto Nabis, the truce aforesaid hould begin. Item, That within ten daies next after enfuing, all the garrifons quit Argos and the rest of the towns within the territory of the Argives : and then those peeces to be delivered void and free unto the Romans. Item, That no flave taken captive in wars, belonging either to the King, or to any publike state, or private person, be had away from those towns : and if any before time had been carried forth, they should be restored again duly to their right Massers. Item, That Nabis should deliver again those ships that he had gotten from the maritime Cities, and that himself have no vessell at all but only two gallions, and those to have no more than fix and twenty oars apiece to direct and rule them. Item, That he render all the runagate Traitors and captives unto all the Cities confederate with the people of Rome, as also make restitution to Cthe Messenians of all their goods again, that either could be found, or the owners know certainby to be theirs. Item, That he restore to all the banished Lacedæmonians their wives and children; but of the wives, so many only as would be content to follow their husbands: and that none of them should be compelled against their wills to go with any exiled person. Item, That to as many mercenary fouldiers of Nabis, as were either gone from him into their own Cities or to the Romans, all their own goods should be justly and truly delivered again. Item, That in the Island of Gree he should not be possessed of any one City: and look what Cities he then held, he yield them to the Romans. Item, That he enter into alliance with no Candiot, nor with any other whatfoever, nor yet make war with them. Item, That he remove all the garrifons out of all the Cities that himself had delivered up, and which had surrendred themselves and all they had, under D the protection and obedience of the people of Rome, and not molest them neither by himself norany of his. Item, That he build no town nor Castle, either in his own land or in any other. Item, That for the more affurance of performing these covenants, he give five hostages, such as it should please the Roman Generall to choose; and namely, his own son for one of them: Last of all, That he make present paiment of one hundred talents of filver, and fifty more yearly until the term of eight years be run out. These Articles engrossed, were sent to Lacedamon, after the Camp was removed nearer to the City. But nothing well pleased was the tyrant with any of them. Only he was well apaid, that beyond his hope and expectation, there was no mention at all therein of reducing the exiled persons home into the City. But that which offended and displeased him most was this, that both shipping was taken from him, and also the maritime port towns: for great commodity he gat by the sea. in scouring the coast from the cape of Males with his pyrats and men of war: and besides, the youth and able men of those Cities, served his turn very well to furnish and man his ships with the very best souldiers and men of service that were. And albeit he scanned and considered upon these articles in great secrecy with his friends, yet were they all of them divulged abroad and current in every mans mouth: so vain are these courtiers commonly and hardly to be trusted, as in all things else, so especially in keeping of secret counsell. These conditions were controlled and found fault with, not so much by all men in generall, as by each one in particular, as they took exceptions against those points that touched and concerned themselves. They that had married the wives of the banished, or were possessed of any part of their substance, chased, and stormed thereat, as if they were to lose and lorgo their own, and not to render and restore the goods of others. The slaves who had been freed by the tyrants, were now not only to lo e the benefit of that freedom, but also to endure harder ferviude and bondage than aforetime; setting before their eyes how they should return again mothe houses and hands of their old Masters, angry and incensed now against them. The hired souldiers were male content, for that they saw they should lose their pay after peace concluded ded: and saw full well, that there was no being for them in those States and Cities, who hated the tytants themselves no more than their followers and attendants. At first they muttered and murmured, whilpering these things among themselves in their secret meetings and conventicles: afterwards they mutined, and on a sudden ran and took arms. The Tyrant seeing the multitude disquieted enough of themselves with this tumult, assembled the people to-Ggether. Where after he had declared the conditions imposed upon him by the Romans, and in every article had untruly put to somewhat of his own devising, to aggravate all matters and make them feem more grievous and intollerable, at the rehearing of every particular the whole affembly one while cried out, and another while the fundry parts thereof, fet up a note of atter dislike. Then he asked their opinion what answer they would have him to return in whole Articles, and what to do? They all in manner with one voice accorded and faid, that to no answering of the matter, but that he should plainly go to war, and make no more

ado. And that every man for his own part (as the ulual manner is of a multitude, when they atell together) should take a good heart, and hope the best, saying, that Fortune savoureth Fortunde. The tyrant incited with these their words, seconded them himself & affured them that Anuchus and the Ætolians would take their parts and affilt them: and if they did not, yet were they from enough of themselves, and had sufficient means to endure the siege. No more talking now nor thinking of peace, but every man was ready to run in haft to his teverall quarter, and fland upon their own guard without any rest or repose from thenceforth. The Romans to soon as they law fome few of them to fally out of the City, and to discharge their darts among them, were from put out of all doubt, that no other remedy there was, but they must to war again. After this, there pagsed certain light skirmishes tour daies together at first without any assured issue of good speed either of the one part or the other: but the fitt day after one conflict fought in manner almost of at fet battell, certain Roman fouldiers following the chase upon their enemies, and killing them in their flight, entred the City at certain void places, where the wall was not united : for in that order were the walls built of that town in those daies. Quintius then verily, having well bridled and tamed by this terror his enemies for making any more excursions, and supposing that there remained no more but luftily to go to an affault. fent out certain of purpose for to call the mariners & lea-servitors from Gyttheum, whiles himself in perion, accompanied with the Provost Marshals, rode about the walls to view the fituation of the City. This Sparta in times past stood without murage. And the tyrants of late daies had built walls against the open flats and plain fields. The higher ground and of harder access, they fortified with throng corps de guards of armed fouldiers. instead of bulwarks of defence. When Quantum had infliciently considered every corner, being- K poled there was no other way but to invelt it round about, and thereupon with all his forces united (which being all together Roman Citizens and Latine allies toot and horse, land touldiers and lea-servitors one with another, amounted to 50000 fighting men) he compassed and environed the City. some brought waing ladders, some fire, every man one thing or other, not only to give an affault, but alto to terrifie and amaze them: with direction and express commandment with a loud cry and shout at once in all places to approach the walls. & give the venture upon them; to the end that the Lacedamonians affrighted at one instant on every side, might not know which way to turn tnem, and be to feek, where first to make head against the enemies, and in what place to come with fuccours, Having therefore divided the whole power of his armyimo three parts he gave the one of them in charge to affail that quarter which was called Phabeumil a second likewise to set upon that which is named Distynneum, and the third to force the camon Heptagonia; places alllying open and without a wall. The City being thus leized on all fides with fo great fear, the tyrant moved and troubled to hear those sudden outcries & fearful news brought unto him by halfy messengers: a cording as any place stood most in danger; at the first either prefented himself in proper person or else ient someto help; but atterwards feeing the fear sogeneral, and no one place void or danger, he was so associed, that unable he was either himself to give good direcion to others or to hear theirs. So void was he and distirmished of advice and counfel yeas and bereft of his right wits and fenfes. The Lacedamonians at first hand fustained the forious violence of the Roman in the narrow streights and pussages & at one time in divers places, three armies fought on either fide but a terwards, as the heat of the fight encreased, the service was M nothing equali of both parties; for the Lacedamonians discharged shot from which the Roman foundiers eafily laved themselves, by means of their large targets, and withall much thereof either fell short and besides, or che to feebly flung to om them that little or no harm they could do, For by reason of the streightness of the place, and the mutitude so thronged and thrust together, they had not only no space to take their run, when they should lance their darts (the best means of all other to enforce them but not fo much as fur fooring, and at eale to drive and level them with all their ftrength, Infomnch, as of all the darts and seeches which were directly shot afront them, none at all pierced to their bodies & very tew to more thank in their bucklers. Mary fome hapned to be wounded from the higher places by the other food near unto them, and about their fides, And anon as they advanced forward they classed to be hurt, not only with arrows & darts N from off the houses, but also with tiles and flotes i er ey were aware. But afterwards, they covered their heads with their targets, which they fee to not united together one under the other, featherwise, that not only there was no place and are for the darts thrown and aft at randomafer, no, nor so much as any room for a por o get between, levelled though it were, and aimed near at hand; so as under this target-ter mey approached nearer and nearer infalety. At the first the narrow and straight p stages black with the throng both of themselves and alio of the enemies to thrust and crouded to gether, it id them for a while; but afterwards, when they had by little and little gathered upon the enemies and put them back, and were come into a larger and more spacious threet of the City. then their for eard violence could not possibly be endured any longer. Now when the Lacedamonians corned their backs, and fled apacetogain the higher places for their ventage. Nabis verily for his part trembling and quaking as if the City had beenquite loft, looked about him on every fide, which way himself might escape and save his life. But Pythagoras as in all things else he performed the devoir and part of a couragious Captain, so he was the only cause that the town was not lost: for he commanded to set fire on the honfes standing next to the wall, which in the minute of an hour burned on: on a light stants as being fet forward by the help of those, who otherwise were wont to quench the like learnest

A whereupon the houses came rathing and tumbling down upon the Romans heads, and not only the tileshards, but also the timber pieces half burnt fell upon the armed couldiers, the flame spread fill far and near, and the imothering smoak put them in tear of more danger than was. And therefore, as well those Romans who were without the City in the hottest of their affault, retreated from the walls, as also those that were entred already, for sear lest by the fire behind them they should be separated from their fellows retired themselves, Quintus also seeing how the case stood, cauled to found the retreat; and so being recalled, they returned out of the City which they had as good as won, into the camp. And Quintius conceiving more hope by the lear of the enemies, than of the thing it fell and the service done, never gave over for three daies to terrifie them partly by skimilhing, and partly by intrenching and stopping up certain quarters, that they might have no R paffage at all to fly and shift for themselves. The tyrant constrained at length with these dangers menaced lent Pythagoras again as an Orator unto Quintius, But he at first rejected him, and commanded him to avant out of the camp : yet in the end; after he had made most humble supplication and cast himself profirate at his feet, he gave him audience. The beginning of his speech was this, that he yielded all to the diffretion and former award of the Romans. But feeing that he gainednothing thereby, and that his words took no effect, they grew at length to this point, That monthe same capitulations which few daies before were exhibited up in writing, a truce should hemade, and hereupon was both the money and also the hostages received.

Whiles the tyrant was befreged and affailed, there came post upon post to Argos, that Lacedamon was at the point of being loft: whereupon the Argives took such heart and courage unto Cthem (by reason that Pythagoras with the best part of the garrison souldiers was departed before out of their town) that contemning the small number which remained in their fortress, under the leading of one Archippus, they expelled the rest of the garriton. As for Timocrates of Pellene their Captain, because he had behaved himself in his charge and government gently and mildly, they fent him away alive with fate conduct. At the very instant of this joyfull occurrent, T. Quintiss attived, after he had granted peace to the tyrant, and fent away from Lacedamon, Eumenes and the Rhodians, together with L. Quintins his brother to the fleet. The City of Areas in great joy proclaimed the celebration of their most solemn seast, and those so famous and renowned games and passimes called Nemea, against the coming of the Roman army and their Generall, which they had forelet upon the ordinary time and day, by occasion of the troubles of war. And for the Dhonourof Quintins, they ordained him to be the overfeer of these folemnities. Many things therewere to redouble and increase this their joy and solace to the full. The Citizens were reduced from Lacedamon whom Pythagoras of late and Nabis aforetime had carried away. They allowerereturned home again who had fled and escaped, after the conspiracy of Pythagoras was detected, and the massacrebegun. Now they saw their liberty again, whereof they had lost the fight along time: now they beheld the Romans the authors thereof, and who for their fakes were induced to take arms and enterprise the war with the tyrant. Also, upon the very day of the Nemeangames, the liberty of the Argives was published and proclaimed by the voice of the publike beadle and crier of the City. But look how much joy and hearts content the Achaans conceived in their common and generall Councill of all Aches, for the restoring of Argor into their ancient freedom, so much troubled they were again, in regard that Lacedamon was left fill intervitude, and the tyrant to near unto them ready ever to prick their fides, whereby their joy was not so found and entire. But the Ætolians in all their Diets inveighed mightily against this, saying. That the Romans never gave over the war with Philip before he had abandoned all the Cities of Greece: as for Lacedamon, it was left flill under a tyrant and in the mean while the lawfull and natural King who had been in the Roman camp, and all the rest of the noblest Citizens should live in exile. For now the people of Rome was become a pensioner to guard the body of tyrannizing Nabis. Then Quintius brought back his army from Argos to Elatia, from whence he departed to the Spartan war, Some write, that the tyrant when he fought with the Romans, came not immediatly out of the City; but that he was lodged without by himself full opposite to the Roman camp: and that after he had made good a long time, expecting the aid of the Ætolians, he was driven in the end to a battell, by occasion that the Romans charged upon the forragers and purveyors of his camp: in which battell he was vanquished and beaten out of the field, and trived peace, after that fifteen thouland of his men were flain, and four thousand taken prisoners, and above

At one and the same time in a manner were letters brought both from T. Quintins touching the state, there are a series of from M. Porens the Consul out of Spain. And by order time the State, there was granted in the name of either of them a solemn procession to consider the State, there was granted in the name of either of them a solemn procession to consider the state, there was granted in the name of either of them a solemn procession of considering the considerable of the solemn procession of the solena shout the forrest of Litana, returned to Rome against the generall assembly for election of Magistrates, and created Consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the second time, and T. Sempronius Longus: whose sathers had been Consuls in the first year of the second Punick war. Then the Assembly was holden for the election of Prators, wherein were solen P. Cornelius Scipio, and the two Cneil Cornelius the one Merenda, and the other Bl. sso. Cn. Domitius & Solena for the selections were sinified, the Consul returned again into his Province. That year the Ferentinats assisted to obtain a new privilege: 10 wits, That as many Latines as were enrolled in any Roman Colony, should be Citizens of Rome, But they of Putcoli, Salernum, and Buxentum, who were Coloners and hid a their names entred there, and by that means carrying themselves as Roman Citizens, wereatjudged by the Senat to be no Citizens of Rome.

In the beginning of this year, wherein P. Scipio Africanus was Conful the second time with T Sempronius Longus, two Embassadors of Natio the tyrant, arrived at Rome. For to give them audience, the Senat affembled together without the City in the Temple of Apollo. Their petition was That the peace agreed upon with Quintius might be ratified: and their fuit was granted, Whenir was moved, as touching the government of the Provinces; the Senat (affembled in great irequency) were all of this opinion. That for almuch as in Spain and Macedony the war was ended. both Confuls should have the government of Italy Scipio was of advice, That one Conful was infficient for Italy, and that the other should be employed in Macedony. And why? there was cruell r was menaced from King Antiochus: himself already was passed over into Europe : And what think ye, quoth he, will he then do, when the Ætolians (who doubtless are enemies) of one fide shall sollicit and call upon him forto war, and Annibal, a warriour and commander so renowned for the defeats and overthrows of the Romans, shall prick him forward of the other? Whilesthey debated thus about the Provinces of the Confuls, the Prætors cast lots for their severall governments. The City jurisdiction fell to Cn. Domitius, the fortain to T. Juventius. To P. Cornelius thefu. ther Spain was allotted, and the hither to Sex. Digitins, Cn, Cornelius Blafio had Sicily affigued unto him, and Merenda was charged with Sardinia. It was not thought good that a new army should be transported over into Macedony. But concluded it was, that the army there should be brought back by Quintins into Italy, &discharged, Item, That that the army likewise should be cale y fed, which had ferved under M. Portius Cato in Spain, Irem, That both Confuls should govern Italy, and leav two legions of Citizensto go thither, that when those forces were dismissed and licenfed to go home, which it pleafed the Senat to fet at liberty, there should be eight Roman keiont in all, and no more in pay.

In the former year, when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Confuls, there had been held a folemnity of a facred Spring. But when P. Licinius the high Pontifees made report first to the Colledge of the Priefts, and by the advice and authority of that Colledge, unto the LL of the Councill, That there was some errour committed, and that it was not performed accordingly: the &nators ordained, that it should be done again anew according to the discretion and direction of the Pontifees aforefaid. Also that the great Roman Plaies, which together with that Spring were L vowed, should be exhibited with the accustomed cost and expences: And that all young cattell that fell between the Calends of March, and the last day of April, in that year wherein P. Cornel. Scipio and T Sempronius Longus were Confuls, should be accounted as confectated for that facred Spring above-named. After this, there was an affembly held for the choofing of Centors, wherein were created Sex. Elius Parus, and C. Cornelius Cethegus: who elected P. Scipiothe Conful, Prefident of the Senat, like as the Cenfors before them had done. In the furvey and review of the whole Senat, they left out and discarded three only, and none of them who had born office of State, and fat in the Ivory chair. Great love these Censors won amongst them of that calling and equality, in giving commandment to the Ædiles curule, that at the Roman games and plaies they should fet out places apart from the rest of the people for the Senators to behold the saidy disports. For aforetime they beheld the sports and pastimes all together, without regard and diflinction. Few also of the Gentlemen or Knights of Rome had their horses of service taken from them: and rigorously dealt they with no estate and degree. The porch of Liberty, and the hamlet called Villa publica, were by them repaired and enlarged. The facred Spring was celebrate; and the games vowed by Se v. Sulpitius the Conful, were by them exhibited. And whiles all men were amused and their minds occupied thereupon, Q. Pleminius who had been cast in prison for divers and fundry outrages committed at Locris, to the great offence of God and man, had procuted certain perions, who in the night feafon at one inflant should fet on fire many places of the City, to the end that whiles all the people were affrighted in this night-tumult, he might break prison and escape. This complot was discovered and reported to the Senat by some of them that N were privy and accessary thereunto. And Pleminius was let down into a lower dungeon and there

That year were certain Colonies of Roman Citizens conducted to Puteolis, Vulturnum, and Liternam, and three hundred men planted in each of them. Likewife Coloners of Roman Citizens were brought to Salernum and Buxentum. The Triumvirs who had the placing of them were T. Sempronius Longus, Conful for the time being; M. Servilius and Q. Minutius Thermus. The territory of the Campans was divided among them. Three other also deputed for the like purpole, D. Junius Brutus, M. Babius Tamphilus, and M. Helvius placed a Colony of Roman Citizens in Sipontum to enjoy the lands of the Arpins, Likewise other Colonies of Roman Citizens were planted in Tempfa and Crotone. The lands belonging to Tempfa were won from the Brain O who had expelled the Greeks: and the Greeks remained in Crotone. The Triumvirsfor Crotone were Cn. Oftavius, L. Amylius Paulus, and C. Pletorius: and for Tempfa L. Cornel. Merula, and C. Salonius, Alfo that year were seen at Rome divers wonders and prodigions sights: and some were reported from other parts. In the common place place, in the publike Hall, Comitium, and Capitol, were icen certain drops of bloud. And oftentimes it rained earth. The head of Valcan wason fire. News came that at Interamna there ran a stream of milk. Also that at Ariminum there

A were two Infants both of free condition, born without eyes and note, and another in the Picene country handless and footless. These strange tokens were by order given from the chief Pontifees, looked unto and expiated, and a Novendiall facrifice continued for nine daies, because the Adrians brought word, that in their territory it rained flones.

In Gaulnear to Mediclanum, L. Valerius Flaceus the Pro-Conful, fought a fet field with the French Insubrians and Boians, Which Boians under the conduct of Dorsdacus passed over the river Pedats for to follicit and raife the Infubrians. In which conflict were flain ten thousand enemies, About the same time his Collegue in government M. Percius Care triumphed over Syain. In this triumph he carried in pomp and shew 25000 pound weight of silver in bullion, and in coin 123,000 Bigat pieces : of Oican filver 540 pound weight, and of gold 400000 pound weight. Of g the boory won from the enemies he dealt among his fouldiers that were footmen 270 affes apiece, and trebble fo much to every man of arms.

T. Sempronius the Conful having put himself in his journey toward his Province, led first his legions into the Boians country. Boiorise at that time their Prince with his two brethren, having raifed the whole nation to rebeilion, encamped in certain commodious places: so as it appeared that if the enemy entred their confines, they were ready to give him battell. The Conful perceiving how frong and confident the enemies were, diparthed a courrier to his Collegue, to make haft if he thought to good and come unto him: for until his coming he would fall off, feem to retire and not fight. But the same cause that moved the Conful to stay, gave occasion to the Gauls to make more hafter for befides that the delaying & lingting of the Conful, encouraged the Cenemies, they were defirous to have the triall of a battell before the forces of both Confuls were joyned together. Howbeit, for two daies space they did nothing but stand ready ranged for fight, if any should come forth to brave and dare them. On the third day they approached the trench and rumpier of the Confuls Camp, and on every fide at once gave the affault. The Conin immediatly commanded the fouldiers to arm. And when they were armed, he kept them in awhile, with intent to encrease the foolish confidence in the enemies, and to dispose of his own forces, and give direction, what companies should fally out at every gate. The two legions he commanded to iffue forth under their colours at the two fide gates called Principales: but in the very passage without the Gauls stood thick and made head again, so that the way was stopped up. A long time they fought in those very straights. And they bestirred themselves no more with their hands and twords, than they preffed one upon another with their bodies and targets : whilesthe Romans firived to advance their enfigns out of the gates, and the Gauls endeavoured no less, either to enterthemselves within the camp, or else to impeach the Romans for going fonh. But in this conflict there was nothing between them either won or loft, no ground gained the one of the other, before that Q. Victorius a principal Centurion of the Pilani in the fecondlegion, and C. Atinius, a Tribune or Marshall of the fourth, caught the banners from the enlign-hearers (a thing often practifed in time of extremity) and flung them among the enemies. For whiles these laboured and strained themselves to recover each one a banner, they of the second legion first brake through and got forth of the gate: so as now, they maintained skirmish without the trench, and the sourch legion stuck still in the gap. By which time there arole another tumult and notice in the contrary fide of the camp: for the Gauls were broken in at the Questors gate (or the gate against the * Questorium) and sain those that valiantly *The quarter made head and held them play; to wit, Luc is Posthumius a treasurer surnamed Tympanus, and lodging to the state of the s Marcus Atinius and Publius Sempronius two Colonels of the allies, and well near two hundred of the Treasures. souldiers besides. Thus the camp on that part was won, untill such time as one extraordinay cohort was fent from the Conful to defend the Quæstors gate aforesaid: which either slew hole that were within the rampier, or elie drave them forth, and so withstood those that would have rushed in. And much about that very time the fourth legion also with two extraordinary squadrons brake forth at the gate. Thus at once there were three severall battels in landry places about the camp: and the diffonant cries and noties (according to the divers occhions of each party ministred by their sellows) turned and withdrew the minds and spirits of those that were in fight, from the present skirmish before them. In this manner maintained they the fight till noon: equally matched in strength and number, and little or no odds between them for hope of victory: but, tedions travell and extremity of heat compelled the Gauls (whose bodies are lost and open and soon running to sweat, and who of all other things can least away with thirst) to abandon the battell: and those few that remained behind, the Romans tan upon, ruffled their colours, and chased them into their own hold. Then the Consul sounded the retreat: at which fignall given the most part retired themselves; but a fort of them, upon a bot defined fight, and good hope to be Masters of their camp, persisted still, close to their trench. The Gauls diddaining their small number issued all forth out of their Camp: and then the Romans being discomfited, were glad now of themselves for fear and fright to crudge unto the flittenth of their own hold, which they would not retire upto at the commandment of the Conful. Thus on both fides there was one while victory, and another while fearfull flight: howheit, when all cards were told and the reckoning made, the Gauls had the worft of the Some: for of them were flain eleven thousand, whereas of Romans there died but five thouand then the Gauls retired themselves into the most inward parts of their country, and the Confolmarched with his legions to Placentia. Some write, that Scipio and his Collegue with this joynt forces, invaded and spoiled the countries of the Boians and Ligurians, so farforth h as they could pass for woods and bogs: others again record, that he having done no memorable exploit at all, returned to Rome about the affembly for election of Confuls.

The same year T. Quintins spent the whole winter season at Elatia (whither he had retired his forces for winter harbour) in hearing mens causes and ministring justice to every one; also in reforming and redreffing all fuch dilorders as had passed in the States and Cities, through the licentious government and jurisdiction either of Philip himself or his Captains, whiles he advanced those tay ourits of his own faction, and put down the right and liberty of others. In the beginning of the spring he came to Corinth, where he had given summons, that there should be holden a general Diet of the States. There in the affembly of all the Embassadors and agents from the Cities, gathered about him as it were to hear an Oration, he made a speech unro them; beginning I first with the amity contracted between the Romans and Greece: and proceeding to the acts atchieved in Spain by the Generals afore him, and those also of his own, All that he ipake was heard and received with great applause, untill he touched the point concerning Nabis: for it was gene. rally thought unfitting, that he undertaking to fet all Greece at liberty, had left a tyrant (not only a grievous oppressour of his own subjects, but also dangerous to all the Cities about him) to remain fill as a fearfull malady tetled in the very bowels and heart of a most noble and renowned State, Quintins, not ignorant of their affections and dispositions, confessed, that he should not indeed have any ear at all to the motion or mention of peace with the tyrant, in cale that Lacedemon could have flood in fafety without so doing: but now fince that Nabis might not possibly be confounded and overthrown, without the present ruin and searful downfall of the City, he w thought it a better course in policy to leave the tyrant enseebled and disfurnished of all means "to offend and hurt any man, than to suffer so goodly a City to die in the cure, and under the " hand as it were of the Physician, amidst those quick and sharp remedies which it were never a "ble to eudure: and to in feeking to recover liberty, to perish and die for ever. And after he had "discour ed of things past, he interred, that his purpose and intent was, to go into Italy, and to " have away with him his whole army : also that within ten daies they should hear news how all "the garrifons had quit Demerrias and Chaleis: and that he would deliver out of hand unto the "Acheans in their very light, the fortrels of Corinth: that all the world may know, whether it be the Romans guise, or the fashion of the Ætolians, to over-reach and lie; who in their common " talk have not let to discourse, to sow surmises, and to buzze into mens heads that it wasdan-I es gerous for Greece to put their liberty into the Romans hands: & that they had but made anex-"change of their lordly ruler; admitting the Romans in lien of the Macedonians. But as forthern "(quoth he) their tongue is no flander, being such persons as never took heed and made regard what either they did or faid, But the other Cities he advertised to weigh their friends by deeds "and not by words: to be wile and well advised whom they are to truft, and whom they are to " bewage of: to me their liberty in measure and moderation; which if it be well tempered and et qualified, is good and wholfome to particular perfons and generall States : but excellireif it be, "it would not only be grievous and unsupportable to others, but also unruly, dangerous, and per-" nicions to themselves that have it. His gave them counsell, that the Princes and States in each "City should maintain contord not only among themselves, but also with all other in one com-M "munity: for fo long as they accord and agree together, no King nor tyrant should be strong e-"nough for them: whereas discord and sedition maketh overture and openeth easie way to ene-" mies that lie in wait for the vantage; confidering that the fide which in civil contention is the "weaker and goeth to the walls, will band rather with a forrainer, than give place and stoop to a "Citizen. In conclusion, he advised them, to keep and preserve by their carefull regard, this their "liberty purchased for them by forrain forces, and delivered unto them with faithfull security of "frangers and aliens; that the people of Rome might fee, that they have given freedom to well "deferving people: and this their great benefit hath been well bestowed upon worthy persons. Whiles they hearkned to these sage admonitions as uttered out of the mouth of a very father, the tears gushed plenteously out of their eyes for kind heart and joy; infomuch as they troubled him in the delivery of the rest of his speech. For a white there was a plausible noise heard among them as they approved his words, and advited one another to ponder thelefage fayings, and to imprint them deeply in their hearts, proceeding as it were from divine oracle. Afterfilence made, he requested them to seek up all those Roman Citizens (if haply there were any) who lived in servitude and flavery among them, and within two months to lend them into him into The flat: for it were a great ignominy and shame even for them, that in their constries there should remain in bondage any of those, by whose means they themselves were set free and delicered out of one dage. With that, they all cried aloud with one voice, That for this above all the refer my rended thanks unto him, in that they were admonished and warned by him, to perform their deroit and duty, so honest so religious, and so necessary. Now a mighty number there was of captives in the Punick war; fuch as Annibal (when their triends redeemed them not by ranfome) hadfold in open market. And how great the multitude of them was, this may prove and tellifie which count of Livy, Polybius writeth ; to wit, that this cost the Achaens for their part * one hundred telente and yet a talentinthis they ordained and fet down, that there should but 500 Denarii be rep id unto their Masters place amount for the redemption of every poll: for by this account Achae had 1200 of them. Addnow unto teth to 187 lie them as many as all Greece was like to have by that proportion Land see what number may arise.

A The affembly was not broken up and dismissed, before they might see the garrison descending from the fortrels of Corine h, who marched directly to the gate and went their waies. The General presently followed after and being accompanied with them all, who called him with a loud voice. Their Saviour and Redeemers he took his leave and bad them farewel: and so returned the same way he came to Elatia. From thence he font his Ligutenant Ap. Claudius with al the forces, commanding him to conduct the army to Origins by the way of I heffalie and Epirus, and there to expect and wait his coming: for he purposed there to take Sea and set over his army into Italy, He wrote also to L. Quinting his brother and Lieutenant, and Admiral likewise of the fleet, to gather all the ships of burden from along the Sea coast of Greece into that place. Himself went to Chalcis, and having withdrawn the garrifons not only from thence but also from Oreum and Ere-B tria, he held a general Councel there of all the cities of Enbaa; and after he had made remonfrance unto them in what case he found them, and in what estate he lest them, he dismissed the assembly, From thence he departed to Demetrias, where also he removed the garrison, and being attended with a train of all the citizens, like as at Corinth and Chalcis before, he took his journey into Theffalie: Where the cities were not only to be fet free, but also to be reformed, and from a general ditorder and confusion wherein they stood, to be reduced and framed into some tolerableorder and form of government. For they were not only tainted and injected with the corruption of the times, and the violent current of licentions outrage, which had taken head under the government of the King; but also of an inbred troublesome spirit and humor of their own, wherby, since their field beginning and uprising, even unto our daies they never held Parliaments. Electi-Cons, Diets, Councels or any other assemblies what joever, without much trouble and sedition. He chole the Senate and Judges there in regard especially of their wealth, and in all Cities he made that pare more mighty, unto which it was more expedient and beneficial to have all quiet and in peace. Thus having visited Theffalie, and taken a general review thereof, he came by the way of Epirus to Oricum, from whence he minded to cross the seas. From Oricum all his forces were transported to Brundusium, and so they passed forward throughout Italy to the City of Rome, in manner of triumph, sending before them as great a train of prizes by them taken, as they made themselves in their march. After they were come to Rome, the Senat assembled without the City for Quintim where he had audience to declare and discourse of his worthy exploits: and willing they were to grant him triumph, according to his deserts. Three daies together he rode in D triumph. The first day he made a shew of all the armour, as wel defensive as offensive, also of brasen andmathle images, of which he had taken more from King Philip, than he found in the faccage of the cities. The second day there was carried in pomp, the gold and filver both unwrought and wrought into plate, yea, and cast into coin. Of silver unwrought there was 1 8000 pound weight: of wrought, 270 pound weight. Many vessels of plate of all forcs, and most engraven; some of right curious and exquisit workmanship. Likewise brasen vessels, cunningly and artificially made: and befides, ten shields of filver, and in coin eighty four thouland Attick peeces of filver, which they call Tetradrachma, weighing almost four Roman deniers apeece: of gold there was three thousand seven hundred and sourteen pound weight, and one shield sull and whole of beaten gold and of Philip golden peeces in coin, fourteen thousand five hundred and fourteen. The third Eday were born in view for a pageant, a hundred and fourteen coroners of gold, which were the presents of Cities given unto him. Moreover, there were led that day the beasts for sacrifice : and before his charior went many noble prisoners and hostages, and among them, Demetrius, King Philip his son, and Armenes the son of Nabis the tyrant, a Lacedæmonian born. Then rode Quintius himself in a chariot into the City, and a great number of souldiers sollowed after, by reason that his whole army was retired with him out of his province. To every sootman he gave two hundred and fifty Affes, duple as much to a centurion, and triple to an horieman. Those who were redeemed out of captivity, followed his chariot with their heads shaven, and much beautified the glory of the triumph. In the end of this year, Q. Elius Tubero a Tribun of the Commons, presented a request or bill F unto the people, and they granted and enacted it, to wit, that two Colonies of Latins should be conducted, the one into the Brutians countrey, and the other into the territory of Thurium, For the conduct and planting whereof, there were ordained three Deputies called Triumvirs, whose commission was inforce for three years, namely, Q. Nevius, M. Minutius Refus, and M. Firius Craffiper for the Brutians : and for Thurium, A. Manlius, P. Elius, and L. Apuftius, Forthechufing of these officers, Cn. Domitius the Pretor in the City, called two several affemblies in the Capitol. In that year were certain Temples dedicated, one of Inno Sofp sa in the herb-market, which had been vowed and fet out to building four years before, by C. Cornelius the Conful, during the war with the French: and he in his Cenforship dedicated it. Another Temple of Faznus: the Ediles C. Scribonius and Cn. Domitius, had likewise bargained for the building thereof two years G before, and laid by the money therefore; and this Cn. Domitius being now Pretor of the City dedicated it. Also Q. Minutius Ralla, dedicated a Temple to Fortuna Primigenia upon the hill Quitinalis, having been created Duumvir himself for that purpose, Sempronius Sophus had vowed the lame ten years before, in the time of the Punick war and agreed for a certain price to have it built. Also C. Serviling the other Duumvir consecrated the Temple of Inpiter within the island. Vowed it was fix years before in the Gauls war by L. Furius Purpurio Pretor, and by him afterwards

palled that year.

(when he was Conful) order was given for the edifying thereof. And these were the affairs which

P. Scipio returned out of his Province and government of Gaul for the election of new Con-H fuls, and to that purpose was the general assembly summoned; wherein were chosen L. Cornelina Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The next morrow after were created Pretors, L. Cornelius Scipio, M. Fulvius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Meffala, L. Porcius Licinius, and C. Flaminius. C. Attilius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo, Ædiles of the chair, were the first that exhibited the Stage-plaies called Megalefia. And the Roman plaies or games represented and set out by these Ædiles, the Senat now first and never before beheld apart from the rest of the people. And this (as all novelties and new fashions) ministred much talk: whiles some gave their opinion and said. That now at length that was given to this most noble and honorable State, which long ago was due; others again confirmed thus, and gave out, "That whatfoever was added to the Majefly of "the Senators and Nobles, was derogatory from the dignity of the people : and that all such kind I " of diffinctions, whereby estates and degrees are severed one from another, are prejudicial as well to common peace as publick liberty. For these five hundred and eighty years say they, the plaies and gemes have been beheld and looked upon in common, without any such precise discovered to the process of the process "ference. What new accident is suddainly befaln, why the Nobles should not be willing tole "the Commons be intermingled with them in the Theatre? and why a rich man should dildain " his poor neighbour to fit by him? This is a new appetite and strange longing of theirs indeed, " full of pride and arrogancy, a thing never defired nor taken up and practifed by the Senatof any " nation whatloever. So as in the end even Africanus beshrewed himself (men say) and repented thereof, for that he in his Confulship moved and perswaded the bringing up of this new fashion. So hard a matter it is to alter an old custome, and make a new order to be well liked of, K And men are ever more willing to keep them to ancient customes, unless they be such, as prastile

and experience do evidently check and condemn,

In the beginning of the year, wherein L. Cornelius and Q. Minutius were Confuls, news camelo thick of many earth-quakes, that men were not only weary of the thing it felf, but also of the holy-dayes and solemnities that were published and proclaimed in that regard. For the Confuls could not intend either to affemble the Senate and fit in Councel, or manage the affairs of the Common-weal, for being wholly emploied about facrificing and appearing the wrath of the gods, In conclusion, the Decemvirs were commanded to peruse the books of Sibylla, and according to their answer and direction, a procession and supplication was for three dates solemnied. Andbefore the Altars and Shrines of the gods and goddesses, they made their praiers with garlands and I coronets on their heads: yea, and commandment was given, that every houshold and family by it self should fall to their praiers and devotions. Also the Consuls by order from the Senat made proclamation, That upon what day a feast or folemnity was ordained by occasion of one earthquake, no man the same day should bring news of another. Then the Consuls cast loss for the government of their provinces, and after them the Pretors did the like. Unto Cornelius befell Garl, and to Minutius the Ligurians; C. Sempronius had the charge of the civil jurisdiction, and M. Valerius of the forrain; L. Cornelius governed Sicily, L. Porcius Sardinia, C. Flaminius high Spain, and L. Fulvius the lower. The Contuls looked for no war that year: but even then are that instant were letters brought from M. Cincius Lord President of Pifa, which gave notice, what twenty thousand Ligurians were up in arms, having conspired together in all market Towns and M places of refort throughout the whole nation, and that they had already wasted the territory of Luna, and having invaded and passed through the Pilan Land, had over-run also the Sea coalis. Wherefore Minutius the Conful, unto whom the government of Liguria was allotted, by the advice of the LL. of the Senat mounted up into the pulpit Roftra, and published an act, That those two legions of Roman citizens, which the former year had been enrolled, should within ten daies present themselves at Arctium, in lieu whereof he would levy two other legions out of the City. Also he commanded the allies and Magistrats of the Latin nation, and their Embassadors leagers, who owed knight-fervice, and were bound to find fouldiers to come before him into the Capitol. And from among them he enrolled fifteen thouland foot and five hundred horle, according to the number of young and serviceable men that were to be found in each State: which N done, he commanded them forthwith, to go directly from the Cepitol to the gate of the City, and presently to take musters that all might be done with greater expedition. Unto Fulving and l'laminius were appointed three thousand Roman footmen and two hundred horsemen apeece, for to supply and strengthen their forces: also five thousand foot to either of them of allies of the Latin nation, with two hundred horie. Moreover the Pretors were charged to dismis and cass the old fouldiers, so soon as they were arrived into their provinces. Now, when as the fouldiers who were enrolled in the City-legions, reforted thickunto the Tribuns of the Commons, that they should take knowledge of as many of them as were exempted from warfare, for that they elther had served out their full time by law appointed or were fickly and diseased: behold the letters of Sempronius dashed all this, and cleered every difficulty and scrupulosity: whereinit was written, that fifteen thousand Ligurians were entred the territory of Placentia, and had made great wast and laccage therein putting all to fire and sword as they went, even as far as to the very walls of the Colony it felf, and the banks of * Padus. Also that the nation of the Boii made countenance and gave suspicion of rebellion. In which regards seeing there was a tumultuous and suddain war toward, the Senat passeda decree, wherein they signified that it was not their pleasure that the Tribuns should accept any excuses pretended by the souldiers, but that they should all

A meet and affemble together, according to the Edict. Over and besides they gave order, that the allies of the Latin nation, who had served in the armies of P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius and were dicharged from fouldiery by them being Confuls, should now be ready to shew themselves, against shat day which L. Cornelius the Conful should appoint, and at what place soever of Herragame that the fact that the faid L. Cornelius the Conful in his march and journey toward the Province, might take up, enrol, and arme, what fouldiers he thought good, out of all the burroughs and villages in his way, and have them with him whither foever he would, yea, and have commission to dilmits whom of them he thought good, and when soever he listed at his good pleasure.

After that the Confuls had taken musters, and were gone into their Provinces, then T. Quin-B tiss demanded to have a day of audience in the Senate concerning those affairs that he had concloded with the affifiance of the ten Delegats above faid: and that it would please them to confirm and citabilith the same by vertue of their assent and authority. Which they might do with morecase, in case they would hear the Embassadors themselves speak, who were come out of all Greece, a great part of Asia, and from the Kings. These embassies were admitted into the Senat by C. Seribonius the Pretor for the City, and all dispatched with a gratious answer. But because the dispute about Antiochus required long time of debate, therefore it was referred and pur over to the ten Delegats, of whom some had been in Asia, or at Lysimachia with the King. And Quintius was commanded, that together with those said Delegats he should hear what the King his Embillidors could fay, and to return unto them such an answer, as might stand with the honor and Cwelise of the people of Rome. The chief of this embassingefrom the King were Menippus and Hegefanax. Then Menippus began and faid, "That he knew no such perplexed difficulty in their embissage, considering they were come simply to treat for peace, and to contract a league and al-"liance, For, faith he, there are three forts of confederacies and affociations, whereby States and "KK, ordinarily conclude league and amity one with another. The first, when they that are van-"quished in war, have conditions and articles imposed upon them: for when all is yeelded into the hands of him that is the mightier and more puissant, then it is in his power and at his dif-"cretion and will, to give unto the conquered party what he lift, or to take from him as he "pleaseth. The second is, when they that are equal in warlike forces give over on even hand, and "be content to make peace and amity, upon indifferent and equal conditions, one with the other: D "in which case, demand and claim is made, restitution and amends performed according to the accord and agreement : and if in time of the wars, any have been molefted and troubled in their "polletion, they fall to composition either by the form and tenor of ancient law, or respective to the good and profit of both parties. The third is, when they that never were enemies, meet "and confer together about concluding some friendship, by way of solemn alliance and society, "who neither give nor take any conditions: for that belongeth properly to Conquerors, and "those that are conquered. Seeing then that Antiochus is comprised in this last kind, I marvail ((qd, he) that the Romans should think or say, It is reasonable to tender articles unto him, or " to prescribe and set down, what Cities of Affathey would have to be free and exempt, and "which they would have to be tributary: and into what Cities they would expresly forbid the E 'King his gattisons, or the King himself to enter and set soot. For in this wife ought they to "make peace with Philip their enemy in times past, and not to draw a contract of amity and asso-"ciation with Antiochus, a friend at this present. To this Oration Quincins shaped his answer in "this fort, " For asmuch as it pleaseth youto make your speech thus distinctly by way of divisi-"on, and severally to reherse all kinds of confederacies and accords, I also will set down as methodically in order two conditions, without which, you may let the King your mafter to understand, that he must not look to entertain any friendship with the people of Rome. The one is this, "that if he would debar us to intermeddle with the Cities of Afia: he likewise himself have no-"thing to do with all Europe. The other, that if he cannot contain himself within the compass of "Afa.but will needs encroach upon it the Romans likewise may have liberty and power both to "maintain those amities which they have already, and also to entertain new with the States of "Afia Hereat Hegestanax inserred and said, "That this was an indignity intolerable, and which "he could not abide to heat, namely that Antiochus should be distaized of those Cities of Thrace "and Cherfonefus, which Seleucus his great grand-father had conquered with fingular honor from King Lyfimachus, whom he vanquished in war and slew in field, and setted the same in him as "his nightful inheritance. As for the same cities possessed by the Thracians, Antiochus himself with asgress praife and glory hash partly by force of arms regained out of their hands, and partly re-"peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat, and namely, Lyfimachia it felf, as all the world feeth: and more than that, hath re-edified to his e exceeding charge and expense, those that lay along in their ruins, and were consumed with fire. What likenes then is there between these two demands: namely that Antiochus should quirthe "possession of that which either he acquired or recovered in that fort : and that the Romans "hould ablain and forbear Afia, which never appertained unto them? To conclude, Aniochus faith he) is desirous of the Roman friendship, but in such terms as may stand with his honor, & "not purchase himself thame and reproach. Then Quimius rejoyned again in this manner: "For "almuth as.od.he, we balance and weighthings according to honefty (as in truth it is befitting the chief and principal flare of the world, and so great and mighty a King to prize that only or at Cleattwife principally above all other regards) I would gladly know of you. Whether ye thinkir H of more honest of the twain, either to will and wish that all the Cities of Greece whatloever and " wheresoever should enjoy liberty: or to make them homagers and tributary? If Antiochue "thinketh it be an honorable thing for him to reduce into servitude and bondage as his own, "those Cities which his great grand-father held by right of arms, and whereof neither his father on or grand father afore him were in possession: the people of Rome likewise essential matter " rial point that toucheth their faithfulness and constancy, not to forsake the Greeks, whose pro-" tection and defence they have enterprifed and taken in hand. And like as they have freed Greete out of the hands of Philip fo they intend to deliver those Cities of Asia which are of Greekish " race and descent, from the subjection of Antiochus, For the Greek Colonies were not sent into & Rolis and Ionia, to live in servitude under the King, but to increase and multiply, that a most I ancient nation might spread over the face of the whole earth, Now when as Hegefianax knew not how to shift and turn himself, and could not deny but that the cause of liberty which the Romans pretended in the title of their quarrel, was of more honefly and credit, than that other of flavery: Let's lay away all these circumstances of words (quoth P. Sulpitius, the ancientest person of all the ten Delegats) and choose ye one of the two conditions which even now were expelly offered unto you by Quintins, or elle make no more talk about amity with the Romans. Then quoth Menippus, As for us, we may in no case, neither will we capitulate and covenant any thing prejudicial to the Kingdom and royal flate of King Antiochus. The morrow after Quintins when he had brought all the Embassies of Greece and Assa into the Senat, that they might know what affection the people of Rome carried, and what mind Antiochus bare to the Cities of Green, he K declared before them all as well his own demands, as those of the Kings part: willing them to make report unto their own Cities, and affure them, that the people of Rome would maintain themagainst Antiochus (unless he departed out of Europe) with the same vertue, valour, and fideling wherewith he had defended their liberty against Philip. Then Menippus was earnest with Quintius and the LL. of the Senat, befeeching them inflantly not to proceed in haft to a decree whereby they should set all the world introuble and uprore; but both take leisure themselves and give respite unto the King to deliberat farther of the matter: for no doubt, upon the relating of the conditions, he would consider upon them, and either obtain somewhat at their hands, or for peace lake yeeld his confent to all. Thus was the matter wholly and entirely deferred and agreed it was, that the same Embassadors should be addressed unto the King, who had been with himat L Lysimachia, to wit, P.Sulpitius P. Villius, and P. Elius.

Scarcely were they gone from the City and entred upon their journey, but Embassadors arrived from Carthage, who reported, that without all doubt Antiochus made preparationfor war, and therein u.ed the hand and ministery of Annibal: in so much, as it was seared also that a third Punick war would break out withal. Annibal, as we faid before, having fled his native countrey, repaired unto Antiochus, and was in great account and estimation with the King, forno other canse and posicy in the world, but that the King who projected and plotted long time in his spirit to levy war upon the Romans, could find no man more fit than Annibal to break his mind unto, and with whom to discourse upon a matter of such consequence. Annibal his song and refolution was ever one and the same still, namely, To make war within Italy: and that Italy was M able to firnish a forrain enemy, with men munition, and victuals. For this he cast with himself and considered, that if all were quiet there and no troubles set a foot, but that the people of Rome might with the forces and riches of Italy, furnish themselves to make war without Italy, there was no Monarch nor nation under the iun able to make head against the Romans. He demanded therefore to have the command of 100 close ships with hatch and deck, 16000 foot, and 1000 horse: and with the said fleet he would first sail into Affrick, where he assured himself that he should be able to sollicit and induce the Carthaginians to rebellion: but if they held off and made it goodly and strange, yet would he settle in some part of Italy and levy war against the Romans. His advice and counsel furthermore was, that the King should with all his other forces pass into Enrope, and in some one part of Greece keep his power together, and not to take the Sea, but to be N ready ever to cross over; which would be sufficient to make a shew and raise a bruit all abroad of war. When he had perswaded the King to this designment and resolution, supposing that he was likewile to found and prepare the hearts afore-hand of his own countrymento this purpole: he durst not dispatch any letters unto them, for fear they might chance to be intercepted by the way, and to discover the whole plot. He hapned at Ephefus upon a Tyriau one Ariston, a man whole industry and dexterity he had tried in some small services wherein he had imployed him. Him he plyed with gifts in hand, but fed him more with large promifes of great rewards, which King An tiochus also himself scemed to make good and give his word for; and so sent him to Carthage with credence and instructions. He acquainted him with the names of all those persons with whom he was to talk and confer: he furnisheth him with secret tokens, whereby they might o affuredly know, that he was no counterfeit, but came with a message from him. Now whiles this Arillon Conversed in Carthage, the friends of Annibal knew no sooner about what errand he came, than his very enemies. At the first, much talk and discourse there was in every corner of the City where they met and at their feafts and merriments, of this matter. Afterwards at their councel tahle some stuck not to say, that the exile of Annibal was to little or no purpose, if whiles he was abjent he could contrive and compais new plots, and by folliciting and tempering mens minds

A disquier and trouble the state of the City. There is a stranger, say they, one Ariston a Tyrian, hither come with instructions from Annibal and King Antiochus: certain men there are, that daily have privy conference with him, and devile in fecret of that, which anon will break out to the utter ruin and overthrow of all. "Whereupon they all cried with one voyce to convent Ariston pe-"remptorily before them, and to examine him about what bufiness he was thither arrived; and un-"less he would bewray & declare the matter, to send him with Embassadors of purpose, to Rome: "For why? we have (fay they) felt the fmart enough, and paid sufficiently for the folly and rash "head of one harebrained man already. Let privat persons bear their own load hereaster, and at "their own peril commit a trespais: provided alwayes, that the Common-weal be preserved clear "not only from all fault, but also from all apparance and bruit of any such intent. zirifton being B called before them, frood fliffy upon his integrity and excused himfeif, and evermore used this for his belt and furest defence. That he had brought no letters at all to any perion : how beit he could not render a ready & found reason of his coming thither; but especially he was shrewdly troubled and put to his trumps when they charged him, That he had talk and communication with those only of the Barchine faction. Hereupon arose some debate and altercation in the house; whiles some were of opinion that he should be apprehended for a spie, and clapt up fast in ward: others again were of mind that there was no cause to make such a stir and tumult; for it was an evil prefident to be given, that strangers coming to their City, should be troubled and hardly intreated: and the like measure no doubt would be offered to the Carthaginians in Tyrus & in other Towns of mar, handile, whereunto they use to have resort for exchange and traffique. So for that day the matter was put off. grifton framing himself to play the crafty Carthaginian among these Carthaginians, wrot: 2 certain bill, and in the shutting in of the evening, hung it up in the most conspicuous and publick place of all the City, even over the feat where the head Magistrate useth daily to fit, and himself about the third watch gar to shipboord and escaped. The morrow after, when the Sufferes were let on the bench to minister law, the bill aforelaid was feen, taken down, and read: whereinto this effect was written. That Arifton was not come with a meffage to any perfor in patticular, but to all the Seniors or Elders in general (for fo they call the Senat.) After that the thing was by this means made a publick matter, and the whole state of the Senators reputed culpable they were not so earnest to search into privat persons. Howbeit thought good it was, that Embaffadors should be lent to Rome to give information hereof to the Confuls and the Se-Dut, and withal, to make complaint of certain wrongs done by Mafaniffa.

Mafaniffa understanding that the Carthaginians were suspected and in some ill name among the Romans, and also at jur and variance within themselves; and namely, that the great and principalmen were had in jealously by the Senat for their conferences with Ariston; and their Senate likewisesuspected by the people by reason of that writing above-named of the said Aristonicaking this for a good advantage and opportunity to do them some injury, not only invaded their maritime parts and made spoil, but also sorce I certain tributary Cities to the Carthaginians for to pay himself tribute. That quarter of the countrey they call Empiria. It is the Sea coast of the lesser Syrtis, and the country is exceeding fertile: there is in it one only City named Leptis, which paid to the Carthaginians for tribute, a talent every day. All this region Mafaniff a then had plagued fore, Eyea, and for one part thereof he made fome claim, as being litigious whether it pertained to his Kingdom, or the Seignory of the Carthaginians: and because he knew for truth, that the Carthaginian Embassadors were about to go to Rome, as well to purge themselves of some crimes wherewith they were charged, as to complain of him; therefore himself also addressed his Embassadors to Rome, who should lay open more matter against them of deeper suspition, and debate with all as touching the right of those tributes. The Carthaginians were no sooner heard speak concerning that Tyrian stranger but the LL of the Senat grew into some doubt lest they should wage war with Antiochus and the Carthaginians both together. And this prefumption of all the rest made the supicion most pregnant, because when they had the party among them and were purposed to send him to Rome, they neither made the man himselfsure, nor the bark wherein he arrived. After this, Filey fell to debate and argue with the Kings Embassadors, about the territory and land in controversy. "The Carthaginians pleaded for themselves, and stood much upon their bounds and li-"mits, for that the land in fuit lay within that precinct, by which P. Scipio the Conqueror limited "out that territory which pertained to the seignory of the Carthaginians. Also they alledged the "Confession of the King himself, who at what time as he pursued Apheres, that sled out of his own "tealm, and with a company of Numidians ranged abroad about Cyrena, made request unto them "to give him leave to pass through this very ground, as if (without all question) it belonged to the Carthaginians. The Numidians answered again to these points & said plainly to their faces, "that they lied in their throats, as touching that supposed limitation and bounding by Scipio: "and moreover, if we would go (fay they) and fearch the very original indeed of the law, what "land at all ought the Carthaginians have of their own proper inheritance? For being but meer "strangers, they had after much praier and entreaty, as much ground allowed them and no more, "to build them a City in, as they could compais with thongs cut out of one bull hide. And look "whatfoever they had encroached upon; without that nest and seat of theirs in Byrfa they gat and "held it by force and violence. And as for the land now in strife, they are not able to prove, that "they alwaies held the same in possession, no, nor that they kept it any long time together. But as "Occasion and opportunies served of advantage, one while they, and another while the Numidian

"Kings made reentry and enjoied it, and evermore he went away with the possession thereof H "that was the ftronger, and had the keener fword. In these confiderations they requested the Roto mans to leave the thing in that state and condition, wherein it stood before that the Carthania " nians were enemies, or King Masanisa friend and allie to the Romans; and not to intermeddle between nor take a part, but let the winner wear it, and him have it that can hold it. Incominfion, it was thought good, that to the Embassadors of both parties this answer should be returned namely: That they would fend certain Commissioners into Affrick, to decide this controversy about the land in question, between the people of Carthage and the King. So there were lent of purpole, P. Scipio Africanus, C. Corneliu Cethegus, and M. Minutius Rufus. Who having heard what could be faid, and feen the thing, left all hanging fill in suspence and undecided without adjudging it by their definitive fentence to the one or the other. But whether they lo did, on their I own head and felf-accord, or by direction from the Senat, is not fo certain as it feemeth agreeable unto that prefent time in policy, to leave them as they found them, and the controverse till depending. For unless it were so, Scipio himself alone, in regard of the knowledge that he had of the thing and of his authority with the persons (so much bound they were unto him on both sides) might with a word of his mouth, or a nod of his head, have ended all this matter.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and thirtieth Book.

Publius Scipio Africanus being fent Embelfador unto Antiochus, talked at Ephelus with Amibil (who had fined with Antiochus) to this end that he might rid him of that fear which he had cur ceived of the people of Rome, as touching the taking away of his life. Among other matters paffedbitween them, when he demanded of Annibal, whom he judged to have been the noblest and greatest warior that ever was he unswered, that it was Alexander King of the Macedonians: for that he with a small 1 power had discomfited and defeated an i finite number of armies, and withal, passed throughthose far diffite and remote parts of the world unto which a man would not believe that it were possible for any per-Son to go and see them. I hen he ask a again of him whom he deemed for the second: Who but Pythus (qd.he) because he taught the manner how to pitch a camp & besides, no man had the cest to gain places and holds for advantage nor could fet his corps de guard or plant garrifons better than he. Ardwhenke proceeded still to know whom he tout to be the third, Annibal named his own good (elf. At which answer Scipio fella laughing: And what would you I ave faid then (qd. he) if your hap had been to have vanquilhed me? Marry then (fouth he) I would have fet my felf before Alexander, before Pyrshus, and before all other. Among other prodictions lights, whereof there were reported very many, it is faid, that in the year wherein Cn. N the beginning of that year wherein these affairs thus passed. Sext. Digiting Pretor in high Spains fought battels (rather ordinary, and for number many when or he wife memorable and worth the peaking) against those States, whereof after the departure of Comaster what rebelled. And those battels for the most part were so unfortunat that hard' he could deliver up to his successor the one half of those souldiers which he had received. And doubtless of Spain would have taken heart again, if the other Pretor P. Cornelius Scipio, the fon of Corne, bed not fped better in many of his conflicts beyond Iberus. Upon which terrour no fewer than bity cood Towns revoked unto him, And these exploits performed Scepio as Pretor, Who also in quality of Propretor, encountred the Lustans upon the way, as they returned homeward charged with 1 mighty great booty railed out of the bale Spain, which they had neverly pilled and spoiled whee O he fought from the third hour of the * day unto the eight, with doubtful event. For number of fouldiers he was inferiour to his enemies, but for all things else he had the vantage and wentbeyond them. For his bataillons were well appointed and close compacted of armed men and so he charged upon the enemies marching in a long train, and the same encumbred with a deal of cartel: besides, his souldiers were fresh and in heart, whereas the other were wearied with long travel. For the enemies fet forth at the third watch, and befides their night journey they had marched three hours also of the day, and without any repose or rest at all, they came to a conflict prefently upon their travel on the way. And therefore at the beginning of the battel, so long as they were in any heart, and their strength served, they troubled and disordered the Romans with the fint charge they gave; but afterwards for a while they came to be equal in fight. In which hazard of donbrial iffue the Propretor vowed to fet forth certain folemn games to the honour of Jupiter, in case he might discomfit the enemies, and kill them in chase. At the length the Romans advancedforward more hotly, and the Lustrans retreated, yea, and anon turned their backs quite. And when as in this train of victory the Romans pursued them hard in the rout, there were of the enemies fluin upon 12000, 500 and forty taken pritoners, all in manner horsemen; and of military Benigns they carried away one hundred thirty and four. Of the Roman army leventy and three only were loft. This battel was fought not far from the City Hips. And thither brought P. Cornelim his victorious army, enriched with prey and pillage. Which was laid all abroad before the Town, and every man had leavegiven to challenge and claim his own. All the reft was given to the Treasurer for to be fold, and the mony raised thereof, was parted among the fouldiers.

Now had not C. Flimmizs the Pretor asyet taken his leave of Rome, when these things fell out in Spain, and therefore both he and his friends talked and discoursed much upon these occurrents both good and bad : and for almuch as a great war in his Province was broken out to a light fire, and him'elf was to receive from Sext. Digitius but a small remnant of an army, and the same timorous still and still of fright, as not well recovered of their former flight, he had affaied to bring about that the Senat would affign unto him one of the City-legions; to the end that when he had joined thereto those fouldiers which himself had enrolled according to an order set down by the Senat, he might out of all that number chuse forth six thousand and five hundred sootmen, and three hundred horsemen. With which legion (for in the army of Sext. Digitius he reposed small confidence) he minded to make war. The ancient Senators denied and faid, That acts of the Senat were not to be made upon every flying tale and report fet abroad and blazed by some particular persons in savor, of Magistrats. Neither would they hold any thing for certain, but that which either the Pretors themselves wrote out of the Provinces, or Embassadors sent of purpose, related. And if there were any such commotion and trouble in Spain, they were of advice that the Pretor should levy in hast without Italy, such tumultuary souldiers, as in that case were usually taken up. D The intent and mind of the Senat was, that fouldiers should in that fort be prest out in Spain. Valerius Antias writeth that C. Flaminius both failed into Sicily to levy and muster men, and also as he made fail from Sicily toward Spain, was by wind and tempest put with the shore of Africk: where he found certain fouldiers dispersed over the countrey, remaining of the army of P. Africannot of whom he took a military oath to fer te him in his wars: and that to thefelevies railed intwo Provinces. he joyned also a third in Spain.

The war of the Ligurians likewife grew as fast : for they had already befieged and invested Pifa with forty thousand men: and thisher resorted and flocked dayly unto them great multitudes as well for hope of pillage, as upon the bruit and rumor that went of the war, Minutius the Conful came at the day appointed to Arctium, which was the Rendezvous where he had commanded all his fouldiers to meet him: from whence he marched with a fourfquere Battailon toward Pile. And when the enemies had removed their camp a mile from the City on the other fide of the River, the Consus entred the Town, which no doubt by his coming he preserved. The next day himself also encamped on the other side of the River, almost half a mile from the enemies, from which place he made light skirmishes with them and saved the territory of his allies from the excursions and robberies of the enemies. He durst not as yet try a battail in pitched field, as having but row and new fouldiers, and those gathered out of many kinds of men, and not so well known among themselves, that one might furely trust another. The Ligurians bearing themselves bold of their numbers, not only came forth into the field ready to bid battail, and hazard all upon a throw: but having multitudes at commandment and to spare, sent out into all parts sundry com-Fpanies to spoil and raise boories as far as to the marches and trontiers of the countrey. And when they had gathered together much cattail and great store of pillage, they had a strong place of defence ready at hand, well manned and guarded, by means whereof all was convoyed into their barroughs and Towns.

Thus while the Ligurians war was settled about Pifa, the other Conful L. Cornelius Merula control with his army by the utmost confines of the Ligarians into the territory of the Boians: where the war was managed far otherwise than with the Ligurians. For the Consul entred the field in buttail array, but the enemies fell off, and would not fight. In fo much as the Romans feeing none to come forth and present themselves, ran abroad into all parts to speed their hands with pilee. And the Boians chose rather to suffer their goods to be ransacked making no resistance, 6thanto fave the same with the hazard of a battail. The Conful when he had wrought his pleainte and confirmed all with fire and sword departed out of the territory of the enemies, and marcled toward * Mutina lecurely without any regard of himself, as through a peaceable country of * Modena his riends. The Boil perceiving one that they were gone out of their limits, tollowed after with affill and filent march, seeking some convenient place for to lay an ambush. And having in the high: leason passed beyond the Roman camp, they seised themselves of a streight passage within a falinels, through which of necessity the Romans must pais, and there they for layed them.

* After Sun.

This was not so closely carried, but the Consul had an inkling thereof: and therefore whereas H his manner was to fet out in his march early in the morning, long before day light, now for fear left the darkness of the night should increase the terror of a tumustuary skirmish, he waited for the day. And albeit the fun was up before he removed and fet forward, yet he tent out a Troop of horiemento icour and discover the quarters. And after he was advertised by these etpials what number there was of enemies, and in what place they were, he commanded that all the baggage and carriage of the whole army should be bestowed in the mids, and that the Triani should stake and pale it all about, whiles he with the rest of his forces marched in order of bat. tail, and approached the enemy. The like also did the French, after they once saw that their ambufh and trains were detected, and that they must of necessity fight a let pitched battail, where down right blows, clean ftrength, and pure valour, was to carry away the victory. Thus about I the second hour of the day they affronted one another. The left wing of the horiemen of the al. lies and the extraordinaries fought in the vanguard, under the conduct of two Lieutenants that had been Confuls, to wit, M. Marcellus, and T. Sempronius, Conful the year before. The new Conful one while was in the front of the battail, another while at the tail to keep in the legions, left for eager defire of fight they should advance forward to the conflict before that the fignal was given. Asfor the men of arms belonging to the legions, he commanded Quintus and P. Minni-Mr. Marshals or Colonels, to bring them forth, and conduct them without the battailinto a large plain, from whence out of the open ground they should on a suddain charge the enemies, when he gave them a fignal by found of Trumpet. Thus as he was marshalling and directing hismen, there came a messenger from T. Sempronius Longus with a sepore, that the loo'e Extraordinav K fouldiers aforefaid were not able to abide the violence of the Gauls: that very many of them were flain, and those that remained, partly for weariness of ravail, and partly for leatful cowardice began to quail their heat of fight : and therefore if he thought to good, he should send one of the two legions to succour, before they had received fart er dishonor. Whereupon the second legion was fent, and the Extraordinaries retired themselves out of the battail, Then began the couffict anew, by reason that the souldiers came in fresh and in heart, and the legion besides was complete and fully furnished with all her companies : the left wing of horsemen aforesaid was retired out of the battail, and in lieu thereot, the right wing advanced into the fore-front. By this time thefin with extreme (corching heat rofted and fried the bodies of the Frenchmen, which of all things can least abide heat: howbeit, standing with their ranks thick and close together, one while they L leaned one upon another: other whiles they refled and bare themselves upon their targets, and sustained the violence of the Romans, Which when the Consul perceived, he commanded C. Livius Salinator who had the conduct of the light horse in the wings, to send in the quickest horse in all his company, with ful carrier to break their ranks: and gave charge that the legionary horiemen should abide behind in the reregard. This tempest and storm of Cavalry first shuffled and put in dilaray the battail of the Gauls, and afterwards brake their ranks and files clean yetnotlo, that they turned their backs : for why, their Captains and Leaders would not suffer them, laying about with their truncheons upon the backs of them that so trembled for fear, and forced them again into their ranks: but the light horsemen aforesaid riding among them would not permit them to stand to it, and keep their place. The Consul for his part encouraged and exhorted his M fouldiers to flick to it awhile, for the victory was in their hands; and to charge fill upon them to long as they saw them disordred and affrighted : for if they suffered their ranks to close again they should abide another conflict, and the same perhaps doubtful and dangerous. The Ensign-bearers he commanded to advance their banners: and thus at length with putting all their power and good will together, they discomfited the enemy, and put him to flight. After they shewed their backs once and took them to their heels, running away on all fides, then the legionary horiemen were sent out after to follow the chase: fourteen thousand Boians that day were flain, a thousand and nine hundred taken prisoners alive: 221 horsemen, three of their Leaders, and of Ensigns were won 212, and chariots 63. The Romans likewise won not this victory so cleer, but it cost them some bloud. For of their own souldiers and allies together, there died above five thousand, N 23 Centurions, besides sour Colonels of Allies, and two Marshals of the second legion, to wit, M. Genutius, and M. Martius.

At one and the felf fame time in manner, both the Confuls letters were brought to Rome. Cornelins his letters, touching the battail fought at Mutina with the Boians: but the other of Q. Minutius from Pifa, were written to this effect, That whereas by lot it belonged to him to hold the assembly for the election of new Magistrats, yet considering in how doubtful terms of hazard his affairs flood in Liguria, that he might not possibly depart from thence without the utter ruin of the alies, and hinderance of the weal publick: therefore if it might feem fo good unto the LL of the Senat, he would advise them to fend unto his brother Conful, That he, who had finished his war, might return to Rome for to hold the foresaid general affembly for the election: but incase O he should think much thereof, because this charge properly appertaineth not to him; he promised them, that himself would do whatsoever the Senate should think good. But he requested them to consider and be well advised, Whether it were not more expedient for the commonweal to proceed rather to an interreign, than that he should leave the Province in that state of jeopardy. The Senat herenpon gave in charge to C. Scribonius for to fend two Embaffadors bow of Senators calling, unto L. Cornelius the Conful, who should carry also with them unto him the letters of his colleague written and fent unto the Senat: and withal, to let him understand. that unless he would come himself to Rome for the election of new Magistrate to succeed, the Senat would suffer an interreign rather than call away Q. Minutius from the war unfinished, and wherein he was wholly employed. The Embassadors that were sent, brought word back, That L. Cornelius would repair to Rome himself for the chusing of new Magistrats. As touching the letters of L. Cornelius, wherein he gave them to understand, what happy issue & success he had in the barrail with the Boians; there was some reasoning and debate in the Senat-house: for M. Clandius his Lieutenant had written other letters privately to most of the Senators, to this effect; That they were much beholden and bound to give thanks unto the good fortune of the people of Rome, and the valour of the fouldiers, in that they sped so well as they did: for by means of the Con-R fill, not only there were a good number of men loft, but also the army of the enemies was escaped out of their hands, when they had fit opportunity presented unto them, of a final defeat and overthrow thereof: and that by this occasion there was a greater number of the fouldiers miscarried; for that they who should have rescued and succoured those that were distressed, came too late out of the reregard: and the reason why the enemies got away and escaped was this, because the legionary horsemen had not the signal soon enough sounded unto them, and could not possibly purine them in the chaire. Therefore as concerning that point, they would not determine any thing rashly and hand over head, but the matter was referred and put over to a more frequent affem-

Agreater object there was to trouble their heads; for the City was much oppressed with usu-Cry: and albeit the avarice and covetouinels of men had been well gaged and bridled by many laws concerning usury, yet there was a cautelous device and shift found out, to avoid all statutes in that behalf : to wit, that all obligations should pass in the names of allies, and be sealed unto them, who were not tied and bound to observe the laws aforesaid. By which means the creditors enwrapped their debtors in what bonds they lift, and forced them to pay extream interest as they would themselves, without stint. For to see into this disorder and enormity, and to redress the same it was thought good and order taken, to set down and limit a certain day, namely, upon which the usurers were last restrained. From which day all those allies should come in and declare and profess, what mony they had put forth upon usury to any citizens of Rome; and that the creditour should have right to recover those monies put forth from that time, according to such n conditions as the debtor would himself. Hereupon, after there were discovered great sums of money and debts contracted by this fraudulent practile, M. Sempronius a Tribun of the Commons, by advice of the Senat propounded a law, and the Commons allowed it, That the same course of putting our money practifed between citizen and citizen of Rome, should likewise be in force amongthe allies of the Latin Nation. In this fort went matters in Italy, both within the City of Rome, and also in the wars abroad.

In Spain the war was nothing so much as the bruit that ran thereof. C. Flaminius in high Spain, wan Ilacia, a Town in the Oretans countrey: after which exploit, he laid up his fouldiers in their winter harbour. And in winter time there passed (ertain light skirmishes (not worth the naming) against the excursions of brigands and theeves, I may rather say, than enemies: and E yet the fortune was variable, and not without some loss of men. As for M. Fulvius he atchieved great matters: for he fought in a ranged battail with banner displaied against the Vacceans, the Vectores, and the Celtiberians, before the Town Toletum; where he discomfited and put to

Whiles these things thus passed in Spain, the day drew neer, of the solemn election of Magistrats at Rome: and therefore L. Cornelius the Consul having left M. Claudius Lieutenant in the atmy, came to Rome: who, after he had disconssed in the Senat-house of his own exploits, and in what estate the province stood, he complained to the LL, of the Senat, that considering so great a war was brought to an end, by one battail so fortunatly and happily fought, there was no solemnity to the honour of the Gods, performed in that behalf. Over and bef des, he demanded, That Fthey would decree a procession and triumph withal, But before the Senators were to deliver their opinions to this demand, Q. Metellus, who had been Consul and Distator, rose up and said, "That there had been letters brought at one and the same time; both from the Consul Cornelius "to the Senat, and also from M. Marcellas to a great many of the Senators, and those letters impor-"ting contrarieties: whereupon the confultation of that matter had been deferred and put off, to "theend that it might be argued and debated in the presence of them both, who wrote the let-"ters: and therefore I ever looked (quoth he) that the Conful (knowing especially that his Lieu-"tenant had written and informed somewhat against him, and considering that himself was to re-"pair to Rome) would have brought him also with him; seeing that it had been more meet and befitting him to have delivered the army to T. Sempronius, one that was in the commission and had a command, than to a Lieutenant. But it should seem now, that he was lest behind far enough off of very purpose, for fear he would avow and justifie personally his hand-writing, and charge him face to face: and that if the Conful should make report of any untruth, he might be challenged therefore, and the thing fifted and canvased, until the truth appeared clearly and came to light: and thereforemy opinion is (quoth he) that nothing be determined at this present, as touching the demands of the Conful. But when as he perfifted notwithstanding, and followed the fuit still, namely, that they would ordain a solemn procession, and that himself might enter the City, riding in triumph: then Marcus and C. Titinins, both Tribuns of the Commons, proteined, it that they would interpole their negative, and cancel the order of the Senat in that behalf.

The Cenfors for that time, were Sex. Elius Patus and C. Cornelius Cethegus, created the year before, Cornelius took a review of the City and numbred the people; and there were accounted by his survey 143704 polls of Citizens. Great flouds arose that year, and Tyber overflowed all the flats and plain places of the City: and about the gate Flument and certain houses and buildings were overthrown withal, and laid along. The gate Calimontana befides, was firitken with lightning, and the wall about it was likewise blasted from heaven. At Aricia, Lanuvium, and in mount Aventin, it rained stones. And reported it was from Capua, that a great swarm of Walos came flying into the market place, and fetled upon the Temple of Mars; which being with great care taken up and gathered together, were afterward confirmed with fire. In regard of thelepm. I diojous tokens, order was given, that the Decemvirs should search and peruse the books of Sibylla; whereupon a novendial facrifice (to continue nine dayes) was appointed, a publick procession solemnized, and the City was cleansed and hallowed. About the same time M. Porcius Cato, dedicated the Chappel of Virgin Victory, neer to the Temple of the Goddels Victory, two years after that he had vowed it. In that year also the Triumvirs, C. Manlius Volso, L. Applius Fullo, and P. Ælius Tubero, (who had preferred a bill of request about the planting of a Colony) had commission granted, to conduct a Colony of Latins into the countrey of Thurium ; and this ther went three thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen; a small number in companion of the largeness and quantity of the territory. There might well have been set out thirty acres for every footman, and threescore for an horseman: but by the motion and advice of Apullius, one K third part of the Lands was excepted and referved, to the end, that afterwards in time, they might eprol new Coloners if it pleased them. And therefore the footmen had twenty acres, and the horsemen forty apeece.

Now approached the end of the year, and more ambition there was, and hotter fuir for place of dignity in the election of Confuls, than ever had been known any time before. Many mighty men, as well of the Patritii and nobles, as the Commoners, stood and laboured hard for the Confulfhip, to wit, P. Cernelius Scipio, the fon of Cnew, who lately was departed out of Spain after he had atchieved many worthy deeds. L. Quintius Flaminius who had been Admiral of the navin Greece, and Cn. Manlius Volfo, all of the Nobility. But of the Commons were C. Lelius, Cn. Domitins, C. Livius Salinator, and M. Acilius. But all mens eyes were fixed upon Quintius and Corneli-L us: For they defired one place, being both of them nobly descended, and their fresh glory for seas of war, recommended both the one and the other. But above all other things, the brethrenof these competitors two most renowned warriors of their time, set the debate on a light fire. The glory of Scipio, as it was the greater of the twain, so it was more subject to envy. The honour of Quintius was more fresh, as who that yeer had newly triumphed. Over and besides, the one of them had been now almost ten years continually conversant in the eyes of men (a thing that maketh great men not to highly regarded, by reason that they are grown stale, and the world is full already of them) also he had been twice Consul, and Centor fince he vanquished Annibal, Butin Quintius all was fresh and new, to win the good grace and favor of men. And more than that he neither after his triumph had obtained ought of the people, nor, to say a truth, requested any M thing. He alledged, that he made fuit for his own natural and whole brother by both fides, and not for a Coulin German; in the behalf of a very companion and pattaker with him in the managing of the war (for as himfelf ferved by Land, to his brother performed many exploits by fea.) So he obtained, that Quintius should be preferred before his competitor, whom Africanu and his brother [Afiaticus] brought in and graced, whom the whole race of Cornelii feemed to countenance even then when a Cornelius, Coniul, was prefident of the election and held the assembly whom the Senat had given to grave a teltimony of, in adjudging him to be the best man simply in all the City, and thought most worthy to receive the goddess, dame Idea, coming from Pessinato the City of Rome. Thus were L. Quintius, and Cn. Domitius Anobarbus created Confuls, in fuch fort, that Africanus was of no credit, and bare no stroke at all (ye may be fure) in the election of N a Conful out of the third effate of Commons, albeit he emploied himself, and did his beffor C. Lalius. The next day after were the Pretors elected namely, L. Scribonius Liko, M. Fulvius Centimalus, A. Attilius Serranus, M. Babius Tamphilus, L. Valerius Tappus, and Q. Salonius Sarra, Inthis year M. Emplius Lapidus and L. Emplius Paulus, the Cenfors, bare themselves so in their office, as they made their year to be notable and much spoken of. They condemned and fined many of the City grafiers or farmers of the common pastures: and of that money which arose of their americaments, were certain gilded shields made, which were set up on the finial or lantern of Jupiters Temple. They made one terrace or gallery without the gate Trigemina, with a marchants Hall or Burse adjoined thereto, neer Tyber: and another from the gate Fontinalis they built in length as far as to the Altar of Mars, leading to Mars field.

For a long time nothing was done in Liguria worth the remembrance. But about the end of the year twice were the Romans in great jeopardy: for both the camp of the Conful was visited and hardly defended, and also not long after, as the Roman host marched through a streightpals, the army of the Ligurians kept the very gullet of the passage, and the Conful seeing he could not make way through, turned his ensugns, and began to retire the same way hecemes but by that time, some of the enemies had gained also the back part of the pass, insomuch as the lamentable remembrance of the Caudine overthrow, not only prefented it felf to their spirit and mind, but also was in manner an object to their eye. Now had he amongst his auxiliary or aidforces, to the number almost of eight hundred horse. Whose Captain promised the Consul, that he and his would break through whither way he would, let him only buttell him which of the ne quarters were better peopled and inhabited: for the first thing that he did, he would fire their Willages and houses; to the end, that the sear and fright thereof might force the Lightians to depart out of the chase which they held and beset, and run to succour their own neighbours. The Conful commended him highly, and fed him with hope of large rewards. Whereupon the Numidians mounted on horseback, and began to ride about the corps de guard of the enemies, without offering to charge upon any man. At the first, a man that had seen them, would have thought nothing more contemptible, being both men and horse, little, spare and gaunt. The horsemanunarmed and without weapon, save that he carrieth about him some light darts: the horses without bridles; and as they ran shutting out their sliff necks, and bearing their heads forward without any reining at all, they made a very ill favoured fight. And the riders, for to make themselves more despised, would on purpose seem to take fals from their horses, and made their enemies good sport. Whereupon they (who if at first they had been assilled, would have been heedful & ready to have received the charge) now fat fill (many of them unarmed) to behold this pleasant pastime. The Numidians would gallop toward them and presently ride back again, but so, as by little and little they gained ground, and advanced neerer to the pals, yet making temblance, as if they had had no rule of their hories, but were carried thither against their wils. At the last they ferfours to their horses indeed, and brake through the mids of the enemies guards and so soon as they had recovered the open ground, they fet on fire all the houses neer the high way fide, and fo forward they burnt the next village they came unto, and destroied all afore them with fire and fword First, the smoak that was descried, afterwards, the ontery heard of them that were aftrighted in the villages, and last of all, the children and old folk that fled to fave themselves, made a trouble and hurlyburly in the camp: infomuch, as every man of himfelf without advice, without warrant or direction, made what haft he could to run and fave his own. Thus in the turning of an hand, the camp was abandoned, and the Conful delivered from fiege, arrived thither where he intended. But neither Boians nor Spaniards (with whom that year the Romans made war) were so spitefully and maliciously bent against them, as the whole nation of the Ætolians. They at the very fiff were in very good hope, that presently upon the remove of the forces out of Greece, Antiochus would have entred Europe, and seized upon the vacant possession thereof: and that neither Philip nor Nabis would be in rest and do nothing. But seeing them not to stir in any place, they thought it high time to make some trouble and confusion themselves, for fear lest by delayes and lingring, all their defignments would turn to nothing: and therefore they published a Diet or Councel to be holden at Naupastum. In which affembly Thoas their Pretor, after he had made grievous complaint of the wrongs received by the Romans, moving and folliciting the state of Evolia (for that they of all other nations and Cities of Greece, were least honoured and fet by after that victory, whereof they had been the cause) gave his advice, That there should be Embassiadors fent to all the neighbour Kings, not only to found their minds and affections, but also to incite and prick them every one forward to enter into arms against the Romans. So Damocritus was addressed to Nabis, Nicander to Philip, and Dicaarchus the brother of the Pretor unto Antiochus. Dimocritus had in commission to fignify unto the tyrant of Lacedamon, " That by the loss of his "maritime Cities, the very strings and sinews of his tyranny and Kingdom were cut in sunder; "For from thence was he furnished with souldiers, from thence had he his ships and servitors at "Sea: whereas now, he might see the Achaens LL, and rulers of Peloponnesus whiles himself was pinned up and encloted within his wals, and never should he have opportunity to recover himfelf, if he let pals this that presently was offered unto him. No Roman army was now in Greece: "and never would the Romans think it sufficient cause, to pass over the Seas with their legions into Greece, for any occasion of Gyetheum or other Laconians inhabiting the Sea-coasts. These realons were laid forth to inceniethe courage of the tyrant, to the end, that when Antiochus was once passed over into Greece, he being touched in conscience, that he had broken the Roman league, by committing outrage upon their allies, might of necessity join and band with Amtochus. Semblable remonstrances and reasons used Nicander for to provoke and perswade Philip: and "much more matter he had to enforce that point, as the King was deposed from much higher de-"gree of estate than the tyrant had been, and also had sustained far greater losses. To this, he " alledged the ancient name and renown of the KK, of Macedony; and how that nation had over-" runthe whole world and filled all places with their noble conquests & victories. Moreover he "faid, That he advised him to take a course, which was lase both to be enterprised, and also easy to "be executed. For he gave not Philip counsel to stir, before that Antiches were passed over with "anarmy into Greece and confidering that he without the aid of Antiochus had maintained war "fo long against the Romans and Etolians, what possible means had the Romans to withstand him affilted with Antiochus & the Ætolians his allies, who even then were fiercer enemies than "the Romans? Over and besides, he inserred this reason also, what a brave and doughty Captain " Annibal was, a man even born to be an enemy to the Romans, and who had flain already more Eleaders and fouldiers of theirs than were left behind. These were the allegations of Nicander to "Philip. As for Dicaarchus, he had other motives to perswade with Antiochus, First, and principally above all others, he affirmed, "That howfoever the prize and boosy of Philip fell to thell "Romans, the victory was gained and atchieved by the Actolians, and none but they either gave the Romans entrance and passage into Greece, or surnished them with forces for the per-"formance and accomplishment of the victory. Then he shewed and made promise what power as well of foot as horie they would prefent unto Antiochus toward his wars, what places they "would give him for his land-forces, and what havens and harbours for his Arength and army at "Sea. After all this he fluck not (to ferve his own turn) for to over-reach and tell a loudlie as "touching Philip and Nabis, in giving our confidently that they were both of them ready and at "the point to renuewar: and would take the vantage of the very first opportunity and occasion that could be presented, to recover those things which by war they had loft. Thus the Etolians laboured to fet all the world at once upon the top of the Romans. Howbeit, the KK, were either not moved at all with their folliciting, or bestirred them more slowly than they looked for. But as for Nabis, he tent immediatly about all the Towns by the Sea fide, certain persons of purposeto fow discord and kindle seditions among them: and some of their principal citizens he won by gifts and presents to his own purpose and designments: but such as stifly continued fast and firm in alliance and allegeance with the Romans, those he made away and murdred. Now had T Quistins given in charge and commission to the Achaans, forto guard all the Laconians that dwik upon the Sea-coasts: and therefore presently they both dispatched their Embassadors unto the Tyrant, to put him in mind of the confederacy and affociation with the Romans, and to warn him and give him advertisement, that in no wife he would trouble that peace, which he had so earneftly craved and fought for : and also sent aid unto Gittheum, which now the tyrant began tor affault; yea, and addressed other Embassadors also to Rome to give intelligence of these occur-

Antiochus the King after he had that winter time given his daughter in marriage to Ptoloman the King of Egypt at Rhaphia a City in Planicia, retired to Amiochia; and in the very endofthe tame winter, patied through Cilicia over the mountain Taurus, and came to Ephefus. Andlion thence in the beginning of the Spring after he had fent his ton Antiochus into * Syria for to delend and keep in obedience the utmost frontiers of his Kingdom, lest in his absence there might arise some troubles behind his back, he marched with all his Land-forces against the Pisidians, who in-

Villius, who as we said before IR ifa carpaffe. had been fent unto Antiochus with direction first to visit K, Eumenes, arrived at * Elea, and som thence went up to * Pergamus, where Eumenes kept his royal court. Eumenes was defirous inhis heart that Antiochus should be warred upon: supposing verily, that if he were at peace, being Prince fo much mightier than himself, he would be but an ill and dangerous neighbour so neer unto him: but if war were once afoot, that he would be no moreable to beard and match the Romans than Philip had been: and that either he should wholly be overthrown and cometo utter ruin; or if, being vanquished he had peace given unto him by the Romans; then, as helost much thereby and would be weaker so himself should gain by the bargain, and grow mightier, that alterwards he might be able easily of himself to make his part good, and hold his own against him, without the help and aid of the Romans: or if any misfortune should happen unto him, he were w better by far, to hazard any fortune what soever in the Roman society, than either alone to endure the Lordly dominion of Antiochus and he subject, or in resusing to obey, he compelled thereto by force and arms. For these causes he employed all the credit and authority he had yea; and addusted all counsel that he could devise for to prick on and set forward the Romans in this war. Sulphinu remained behind fick at Pergamus. But Villius advertised that the King was occupied and bused in the Pisidian war, went to Ephesus: and whiles he abode there some few dayes, he enderoused and made means to have conference oftentimes with Annibal, who haply at that time sojourned there, both to found his mind if possibly he could, and also to secure him of all sear from the Romans. In these meetings and communications, no other thing passed nor was done betweenthem, But see what ensued hereupon of it self, as if it had been a thing wrought and compassed of meer pollicy. Annibal by this means was less fet by and in smaller credit with the King, yea, and in all matters began to be more and more suspected and had in jelousie, Claudius (the Historian) who followeth the Greek books of Acidius, writeth that P. Africanus was joyned in that embaffage, and that he talked and devised with Annibal at Ephesus; and namely, maketh report of one conference and speech between them twain and that is this Africanus demanded of Annibal whom in his judgment, he took to have been the greatest commander for feats of arms, that ever was to which he made answer, that he judged Alexander the King of the Macedonians was simply the most excellent warrior; in this regard, that he with a small power had deleated innumerabless mies; and besides had passed as far as to the utmost bounds of the whole earth, even to those lands, that a man would think incredible for any one to reach unto. And when he asked again whom he deemed worthy to frand in the second place: he answered, that Pyrrhus was the man; for that he first raught how to pitch a camp and above all other points of military skill no man knew berter to choose our commodious ground and places of advantage, or more cunningly to plant and di posegarrisons: besides he had such a sleight and dexterity to draw and win men unto him, that the Italian nations had rather have been subject to him a forein Prince, than to live under the peop'e of Rome, notwithstanding they had of long time the Seignory and rule of thole parts. All

The five and thirtieth Book of T. Livius. A when he proceeded fill to know whom he reputed for the third, he made no flicking at the marter but named himself. Whereupon Seipio took up a laughter and replied again: What would you fay then, if your hap had been to have subdued me ? Mary then, quoth he, I would think I were worthy to be fet before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, yea, and before all other martial men and commanders in the whole world. At this answer, Seipio took delight and pleasure, to see how subtilly and cauteloufly he had like a curning Carthaginian, couched his words in a certain kind of flattery, as if he had sequestred him from out of the range and rank of all other Captains as being by manydegrees incomparable, and far above allothers. Then Villius went forward from Ephelus to Anamea: and thither Antiochas also repaired for to meet him, hearing of the coming of Roman legats, In this communication and conference at Apamea, the matter was debated much after the B same fort, as it had been at Rome between Quintins and the Kings Embassadors. But the news of Antiochus the Kings son his death whom I said a little before to have been sent into Syria) brake off the peace, Great mourning and lorrow there was in the Kings Court, and much was that young Prince miffed and moaned, for, that good proof he had given of himself, that if he had lived any long time; he would have proved by all likelyhood of his towardness, a great, a mighty, and a righteous King. The deerer and better beloved he was of all men, the more inspicious was his death: and namely, that his father doubting that he would pressforward and be instant to succeed himin his old age, took order by the ministery of certain Eunuchs or guelded men (persons greatlyaccepted with Kings for such services to have him poisoned. And they say, that another cause also set him forward to commit this secret act, because having given the City Lysimachia to his C fon Selencus, he had no such place to bestow upon Antiochus his son, for to keep his residence in, whereunto he might have removed him farther off from his own person, under colour of doing himhonor. Howbeit great semblance and shew there was of much mourning and lamentation all over the court for certain dayes: infomuch as the Roman Embassador retired himself to Pergamuspecause he was loth to converse there uncivilly, at so unseasonable a time. The King returned to Ephelus, and give over the war that he had enterprized. Where, the courtgotes being thut by occasion of the mourning time, he devised and consulted in great secret with one Minio an inward friend unto him, and whom of all other he loved best, and trusted most. This Minio, a meer strangerandaltogether ignorant inforein affairs and forces, measuring and effeeming the power and greatnes of the King by his exploits done in Syria or in Afia, deemed verily, that Antiochus had n not only the better cause, in that the Romans demanded unreasonable conditions; but also should have the upper hand in the tryal thereof by war. When as now the King refused to have any conference and dispute with the Embassadors, either for that he knew by good experience that it would be bootless for him so to do, or because he was troubled in spirit upon this late and fresh object of grief and forrow: Minio undertook the business, and professed that he would speak to the point of the matter and to good purpole: and to pertwaded the King to fend for the Embaffadors from Pergamus. By this time Sulpitius was recovered of his ficknes, and therefore both of them repaired to Ephefus; where Minio excused the King, and in his absence they began to treat about their affairs. Then Minio with a premeditate oration began in this wife. "I fee well (qd,he) " that you Romans pretend unto the world a goodly title of fetting free the Cities of Greece, but E"your deeds are not answerable to your words: and ye have set down unto Antiochus one man-"nerof law to be tied unto, and practife your felves another. For how cometh it about that the "Smymeans and Lampfacens should be Greeks, more than the Neapolitans, the Rhegins, and "Tarentins, of whom you exact tribute and require ships by vertue of the accord and covenants "between you? Why fend you yearly to Syracuse and other Greek Cities of Sicily, a Pretorin "foveraign authority, with his rods and axes? Certainly, ye have nothing else to say, but that ye "have subdued them in war, and by right of conquest have imposed these conditions upon them. The like, yea, and the fame canse know ye that Antiochus alledgeth as concerning Smyrna, Lamp-"facus, and other Cities and states of Ionia and A. lis. For having been conquered in war by his "ancestors and progenitors, having I say been made tributary and liable to impositions, he chal-F" lengeth of them the ancient rights and duties due from them, and to him belonging. And there-"fore if ye will debate and treat the question according to equity and reason and not rather pick "quarrels and feek occasions of war I would gladly know what ye wil answer to him in this point? "Tothis Sulpitius made answer in this wife. " Antiochus (qd. he) hath done very well, and with "good regard of modesty in that having no other matters to plead unto for his defence and the "maintenance of his cause he hath made choice of any other rather than himself to be the speaker. For what one thing is there alike in those cities which you have named and put in compa-"rifon Of the Rhegins, Neapolitans and Tarentins, we demand that which is our due according "to the deeds of covenants indented, and hath ever been fince time that first they were in subje-Conunder us; that I say which we have challenged and enjoyed by vertue of one continued G" course and tenor of right, by us ever practifed without any intermission or interruption. And "are you able to avouch, that as those nations neither by themselves nor by any other, have altered and changed the accord between us and them; so the Cities of Afia, when they once became "hbjeft to the ancestors of Antiochus, remained alwayes in the perpetual possession of your Kingdom? And not rather, that some of them have been under the obessance of Philip & others obedient to Ptolomae? Yea and divers of them for many years have been free & used their own liberties without contradiction, and no words or doubt made thereof? For admit this one

"that (because these Cities somtime were in bondage through the iniquity of those times where H "in they were oppressed) there shall be a right pretended, and the same be effectual to reduce "them again after so many ages into servitude? What wanteth it but ye may as well iay, that we the have done just nothing, in delivering Greece out of the hands of Philip? and that his successors "and pofferity, may claim again and lay title to Corinth, Chalcie, Demetrias, and thew hole Thefis-66 Jian nation? But what mean I to maintain the cause of the Cities of Greece, whom it were more "meet and reasonable, that both we and the King himself would give audience unto, and let them er plead what they can for their own selves? With that he commanded the embassages of the Cities to be called in, which were prepared and instructed aforehand by Eumenes, who made this reckoning, that what foever firength went from Antiochus, should accrue and come unto him and his Kingdom. Many were admitted to speak : and whiles every one set forward his own cause, I fome by way of complaint, others in manner of demand, each one putting in for himself without regard of right or wrong, to he terved his own turn, they fell at length from reasoning to warbling and wrangling: in io much, as the Embaffadors returned to Rome as uncertain and doubtful in all matters as they were when they came, without releasing or obtaining any onething at all. When they were dismissed and gone, the King held a Councel as touching the Roman war. In which affembly, some delivered their opinion more freely and flourly than others: but generally the more bitter speech that any one used against the Romans, the greater hope he had to enterinto especial grace and favour with the King. One above the rest, inveighed much and spake against thole proud and insolent demands of the Romans, who imposed hard laws and conditions upon Antiochus, the mightieft King of all Afra as if he had been no better than Nabis, whom they had K conquered and inbdued. And yet (faith he) they left unto Nabis some seignory and dominion in his own countrey and City of Lacedamon: whereas if Lamplacum and Smyrna should be at the command of Antiochus, they deemed that an unworthy thing and a very indignity. Othersonned and faid, "that those two Cities were but imall causes, and not worth the naming, for so, puissant " a Prince to stand upon and to war for. But alwayes (fay they) men begin with just and reasona-66 ble demands, to make an overture and way to compais and obtain that which is unjust. Unless one would believe, that when the Persians requested of the Lacedamonians, water and earth, " they flood in need of a clot & turf of ground, or a draught of water. In like fort for all the world the Romans do but found and try the King, in their demands touching these two Cities, For o-"ther Cities likewife, fo foon as they shall perceive that those two have shaken off the yoked L " obedience, will foon revolt and turn to that people which is their deliverer, and at whole hands they hope for liberty. And lay, that freedom were not to them more dear and pretions than 6 bondage yet it is the nature of every man to feed and please himself with a bare hope of a change " and new world, much more than with the affured hold of any present state whatsoever. There was in place at this councel, Alexander of Acarrania, one who somtime had friended Philip but of late dayes was faln from him and followed the court of Antiochus; a more wealthy and magnificent Prince: and being taken for a politician who had a special insight into the state of Greecest was not ignorant of the affairs of Rome, had wound himself into high favour and inward friendthip with the King, that he was taken in to be one of his privy councel, and acquainted with all his fecrets. This man, as if the question in hand had been, not, Whether war should be levied or M no; but, Where, and by What means, and How it should be managed, spake aloud & said, "That "he made full reckoning and account in his very spirit and heart of the victory, in case the King " would pass the Seas over into Europe, to plant & settle himself in some part of Greece, and there " wage war : for at his very first coming he should see in arms already the Ætolians, that inhabit "the very heart and centre of Greece, who would be the only Captains and port-enfigns to march " before them, ready to venture and enter upon the most difficult and dangerous enterprises of " war. Again, in the two cantons and angles as it were thereof the should find Nabit of the one " fide from Peloponnefus, at hand to rue and raise those quarters, with intent to regain the City of "the Argives, to win again the maritime Cities, which the Romanshave differzed & dispossessed " him of, and have mued and thut him within the walls of Lacedamon. On the other fide from N "Macedony, Philip would no doubt take arms, so foon as he shall hear the first alarm and sound of " trumper, Fall well (qd, he) know I his courage, and of what spirit and stomack he is: right well I " wot that he hath follered in that brest of his for a long time, anger and despite; like to these wild " and favage beafts, which either are kept within iron gates, or fast tyed and bound: and as well I " remember, how many a time he was wont (during the wars) to pray heartily to all the Gods, " to vouchfale for to give him Antiochus for his helper and affiltant : and if now he might enjoy " his wish, and have the thing so long defired and praied for he would without any delay entering "to arms and war incontinently, Only (qd, Alexander) we must not linger and stay nor drive of, " for assuch as herein consistent the very point of victory, even betimes to seize upon commo "dious places of advantage, before the enemies be possessed of them. Also with all speed, Annibalo "isto be fent into Affrick, whereby the Romans may be distracted, and compelled to turn them " felves fundry wayes. Annibal only was not called to this councel; for by reason of the foresaid conferences with Villing, the King had him in some jealousy, and therefore he was out of favour, and of no credit and account with him. At the first, he put up this disgrace and made no words, but afterwards he thought it a better course, both to demand the cause of so suddain strangeness and alienation of his, and also to take some good time to excuse and purge himself, And therefore upon a day having fimply asked of the King, and heard the cause of his anger toward him. "My "father Amilear (qd.he) O Antioobus, when upon a time he facrificed unto the Gods, caused me "(a very little one, to be brought and presented before the Altar, where he forced me to touch the "fame with my hand, and totake an oath, Never to be friend unto the people of Rome, To accom-"plish and subilithis oath, I maintained the wars for the space of six and thirty years; by vertue of "this oath, in time of peace I was driven out of my native country; and being fled from thence. "this oath brought me into your court: and by the guidance and direction of this oath, if you "should disappoint me of my hope, yet whatsoever I know there are forces, wheresoever I hear "there is any tirring and ruttling of arms, I shall seek all the world over, until I find some Roman enemies. And therefore if there be any of your Courtiers that have a mind and defire to advance R "themselves in your good grace, and would grow by carrying tales and accusing me unto you, let "them find fome other subject and matter to do this by me : for I hate the Romans, and am like-"wifehated of them. That this is truth which I fay, my father Amilear and the Gods in heaven. Can tertily. Wherefore, when foever you shall think to make war with the Romans, see you enter-"rain Annib I for one of your greatest and most assured friends: but if any occurrent shall force "you to peace feek some other councellor and not me, to consult withal about that point. This force h was to effectual that not only it prevailed with the King, but also reconciled Annibal unto his race. And so they departed out of the councel with a full resolution to make war.

At Rome it was commonly talked and discoursed, that Antiochus was an enemy, but no provifion and preparation there was for war, but only whetting the edge of their stomacks. For both Consuls had no other Province but Italy affigued unto them to govern. And they were either to agree between themselves, or else to cast lots, whether of the twain should hold the general assembly, and be prefident of the election for that year. And he whose hap was not to be charged with that buffrels, was to be in readiness to lead forth the legions into any place out of Italy, as need should require. And to this Consulit was permitted to enrol two new legions of Citizens, and befides of allies and Latins 20000 foor, and 800 horse. To the other Conful were appointed tholetwo legions, which L. Cornelius the Conful of the former year had under his governance: alfo of allies and Latins 1 5000 footmen out of the same army, and 500 horse. As for Q. Minntius, his commission was continued still for the conduct of that army which he had in Liguria. And for to supply and make up the broken companies, he was allowed to enrol 4000 Roman footmen, Dand 150 horse, and likewise to levy of the alies 5000 soot, and 250 horse for that service. To Cn. Domitius it fell by lot, that he should go with a power out of Italy, whither soever the Senate gave order; and unto Quintius to govern Gaul. Then the Pretors election followed, who likewife cast lots for their Provinces. M. Fulvius Centimalus had the civil jurisdiction, and L. Scribonius Libo the forrain, L. Valerius Tappus governed Sicily, Q. Salonius Sarra, Sardinia: M. Batins Tamphilus high Spain, and A. Attilius Serranus the bale. But these two changed their Provinces, first by an order from the Senate, and afterwards by an act also of the Commons. For to Attilius Macedony was affigued and the navy, and to Babius the countrey of the Brutil. Flamimins and Fulvius continued in the government and command of Spain, and to Babius Tamphilus for the rule of the Brutii, were those two legions appointed which the year before lay in the City, E with commission to take up and levy of allies sisteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse to go thither. Aulus Artilius had in charge to cause thirty galleaces to be made with five banks of oars on a fide, and to take out of the harbors and docks as many old vessels as were fit for service, and to enrol mariners and rowers. The Confuls also were enjoyned to deliver unto him two thoufand allies of the Latin nation, and a thousand Roman sootmen. It was commonly voyced, that these two Pretors with two armies both by Land and at Sea, were prepared against Nabis, who openly now affailed the confederats of the people of Rome. But ftill the Embaffadors were looked for, who had been fent unto King Antiochus, and the Senat comminded the Conful Domitius not to depart from the City before their return. The Pretors, Fulvius and Scribonius, whose charge it was to minister law and execute justice in Rome, had commission to provide a hundred Fgaleaces, besides that sleet which Attilius was to command. But before that either Consuls or Pretors went forth into their Provinces, there was a procession holden, in regard of the prodigies and fearful fights that were reported. For word was brought out of Picenum, that a sheegoat had yeared fix kids at once, and that it rained earth at Amnernum; and at Formia, that a gate and wall of the City were smitten with lightning; and (that which most of all troubled and frighted the Conful Domitius) that an Ox spake these words, Rome, take heed to the felf. In regard of the other prodigious tokens, there was a supplication holden; but as for the Ox, the Soothfayers and bowel priers gave commandment, that he should with great care be kept and nourished. The Tiber also with more violence overflowed into the City than in the former year, and overthrew two bridges and many buildings, especially about the gate Flumen: one. Moreover, a mighty Ghuge stone shaken out of the Capitol cliff, sell from thence into the street called Ingarium, either by the force and violence of rain, or some earthquake (which if there were any, was so little, that it could not be perceived and that stone killed many a man. In the countrey also, by reason of this deluge, much cattel was carried away with the floud, and many farm houses and granges were born down and laid along, Before that L. Quimins the Conful was arrived into his Province, Q. Minutius fought a bat comfitted, put to flight and chased into their camp; which being affailed, was defended manful- H ly with much fighting until dark night: and then the Ligurians flipt away in the night feafon fecretly. And by the dawning of the next day the Romans entred and fessed thereof when it was empty of the enemies. Less pillage was there found, for that ever and anon what booties soerer they gat in the countrey they fent home to their houses. Minutus notwithstanding gave the enemies no repose from that time forward. For being departed out of the territory of Pife heame into Ligaria, where he destroyed their borroughs and Castles, and put all to fire and sword. There the Roman fouldiers filled their hands with the Tuscan prizes, fent thither by the forragers and

Much about this time the Embassadors returned to Rome, from the KK. who brought word and made relation of nothing that was sufficient to enforce them to proceed in any half to war, I but only against the Lacedamonian tyrant, by whom (as the Achaan Embassadors also gave in. telligence) the Sea coasts of Laconia were wronged and affailed, against the covenants of the league. Whereupon Accelins the Pretor was tent with a fleet to defend the affociats, And foralmuch as there was no imminent peril from Antiochus, it was thought good, that both the Confuls shouldgo into their Provinces. Domitius took his journey, and went the neerest way by Ariminum, and Quintini came into the Boians countrey by the way of Liguria. And theie two Confuls armies in divers quarters, wasted all abroad the enemies countrey. At the first fome few of their Gentlemen and Horsemen, together with their Captains; afterwards, all those of Senators calling; and last of all, as many as were of any repute, worth and worship, to the number of fifteen hundred fled to the Contul.

Likewi e in both Spains that year the affairs went prosperoully: for not only C. Flaminiu won by force of mantelets and engins of battery the rich and frong Town Litabrum, and took priloper alive their Lord Corribilo a noble Prince, but also M. Fulvius the Pro-conful fought with two armies of the enemies twice, and put them to the worle; and won by affault two Towns of the Spaniards Vescelia and Holone, with many other fortrefles: the rest of themselves revolted unto him, After this he made a journey into the Oretans countrey, & there having gottentwo towns, * Notite and Cufibi, he fet forward and marched to the river Tagus. In that quarter there food * Toletum a small City but strongly seared: whiles he assaulted it, there came a mighty army of the Vectons to sid the Tolerans, with whom he fought a fet field, and won the day, and having defeated the Vectors, he forced the Tolerans with engins of battery, and won the Town.

But all the wars which at that time were in hand, nothing troubled the LL, of the Senate for much as the expectation of the war, which Antiochus had not yet begun and enterprifed. For albeit they had ever and anon certain advertisements and intelligences of all things by their Embassadors, yet many slying tales and headless bruits there went without any certain Authors, reporting l'es as well as truths. And among the rest there ran a rumor, that Antiochus, so sonas he was come into Etolia, would prefently put over a fleet into Sicily. Whereupon the Senate, notwithstanding they had sent Attilius the Pretor with a fleet into Greece yet for a much as there was need not of forces only but also of authority to entertain the hearts and affections of their allies, they lent over T. Quintins, Cn. Off avius. Cn. Servilius, and P. Villius, as Embassadors into Greece and gave order that M. Pabius should advance his legions out of the countrey of the Brutians, toward y Tarentum and Brundusium, that from thence if need required, he might sail over into Macedonia, Moreover, That M. Fulvius the Pretor should put out a fleet of thirty sil, for the desence of the coast of Sicily and that the Admiral thereof should have full commission there to command now L. Oppins Sali nator, who the former year had been one of the Ædiles of the Commons, had the conduct of those ships.) Also, that the same Pretor should address his letters unto L. Valerminis Colleague, and advertised him that it was to be feared, that the armado of King Antiochus would cross over out of Etal a into Sicily; and therefore it was the will and pleasure of the Senate, that he should take up and enrol into that army which he had already, of tumultuary fouldiers 12000 footmen, and 400 horse, by whose means he might defend that coast of the Province which looketh toward (rece. For the levy of these forces, the Pretor took musters not only in Sicily but N also in the Isles adjacent and lying thereabout, and fortified with good garrifons all the Towns upon the Sea fide which lie toward Greece. Those rumours aforesaid were fed still and ministaned by the coming of Attalus the b other of Eumenes, who reported that King Antiochus was pilled over Hell fpontes with an army : and that the Ætolians were in that forwardness, that they would be prest and ready in arms against his arrival Great thanks were given as well to Eumenes in his abience, as to Attalus there present in place. Also order was taken, that he should have a lodging allowed him at his pleasure, and his charges born for his diet and house-keeping. Moreover, there were given him as prefents, two great horses of service, two pair of horsemens armors, as much filver plate as amounted to an hundred pound weight; and of gold plate, as much as weighed 10

And for as messengers one after another advertised and gave warning, that was well hand it was thought requifite and expedient that the new Confuls should be chosen in all confenient speed: whereupon a decree passed from the Senat, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should lond with dispatch his letters unto the Consul, to certifie him of the Senats pleasure. namely, that he should commit the government of his Province and the army unto his Lieutenants, and return himself unto Rome, and in his way send out his writs aforehand for the publishing of an astendard A general for the election of Confuls. The Conful obeied these letters, directed forth his summons in manner atorelaid, and came to Rome. In this year allo great ambition there was, and much fuir for the dignity of government. For that three noblemen stood for one place namely, P. Cornelius Scipio the ion of Gnens, who the former year had the repulie, L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Manlins Vollo. The Consulthip was conferred upon P. Scipio, so as it might appear to the whole world that this honour was deferred only, and not fully denied to to worthy a personage. His adjunct companion in government was M. Acilius Glabrio, a man by calling a commoner. The morrow after were the Pretors choien, to wit, L. Empliet P. sulus, M. Emilius Lepidus, M. Junius Brutus, A. Cornel, Mammula, C. Livius, & L. Oppius, both furnamed Salina: or, This Oppius was he that had the conduct into Sicily of a fleet of thirty fail, Mean while that there new Magistrats call lots for the R government of their Provinces, M. Babius was commanded to pais over with all his power from Brundulium into Epirus, and to keep his forces about Apollonia, And M. Fulvius the Pretor of the City had in charge to build fifty new Galeaces called Quinqueremes, of five banks of oars on either fide. And thus verily the people of Rome was provided against all enterprises and attempts of

Neither was Nabis behind for his part in levying war; but affaulted with great for e the Town of Gybeum; and of a mischievous and malicious mind against the Achaens, for sending agarrison to aid the befreged Townsmen, he for raged and wasted their country. The Achaens durst not go in hand with war, before their Embassadors were returned from Rome, and until they might know the pleasure and will of the Senat : but after the return of those Embassadors, they both published aDiet and general Councel at Sicyone, and also sent their Embassadors to Quinting for his advice and couniel. In this Diet, all their opinions inclined and tended to make wer out of hand: only the letters of T. Quintum made some stay of the enterprise, wherein he advited them to expect the Pretor and navy of the Romans, Now when the States there affembled in councel were diffracted some persisting still in their former opinion, and others of mind to take with them the advice of him unto whom they had fent for counsel the multitude at length looked what Philopamenes would say in that behalf. The Pretor he was for the time, and in those dayes surpassed all other in wisedome and authority. Then he rose up and used this preface and said, "That it was a good "custome among the Ætolians, and well ordained and provided, that the Pretor himself in all "confultations of war should not deliver his own opinion; and therefore willed them of their felves to refolve and determine with all speed possible what they pleased. As for the Pretor-D "filling to relove and determine with an inexa points with a serior of heir decrees according and careful diligence their decrees according thin he, he will be ready to execute with fidelity and careful diligence their decrees according to their decrees according to the serior of the serio "ly: yea, and indevor, so far forth as man's policy may reach unto, that they shal not repent of their "resolution, be it war or peace. This brief speech of his was more forcible and effectual to incite them to take arms, than any perswasive Oration, wherein he openly could have shewed his desire to follow the wars. And therefore with exceeding accord of all in general they agreed upon war. As for the time and means of managing the fame, it was wholly referred to the discretion of the Pretor, to use his own liberty and pleature. Philopamenes, besides that Quintins so advised, was also himself minded to wair for the Roman fleet which on the Sea side might defend Gytheum: but fearing againsthat their present necessity could abide no delaies, and lest not only Gytheum should E be loft, but the garrison also miscary, which was sent to the desence of the war he set aflote and put to the Sea the Achaans shipping. The Tyrant likewise had rigged and dressed a small fleet to empeach any aid and fuccours that haply might be fent to the belieged by Sea, to wit, three covered ships with hatch and deck, three Brigantins or Pinnaces, and as many Gallions. For the old ships were by composition and covenant delivered up to the Romans. And to make proof and tryal of these new vessels how swift and nimble they were and withal to see how all things else were well htted for a battail, if need were; he made every day certain shews and representations of fight at Sea, and exercised both mariners and fouldiers by such kind of false alarms: supposing that herein principally confitted the hope of his fiege, in case he could cut off all their aid from the Sea fide. Now the Pretor of the Achaens as he was equal to any of the best and most renowned commanders and Captains of that time in Land fervice, either for experience and practife, or wit and policy: fo at Sea he was but a novice and a learner, as being an Arcadian born, an Inlander far within themain, and ignorant besides of all forein forces, but that he had born arms and served a little in Gardy, whiles he had the leading there, of some auxiliaries. One old Gally there was a Quadriteme, taken at Sea 80 years before, at what time as the caried Nicala the wife of Craterus from Nanpallum to Corineh. And having heard much talk of this ship (for indeed she had been sometime of great name in the Kings royal fleet) he commanded her, all rotten as the was now, and ready to fall in pieces, to be shot into the Sea from out of the Bay of Argium. This ship as admiral, made way before the reft, wherein Tifoof Paira, a Captain General of a fleet was aboord; and encountred the ships of the Laconians, making fail from Gythe um. And at the first she chanced to affront and run against a new strong ship and being old of her self leaking and taking water at every loynt the was rent afunder and fell apieces. All within her were taken prisoners. The rest of the fleet having lost their captainess fled as fast as possibly their oars could make speed and away. Philopumenes himself was in a light foift frigot or pink, and fled amain and never stayed until he was arrived at Paira. This mishap nothing discouraged and abated the heart of this marrial water or, who had run through many and fundry adventures: but contrary-wife wrought this effect; that he affured himself and said, That if he were overtaken and put to the worse in service at Sea, wherein he had no skill, he would so much the rather quit himself so upon the Land (where he had such H experience and was to ready) as that the Tyrant should not long joy and make boast of his winnings. Nabis puffed up with pride of his fortunat victory, and perswading himself assuredly that he had no cause to sear any more danger from the Sea, purposed likewiseto stop up all the avenues and passages by Land; and therefore beset all the wayes betimes with strong guards, which hebeflowed in convenient places. And retiring with a third part of his forces from the fiege of 611/4um, he encamped before Pleia. This is a place that overlooketh and commandeth Leurgand Acra, by which wayes it feemed that the enemies would make their approach with their aimy. Whiles he kept a flanding camp there, and few of his fouldiers were provided of tents and patial. ons, and the rest of the common fort had made them cabins of reeds, wound and interlaced one within another, and the same covered with leaves only to give them some shade; Philopaments deviled, before that he were discovered and came in fight of the enemies, to affail them at unwares and not looking for his coming, after a new fashion of war that they little doubted. Cettain imall craies or boats he got together into a fecret blind bay, lying within the territory of Argos: in which he bestowed certain fouldiers nimbly appointed, most of them having round bucklers, with flings, dares, and such like offensive light weapons. From thence he coasted along the River neer the shore, until he was come to the promontory or cape adjoyning close to the enemies camp: then he went aland, and by known wayes he came by night unto Pleia: and whiles the watch was fast asleep, as miltrusting no such fear neer hand, he set hire upon the cabins sforefaid in every quarter of the camp. Many men were confumed with the fire before they will that the enemy was come: and they that were ware of them, had no means to help and fave their fel- K lows: fo with fire and sword all went to wrack. Some very few escaped out of this extremity of danger, and fled to the main camp before Gythaum. Thus Philopamenes having discomfited and frighted his enemies, led his army forthwith to wast Tripolis in the territory of Lacons, bounding fall upon the confines of the Megalopolitans : and having driven from thence great prizes of men and cattel, he departed before that the Tyrant could fend any guards from thence for the defence of the Countrey. And when he had gathered and affembled his army at Tegea, and published and made known unto the Achai and other Allies, a Diet or general councel to be holden there. whereat also were the chief States of the Epirots and Acamanians: he determined (for almuch as both the hearts of his own people were sufficiently recovered after the disgrace and shamenl dishonor received at Sea; and also the courages of his enemies well cooled and they affrighted) [to lead his forces against Lacedamon: supposing that, that only means to draw the enemy away from the fiege of Grtham. And first he encamped before Caria within the enemies ground, But that very day was Gythaum forced by the enemies and won. Philopamenes nothing ware thereof fet forward, and encamped neer Barboftheres, a mountain ten miles from Lucidemon. Nabis alio, having gained Grthaum, departed from thence with his army lightly appointed; and marching apace beyond Lacedamon, seized upon a place, called, The Campos Pyr-Thus: which he made no doubt but that the enemies intended to be possessed of. And then from thence he went to meet them. Now by reason of the narrow way, they took up in their march almost five miles of ground in length. At the tail of the army were the horsemen, and especially, where the Auxiliaries marched: because Philopemenes thought, that the tyrant would me charge his men behind with his mercenary fouldiers, in whom he reposed his greatest trust. Two things fell out contrary to his expectation at once, which troubled him much: the one was, that the place was gotten by the enemies before, which he intended to have seized upon for his own advantage: the other was, for that he saw the enemy affront his vanguard inaplace so rough and rugged, that without the guard of his light-armed fouldiers, he could not polibly march forward and advance his Enfigns. Now Philopomenes had a fingular dexterity and skill, yea, and great experience in leading an army, and in making choice of his ground either to pitch or fight: and not only in time of war, but also in peace, he busied his head and employed himfelf principally therein. His manner was, when he rode forth any whither and was come to a fireight passage hard to pass through, to look every way, and diligently to view and consider N the fituation and positure of the place on all sides: and if he were alone, to cast about and adwife with himself; but if there were any in his company, to aske their advice in this wife: What if the enemy appeared and shewed himself in that place: How if he came affront or affink on this or that fide; may, How if he should charge upon our back, what were best to be done? It may be the enemies will encounter us directly ranged in battail array; it may be they march diforderly and loofly, minding nothing else but their way, and to travail on. Thus I say, would he either devise with himself or seek advice of other, what place he were best to seize for his own purpose and commodity: also what number of armed men he should need to employ; or what kind of armour and weapons were needful to use (for therein also lay no small importance,) Moreover, where he should bestow his carriages? where he should lay his baggage? and 0 where he should place and dispose of the multitude that were not meet to bear arms? what strength and what manner of guard was needful for their defence? and whether it were more expedient to go forward fill the way that he was entred into, or better to go back again as he came? likewife, what ground was meet to be chosen for to pitch his campupon? what compals and space were necessary to be taken up for the fortification of the place ? from whence he might have convenient watering? from what quarter he might be best provided of fodder and sewel?

Finally, against the morrow, which way were safest to remove the camp? and what form and manner of march were best? In these courses and discourses, he had from his childhood so inured and exercised his spirits, that he was never to seek what to do upon any such suddain occasion or occurrent presented unto him. And now at this present, seeing his enemies to neer, first and formost he made a stand with his vanguard; then hesent out toward the formost ensigns, his auxiliary Candiots that came to aid him, and those horiemen which they call Tarentin, whose manner is to have with them, two hories apiece; and then commanding his ownmen of armsto follow after, he possessed himself of a rock standing over a brook or running rill, from whence they might water commodiously: into that place he gathered together all his bag and baggage; there he bestowed all the pages and horse-boyes, and sollowers of the camp, whom he en iro-R ned allo with armed men; and as the nature of the place would give him leave, he fortified his camp. But to pitch pavilions in a craggie, rugged, and uneven ground he found much ado. Now were the emenies about half a mile off: and at one and the same rivulet they watered both, with the guard of their light armed fouldiers: but before that they could cuffle and skirmish together (as commonly they do when the camps stand so neer one to another) the night overtook them. It appeared plainly there would be some fighting the next day about the brook for water: and therefore in the night feason he beltowed close in a valley, farthest out of fight from the enemies, as many of his targeteers sapolfibly the place would contain and hide. When day-light was come, the light armed Candiots and those Tarentin horsemen (of both sides) entred into skirmish upon the very banks of the brook. Letemnastus the Candiot had the leading C of his country-men; Licorcas the Megapolitan commanded the light horse. The Candiots, who likewife were auxiaries and aid-touldiers to the enemies, and the tame fortalio of the Tarentinhoriemen, guarded those that came to water for them. Doubtful was the skirmish for a good while (as being managed and maintained of the one ide and the other by men of one Nation, and those furnished with the same kind of weapons) but those that were for the Tyrant, were more in number than the other. And by reason that Philopamenes had given charge and direction to the Captains, after they had held skirmish a while, to seem to retreat and flie, thereby to train the enemy into the aforesaid place of ambush, they followed hard in chase upon them 2s they fled along within the valley, and most of them were either slain or wounded before they saw the enemies hidden there within. Now those targeteers aforesaid, were set in that Dorder (to far forth as the breadth of the valley would permit) that they might eafily receive their seliows as they fled, within the spaces between their ranks and files. Then at once they arose, fresh in heart, and ordred in good array, and charged upon the enemies, dilordered disbanded, loofe, scattered, weary with travel, and faint of their wounds. Then was it out of doubt and patt all peradventure where the victory went: for prefently the Tyrant fouldiers turned their backs, fled a good deal faster than they made puriuit beiore, and were beaten into their camp: many were either killed or taken priloners as they fled; and they had beemput infaffright also within the camp, but that Philopxmenes commanded to found the retreat, fearing more the rugged and broken ground, and the disadvantage and difficulties thereof, in case hehad rashly ventured forward any farther, than he did the enemy. Then he, taking his conjecture by the issue of the E fight, and gueffing by the nature of Nabuthe General, in what lear and fright he might be, sent unto him one of his auxiliaries that were strangers, counterseiting himself to be a renegate revole, to inform him affuredly, that the Achaeans determined the next day to march as far as to the river Eurotas, which runneth hard by the walls of Lacedamon, for to stop the passage, that neither the Tyrant might retire himself into the City when he would, nor any munition or victuals be caried from thence into the camp: moreover, that they would give the attempt, and affay if they could follicite any of the citizens to revolution the Tyrant. This counterfeit carried himself so in this errand, that the Tyrant believed not so much his words, as took hold thereby of a good pretence and honest occasion for to quit and abandon the camp: and therefore the next morrow, he commanded Pythagoras, with the auxiliary fouldiers and the horsemen, to keep a good guard about Ethetrench and enclosure of the camp: himself in person with the strength of his army, marched as it were to a battail, and commanded to advance forward the enfigns in all hast toward the City. * Philopamenes perceiving that the army marched in fall through the narrow passage down the *or rather Phihill, put forth all his own horsemen and the auxiliary Candiots, against the guards of the enemies topamu. that warded before the camp, They, seeing the enemies to approach and themselves for saken of their own fellows, at first went about to revire within their hold: but afterwards when they perceived the whole army of the Achaans advancing against them in order of battail, searing that they and their tents should be at once surprised, made apace after their own host which was gone a good way before. With that, thetargetiers of the Acharans affailed the camp, entred upon it, and ranfacked the tents, whiles the reft went forward and purfued the enemies. The way was Gluch, as that an army at liberty and free from fear of enemies, might hardly and with much ado rid any ground and march without encumbrance: but so toon as the skirmish began in the tail of the rereward, and the noise and cry of them affrighted behind was heard in the vanguard : every man made shift for one, flung away weapons, and fled into the woods on either fide of the way; and ere one could turn about. all the wayes were threwd and choaked up with armour and weapons, and especially with darts or javelins, which lighting for the most part with one end full against the enemies, were in stead of a staked or empalled palaissade to hinder their passage.

Philopamenes having given commandment to his light armed aid-fouldiers to prefle forwardfill, H and to follow the chale as fast as they could (knowing well that the horiemen would have much ado and trouble in their flight) conducted himtel the main army and heavily charged by an cre open way to the River Eurotas: where he encamped himself a little before the going down to the fun, and there he staied for his light appointed souldiers, whom he had let to sollow a ter the the mies. Who being come about the time of the first watch, brought word, that the Tyrant with fome few was entred into the City, but the unarmed multitude were dispersed, and wandred all about the forrest and the woods. Then he willed them to repose and retresh their bodies: which being done, himself chose out of all the souldiers besides (who because they were come ful into the camp, had well heartned themselves with taking their resection and some small sleep) (triain elect and special men and took them forth immediatly with him having about them nothing but I their fwords, and fet them in good order to keep two port-waies, by which men go to Phote and Barl ofthenes, where he prelumed that the enemies would take their way and retire themselves upon their flight: and nothing was he deceived. For the Lacedamonians, to long as the day light lafted had withdrawn themselves to the middle of the forrest, through by-lanes and blind paths but when the night was once come, and that they descried lights within their enemies camp, they kept themselves aloof over-against them within close and secret lanes; and when they were once passed beyond, and thought all to be in safety and security, they came down into the more open high waies, where they were received and caught up by their enemies that forlated theminambush : so they were every where by numbers either killed or taken prisoners ; insomuch as scarce one fourth part of their whole army escaped. Philopamenes having thut up the tyrant close within K the City, spent almost thirty daies consequently ensuing in wasting and spoiling the territory of the Laconians: and when he had thus weakned and in manner broken the back of his enemy, he returned home, and the Acharans held him a paragon, and equal to the Roman General forgionious deeds of arms, nay, in the service of the Laconian war they preserved him before the other.

During the war between the Achaans and the tyrant, the Roman Embaffadors, who carefully and diligently visited the Cities of the Allies, for fear lest the Ætolians had alienated any of their affections from them to King Antiochus travelled but little in going about to the Achaus, whom by reason of the hatred they bare to Nabis, they hoped verily to be fast and faithful enough unto them in all other things. And first they came to Athens, from thence to Chalcin, and so into Theffaly: and after they had conferred with the Theffalians in a frequent councel of theirs, they I turned their way to Demetrias, where there was published a solemn Dier to be holden by the Magnetes. Where they were to frame their speech more curiously than in other places, because certain of their great men and Potentats were estranged from the Romans, and altogether made for Antiochus and the Ætolians. The reason was this ; because when news came that Philiphis son, who was left hoftage with the Romans, should be rendred again unto him, and like wife thettibut remitted which had been imposed upon him, among other false tales and untruths it was reported, That the Romans would redeliver Demetrias also into his hands. And rather than that should come to pass, Eurylochus (a principal and chief man among the Magnefians) and some others of that faction, defired to have a new world and an alteration, by the coming of the Etolians and Antiochus, To these Magnesians, they were to couch and place their words to, in ridding M them of that foolish vain fear which they had conceived, that thereby they did not put Phusp clean beside his hope, and so give him occasion to be ill affected unto the Roman : considering that he alone was to them of far greater importance in all respects, than were the Magnehaus, put all together. Thus much only they faid by way of advertisement, That as all Greece generally was much beholden and bound unto the Romans for the benefit of Liberty, which they by their means enjoyed, fo that City and State especially above all others was obliged unto them For there, not only a garrison of Macedonians had been maintained to keep them in awe, but also the King had built him a royal palace, to leat himself there, to the end, that they might evermore. have in their eye, their Lord to command them. But in vain, and to no purpose was all this, in case the Etolians brought Amiochus in his stead to make his resiance in the house and place of N Philip: and would needs entertain a new and unknown King in lieu of the old, so long atime and fo well known. The foveraign Magistrat of that City, they call Magnetarches; and forthattime Enrylochus was the man: who beating himselt big and stout of his high place, said plainly, That he knew no cause, why either he or the Magnesians should suppress and smother the numour that ran fo rife touching the delivery of Demetries into Philip his hands. For rather than to fuffer that, the Magnefians were to oppose themselves, yea, to do and dare any action whatioever. And in the vehement heat of speech he went so far, that inconsideratly he cast out one word and faid, That Demetrias seemed free in outward snew and appearance, but in very truth was at the command and devotion, yea, and at every beck of the Romans. At this speech there arose a dissonant bruit and murmuring of the assembly, which jarred and varied one from another, o whiles some soothed him up, others were offended, and took it in great despight, that he should prefume to utter and speak so much. And Q intins was in such an heat of choler therewith, that stretching forth his hands to Heaven, he called the Gods to witness this ingratitude and disloialty of the Magnefians. At wholewords they were all greatly terrified. Then Zero one of the thiel, a man at that time of great authority and reputation, as well integerd of the honourabe port that he ever caried in the whole course of his life, as also for that he alwayes stood firm and force

"to the Roman fide, befought Quintins and the rest of the Embassadors with tears, Not to im-"pute the folly of one man to the whole City, for every man is to bear his own burden, and as he whath brued, to to drink, and abide the imart of his own fcratching. As for the Magnefians "((aith he) they acknowledge to owe unto T. Quintins and the people of Rome, not only their "freedom, but all other things else that are most deer and precious unto men. Neither could a "man pray or wish at the hands of the immortal Gods for any thing, which the Magnefians had "not received by their means: and sooner would they like frantick persons pluck the very heart "out of their own bellies, yea, and tear themselves in peeces, before they would violate and break "the amity which they had with the Romans. This speech of his was followed and seconded with the humble prayers of the multitude. Eurylochus departed out of the assembly, and through by-B waves and blind lanes recovered the gates, and from thence fled fireight into Atolia, For now by this time, and every day more than other, the Ætolians discovered and shewed themselves how they were affected to revolt. And happily at the same time, . Thoas, a principal personage of that Nation. whom they had fent as Embassador to King Antiochus, was newly returned, and brought with him Menippus the Kings Embassador. Who, before they had audience given them in a councel affembled for them, had filled every mans ears and blabbed forth, what forces were prepared both for Land and Sea, what a mighty power was coming both of foot and horse how Elephants were lent for out of India and above all (wherewith they thought the minds of the people would be moil moved) That there was such a mass of gold brought, as would buy all the Romans out and out. It was easy to see what trouble and broil such language might make in the general diet and affembly. For the Roman Embassadors had intelligence, both of their coming, and of all that ever they did. And albeit there was little hope or none at all to do any good, yet Quietius thought it not amiis, that some Embassadors from the allies and associate Cities should be present at that Councel, such as might admonish and put the Ætolians in mind of the Roman alliance and jociety, and not flick to speak their minds franckly, yea, and thwart the King his Embassador. The Athenians of all other were thought the meetelf menfor that purpole, both in regard of the authority and reputation of their City, and also for the ancient league between them and the Etolians. So Quintins requested them to send their Embassadors to the Panatolian Parliament. When the affembly was met, and the Councel fer, Thous first declared his embatlage: and after him was Menippus called in, who being entred in place, spake in this manuer: "It had been (qd. the) the best courie for all them that inhabit both Greece and Asia, that Antiochus had intermed-D"led in thele affairs, during the upright fortune and entireffate of Philip: then, every man had "enjoyed his own, and all had not been reduced to the appetite and devotion, nor brought under "subjection of the Romans. And even yet (quoth he) in case ye persist still in the same mind, and "purpole resolutely to accomplish and finish these your designs and commenced enterprises, pos-"lible it is by the favor and help of the Gods, and by the means of the Atolian affociation that "Antiochus may recover the State of Greece, crased as it is, and much broken and bring it again to "her first fresh hue, to her lively and lightsome lustre, which consisteth in true liberty, even that " which is able to stand alone and maintain it self, and dependeth not upon the will and pleasure " of others. The Athenians, who first (after the Kings embalfage was delivered) had audience given E them and liberty to speak their mind, without making any mention at all of the King, "Ad erti-"led the Ætolians of the Roman fociety, and put them in mind of the favors and good turns done "by Quint us to all Greece in general: advising them to take heed, that without discretion they "orerthrew not the welfare thereof, by running rashly and too soon into a new world of strange "courses and fine devices: for hot, hasty, and heady counsels are at the first fight and entertain-"ment, pleasant and amiable; in the handling and managing, hard and difficult; in the end and "iffue, heavy and dangerous. Confider how the Roman Embassadors, and namely, Quintius a-"mong them, are not far off: and whiles things fland in good terms of integrity, it were better to "treat and debate of matters in question and doubt, by words and reasons, than to set all Assa and " Europe together to take arms and to make lamentable and deadly war one upon another. The Fmultitude desirous of a change enclined altogether, and were wholly devote to Antiochus, being of opinion, that the Roman Embassadors were not to be admitted into the Councel: but the more grave and ancient persons of the nobility and states-men, obtained thus much by vertue of their authority. That they should have audience granted unto them. And when the Athenians had made relation of this decree and conclusion passed, Qui, tius was of mind to go into Atolia: for this accompt he made, either to obtain somewhat that he came for, or else to have all Gods and men to hear him witness, that the Romans would enter into the action of war justly and in manner upon constraint and necessity. "Quinting being thither come, began at first to discourse be-"forethe whole affembly, as touching the fociety of the Ætolians with the Romans, and how "oftenthey had broken for their parts the faithful accord between them: and whenhe had fo G aid he used a brief speech concerning the right of those Cities that were in question. And if they "thought that they had any law and reason of their side, how much better (quoth he) were it to fend Embassadors to Rome, either to argue and exposulate the matter with them, or to demand "their advice (whether they would themselves) than to cause the people of Rome to make war "with Antiochus & the Etolians together, not without great trouble of the whole world & cer-"tain ruin of all Greece? For none should feel the smart & calamity of this war sooner than they "that are the very causes therof & began first. Thus spake the Roman Embass, by way of prophesy, but in vain and to no effect. After him Thoss and the rest of that faction, were heard with the H general applause of all: and they effected so much, that without any farther proroguing of the Diet, and referring the matter to another day, yea, and without staying so long until the Romms were out of the place and absent, they concluded to make a decree, by vertue where of Amischai should be sent for to affianchise Greece, and to decide the quarrelabetween the Roman stands. Etolians. This decree was not so proud and insolent, but Damocriese their Pretor accompanied it with as arrogant and reproachful a frump of his own. For when Quintins required or him to see the said decree, he without any respect of the honorable personage of the man, made alm to see the said decree, he without any respect of the honorable personage of the man, made alm to see the said decree, and an answer withal shortly, and that within stay, encamped upon the bank of Tyberie. So great a spirit of senseless folly in those dayes had posselfed the nation of the Atolians, I and their chief Magistrats! Then Quintins and the delegats returned to Corimb.

After the Romans were dismissed, the Ætolians held no more general councel of the whole Nation, because they would make semblance and seem to do nothing of themselves as touching the cause and question of Antiochus, but sit still and expect the coming of the King. Mary, they treated and debated the matter by their Apocless (for to they call their special and privy Counce) which consisteth of certain elect chosen persons) by what means there might be an alteration and change in the affairs of Greece. This was held of all men for certain, that in every City and State, the chief and the best men generally were for the affociation of the Romans, and contented them elves with the present condition wherein they stood: but the multitude and those who had not all things to fall out to their own good liking, were desirous of a change. And one day x above the rest, the Ætolians entred into a designment and plot, which was not only out of all measure audacious, but also most shameless, namely, to surprise and possess themselves of Demetrias, Chalcis and Lacedamon. And to each of these Cities there was sent one of their principal personages, namely, Those to Chalcie; Alexamenus to Lacedamon, and Diocles to Demetrias, This Diocles had the help and affiltance of Enrylochus a banished man (of whose flying away, and the occasion thereof we have spoken before) who otherwise had no hope at all to return again into his native countrey. The kinstolk and friends of Emylochus and the rest of that faction, upon in-Aructions given them by his letters, willed his wife and children to present themselves in the frequentaffembly of the citizens in habit of mourners, in poor array, and vailed after the manner of humb'e suppliants, there to beseech them all and some, not to suffer him a guiltless person, neither I convicted nor condemned, to wax old and pine away in exile. All that were plain and simplemen feemed to be touched with pity and commiseration. The wicked and feditions persons conceived some hope to make a consusion in the State by these Ætolian troubles: in so much as every one was of opinion and gave his voice, that he should be restored and sent for home. This ground being laid and matters thus prepared, Diocles with his horsemen (for then was he the Captainof the Cavalry J took his journey, under a colour and pretence to reduce and bring homethis banished person his host and good riend; and in one day and night travelled a mighty great journey, and came within fix miles of the City. And betimes in the morning by day light, accompanied with three elect troops he marched forward, commanding the rest of the horsemento sollow after. When he approached the gate, he caused them all to alight on foot and to lead their M horses in their hands by the reins of their bridles, and to go without order, resembling travailes and waifaring men, so as they seemed more like to the ordinary train of Captain Diocles, thanto the men of arms and warriors under his charge: and leaving one of his troops at the gate, forfest lest the horiemen behind might be shut out, he led Eury Jochus by the hand, and broughthim through the mids of the City and the market place home to his house: and all the way he was met with many of his lovers and friends that welcomed him, and joyed for his return. Anothe whole City was full of horsemen, and all places of opportunity and advantage were seized and possessed by them. Which done, divers were sent to massacre the chief of the adverse partintheir houses. Thus the Ætolians became masters of Demetrias.

As for Lacedamon, they devised in no hand to force the City, but by some wile to entrap and N furprise the tyrant. For seeing the Romans had despoiled him of all his Sea coast Towns: and the Achaans driven him within the walls of Lacedamon, there was no doubt, but who fo ever could first take his life from him should cary away all the thanks, and curry especial favor with the Lacedamonians. Good occasion and pretence they had to send unto him a power of armed men, for that he had importuned them by his prayers for some aids, considering that by their advice and perswasion he had rebelled. So there were given unto Alexamenus a thousand sootmen, and thirty elect horsemen, drawn out of all the flour of the City. Damocritus the Pretor delivered unto them from the privy councel of that nation (of which we have before spoken) "That they " should not believe that they were to be employed in war against the Achæans, or in any other "fervice, according as each one might imagine and conceive in his own head: but he charged 0 "them to be ready to perform and execute obediently what soever suddain designment Alexante " nus upon the present occasion should happen to attempt, were it never so unlooked for stranges "inconsiderate, and audacious: and to rest upon this, That they were sent with him to accome " plish that, and for no other purpose. Thus Alexamenus with the conduct of these men thus prepared to his hand came unto the Tyrant : and no sooner was he arrived, but he possessed him presently with a world of hopes: giving to understand, "That Antiochus was already passed over

"into Europs: that shortly he would be in Greece, and over-spred all seas and lands with his ar-"into Different amados; that the Romans should full well know and find, that they have not now to when substituted an one as Philip; that the numbers of his foot and horfes by land can not be "deal with nor his ships at Sea numbred; that the battail of his Elephants at the very fight will "decide the matter and finish the war. Moreover, that the Ætolians with all their forces, were "geady and prefit to come to Lacedamon, (as need required) at any time: but indeed, defirous they were to shew and muster before the King at his arrival, a goodly number of armed fouldiets, N. bir therefore him elf (hould do very well, not to fuffer those forces which he had, to edecay with long repose and idleness, but bring them forth and train them abroad, make them (to run in their armour thereby both to whet and sharpentheir courages, and also to exercise and inure their bodies: for by use and custome, the labour will be lighter; and by the courtefy and rgracionines of their General, not withour delight and pleasure. Hereupon, they began to issue out of the City, and oftentimes went into the plainlying hand by the River Emoins. They of the transgnard kept commonly in the battail or middle ward: and himielf with three horiemen at the utmost (with whom Alexamenus for the most part was) used ordinarily to ride before the enfgps, taking furvey and viewing the utmost points and wings of the army. The Actolians were plangus, same right wing, as well those that came before to aid the tyrant, as those thousand that were newly affived with Alexamenus. Now had Alexamenus taken a cultome, one while to courney as it were amongst the ranks before in the company of the tyrant, and to instruct him in some matters founding to his commodity: other whiles, to ride to his own men into the right wing, and con again to return to the Tyrant, as if he had given them charge of somewhat necessary to be done. But upon that day which was appointed for to do the feat and murder the tyrant, after he had ridden forth with the tyrant to the usual place, and kept him company a while the took occation (as his manner was) to make a ftep afide to his own fouldiers; and then he went in hand with those horsemen which were fent with him from out of Ecoliu, and faid thus unto them: "Now firs, you must adventure and execute that lutily and without delay which you were commanded to perform by my direction and leading, Be ready with heart and hand, and be not flack "and idle to exploit that, which ye shall seeme to undertake and enterprise. And look who sever "he be that either standeth still, or wil seem to argue and interpose his own wit and advice to cross "mine, let him make account, he shall never go home again to his own countrey. With that he Det them all a quaking, for well they remembred what their charge was when they came forth from home, Now was the Tyrant a coming on horieback from the left wing: Then Alexamenus commanded his hortemen to couch their lances down, and to have their eye upon him. He also ferled himself to take a good heart unto him, which was not a little daunted at first with the cogitation of to great a delignment that he had projected. When he was now approached and come meer the Tyrant, he ran with full carrier at him, gored his horle, and overthrew himfelf to the ground, He was not to loon unhorfed and laid along, but the horfemen Rabbed him with many a thinkl; whereof the most part did no harm, considering they were driven against his corslet; but in the end they found where his body was naked and unarmed, to he gave his last gasp before he could be rescued by his guard in the main battail aforesaid. Then Alexamenus taking with him eall the Atolians, made all the haft he could to posses himself of the royal place. The Pensioners and Squires of the body, feeing this murder done before their eyes were at first mightily affrighted: but afterwards perceiving the army of the Ætolians to go their wayes and depart, they ran to the breathless carkvie left among them and of menthat should have guarded his body and reverged his death, they became a fort of idle gazers and lookers on. And firely there would not amanhave once firred, in case the multimide had immediatly been called to an affembly; and if after arms laid down, they had been entertained by him with fome Oration or Remonstrances framed according to the time. The Arolians were kept many together, in arms fill, without any outrage or wrong done or offered to any one perion. But all things that they did, haftened the needy ruin and destruction of those that had committed this fact: as it could not other wise be in Fallteason, but they should so be served, who had plaid solewd and treacherous a part. The Captain and Ring-leader of all this mitchief kept him felt close thut within the royal palace, spending both night and day in rifling and fearching the Tyrants coffers and his treasury. And the Etolians for their part also fell to ransacking as if they had won that City by assault, which they made Countenance and lemblance to let free. The indignity of these their pranks, the contempt withal and mall regard made of them, encouraged and animated the Lacedemonians to gather togetherand consult of the matter. Some were of opinion and faid, That the Æcolians were to be thrust our by the head and shoulders, and to be sent away with a mischief, and their own liberty to be recovered, which under a colour of being reflored, was intercepted and taken from them: others advised and faid, that for fashion at least wife, some one of royal blood should be set up G for to be the head in this action. Now there was of that race and flem one Laconicus a young Child, brought up with the children of the late Tyrant: him they mounted upon horfeback, and then they took arms with all speed, and as many Ætolians as they could light upon, windring here and there in the Breers, they ran upon and hewed in peeces. Then they affaulted the palace, where they also murdered Alexamenus, albeit with some sew about him he made resistance and defended himself. The reft of the Etolians gathered together about Chalciegos (which is a Chappel of Diana made of brais) and there likewise they were massacred. A sew of them

About the lame time, Those had not so good speed before Chalcie; by means of Embymida, great and chief man of the City (one, who by the might and flronger hand of those that fided with the Romans, had been expelled the City after the coming of T. Quintus and the Embaliadona delegats) and also of Herodoins of Canus, a Merchant and a man that in regard of his wealthand riches bare a great fide in Chalcis: Thoms, I say, sped not so well by their means, notwithstanding that the supposts and part-takers of Embymidas were well disposed to betray the Town; as Enlockus did in the surprising and seizing of Demetrias. This Euthymidas from Athens (for therebe had made choice to dwell) first came to Thebes, and to from thence went forward to Salgana, B. rodotus abode at Thronium, and not farfrom thence within the gulf of Malea, he had 2000000. men, and Theas two hundred horsemen, and about thirty light Caracels. Which Heredam was commanded to fet over into the Island Atalanta with fix hundred footmen, that from there. when he perceived once the Land-forces to approach Anin and Enripus, he might cut out to Chalcis. As for themselves, they conducted the rest of the forces in all the hast they could, and most by night journies marched into Chalcie. Militio and Xenoclides (who had the maniging of the affairs in Chalois, and might do all in all there, now that Euchymidas was banished Jennined in Chalcis, and whether they mistrusted somewhat themselves, or had some inkling and intelligence of the matter, I wot not, but affraid they were at first, and had no other hope at all but by flight to fave themselves: howbeit afterwards when their fear was well allaied and letled, seeing evidently, that not only their own countrey was betraied, but also the Roman society abundoned, they plotted in this wife, and entred into a course as followeth.

It fortuned at the very fame time, that a folemn anniversary factifice was celebrated at Entria to the honour of Diana Amerinthis: to which folemnity there reforted not only the inhibitant of those places neer at hand but also a number of Caryllians. Thither they sent certain Ontots, I to request and entreat the Eretrians and Caryttians, both to take some pity of their estate, confider ing they were born in the same Island, and also to have some regard to the alliance of the Romans and not suffer Chalcis to fall into the hands of the Atolians: who no doubt, if they might get Chalets, would not be long ere they had Eubaa too. Sirly Lords (lay they) were the Macedo nians, and rigorous, but the Ætolians would be much more unsupportable. These Cities were principally respective to the Romans, whose vertue and prowess in war, whose justice and bounty in victory they had lately experience of and therefore both States armed the flower and manhood of all their youth and tent them. The Townsmen of Chalcis having committed the guard of their walls to there, went forth themselves with all their forces passed over Europus, and encamped near Salganea. From which place they fent first an herald, and after him Embassadors to the Exolian, M to demand of them, Wherein they had so offended either in word or deed, that their allies and friends should come to molest and assail them so by way of hostility? To whom Thou the General of the Ætolians made this answer, That they were not come to annoy and trouble, but todliver and free them from their servitude under the Romans. For bound they were and tiednow with a brighter and more glittering chain indeed, but far heavier, than at what time as they had the garrison of the Macedonians within their Castle. The Chalcidians replied again and insented, that they neither were in bendage, nor needed at all the garriton of any. And thus the Emballadors departed from the party, and returned to their own people. Thous and the Atolians, whole whole and only hope was to come upon them on a fuddain and furprife them at unawares tour ned home again as they came being not able to maintain open war, nor to affail a City fo well for N tified both by lea and land, Euthymidas being advertised that his country-men lay in campat Salganea and that the Ætolians were dislodged and gone, retired himself allo from Thebesto Athens, And Herodorus likewife, after he had withly and with great longing, expected from * Andanacertain daies together, to see some signal (but in vain) sent out a pinnace or brigantine, toknow what the canie might be of fuch stay: and understanding that the enterprise was given over by his complices and fellows in the complot, he returned to Thronium from whence he came.

* Talandi.

Quintius likewile having intelligence of these occurrents, as he failed with his fleet from Crinth, encountred Eumenes in Euripus neer Chalcis. And thought good it was between them that Eumenes the King should leave at Chalcis five hundred souldiers in garrison, and himself godinet the Mens and Quintius kept on his way to * Demetrius whither he intended, suppossing that the deliverance of Chalcis would make somewhat to induce the Magnessans to embracagain the society of the Romans. And to the end that those persons in Demetrius who sided with him might have some forces for their desence, he wrote unto Euromus the Pretor of the Thesians, to put the youth in arms: and he sent Visius before unto Demetrius to sound their affections, not minding otherwise to give the artempt, unless some part of them enclined to respect the ancient society. Visius entred the mouth of the haven with a five banked Galleace. Thisteria

A the whole multitude flocking unto him. And Villius demanded of them whither they hadrather that he came to them as to friends or enemies? Unto whom Enzylochus the Magnetarches, and furtered, that he was come unto his friends: but he willed to him for bear the haven, and fuffer the Magnetaras to be at peace and liberty, and to beware that under a pretence of parle, he did not folling and difficult the multitude. After this there was no farther talk and speech between them but plain debate and altercations while Villius the Roman blamed and challenged the Magnetians, as unthankfull perfors, and forewarned them of the mileries and calamities that hung over their heads; and again the multitude cried out aloud, and accurded as well the Senat as Quintius. Thus Villius without doing any good, returned to Quintius. But Quintius having dispatched a mellenger to the Pretor, that he should reduce home his forces, retired himself again by ica to Corinib.

Be the affairs of Greece thus interlaced and blended with the Panet.

Best The affairs of Greece thus interlaced and bleeded with the Roman, have carried me away as it were out of my lifts: not for that they were to necessary and important to be written, but only because they were materiall to the cause of the war against Antochus. Atterthe Confus were electron there I began my digression) L. Quintim and Cn. Domitius, the Confus went into their severall provinces, Quintim in Liguria, and Domitius against the Boil. As for the Boil, they held themselves quiet, yea, and the whole body of their Senas with their children, their captains also with their Cavalry, to the number in all of fifteen hundred, yeelded themselves to the Conful. But the territory of the Ligurians was overrun and walted, and some fortresses whereby not only there were prizes got of all forts, and prisoners taken, but also diverse captives, as well citizes as allies were recovered out of the enemies hand. This very year a Colony was planted at Vibo. Cby an act of Senat and Commons: and there went thither three thousand and seven hundred sootmen, and three hundred horsemen. The Triumvirs, who had the placing of them, were Q. Nevinn, M. Minutius, and CM. Finius Crassipes. Every footman was endued with fifteen acres of land, and the horsemen with twice as much. It was a territory held last in the tenure of the Brutians,

and they had conquered it first from the Greeks.

About the same time, there hapned as Rometwo most fearfull accidents; the one of them continued long, but was not alrogether so vehement and terrible: for there was an earthquake endured eight and thirty daies. All which time, the lawsteed or vacation from all courts of law and civil canses, continued in great icar and pensivenes: in regard whereof, a supplication was holder for three daies. As for the other, it was not a vain fear, but a very loss indeed that couched made in the case of the state began a scarfire in the beast Market, and continued a day and a night, burning many houses standing on the Tyber side; and all the shops and ware-houses, with merchandise of great price, were consumed. Now was the year well drawing to an end, and daily more and more the brait and rumor of the war with Antiochus encreased, and like wise the care that the LL, of the Senat had therof. And therefore they began to treat as concerning the Provinces of the Magistrates elect, to the end, that all of them might be more circumspect and intentive to their charges. So a decree passed, that the Consults should have the governance of staty, by name, and also to go whitthereover the Senat should please to dispose of them; and all men knew welchough, that the war against Antiochus was upon the point. Also ordained it was, that he whose lot it was to manage that war, should have the conduct of four thousand footmen of Roman Citizens, and three hundred borsemen; besides fix thousand allies of the Latine nation, and four hundred horsemen. Leaves the conduct of the take multers for those foundiers that there should have the Martius Ralla the Daumvir, dedicated them. This year there passed many sharp and gric-vous sentences and judgements upon usurers against whom being privat men) M. Tuccius and P. Iamius Brutus the two Ædiles of the chair, commenced action. Of that filter wherein they were since the was made a charior with four wheels, guilded, and set up it was in the Capitollin the expinct of Jupirer above the top of his shrine: likewise twelve bucklets guilded. The same Ædiles also, caused the porch or gallery to be made without the gate Tergemina, among the expenters.

As the Romans were wholly amnsed upon preparation for this new war, so Antiochas for his part for not till: three Cities there were which kept him back and checked his progresse, to wit. Smyrna, Alexandria in Troas, and Lampfaeus; the which they never could to that day force by state, or draw in.o amity with any condition whatsoever; and to leave them behind in those to me, when the should in proper person passe over into Europe, he was not willing. ther it was good simply to lend him thither at all, or no? This Thoas, when Greece was all in an H hurry and full of troubles, bare them in hand, that Demetriae would be in their power and at their devotion. And like as with his leafings touching the King, in multiplying and magnifying his forces, he had brought many of the Greeks into a fools paradite, even to also after the tame maner he ceased not to feed the King with lies, and fill him with hopes, making him believe as all men wished for him with all their hearts, and would run by heaps to the sea strand, to meer him so son as they could ken his fleet under fail. This felf-fame man was fo bold also as to alter the Kings mind "as touching Annibal, which feemed before resolved and settled. For he perswaded sign that the "Kings navy was not to be ditmembred, and part therefore to be fent away; and if he wereto "make out any of the flips from the rest, yet Annibal of all other was not to have the conduct "thereof, a banished person and a Carthaginian; who was like enough to be of many minds, & I se to change a thoutand times in a day, such was his present condition and fortune & such was his " nature and disposition. And as for that glorious name for martial prowesse (which is the cause "that Annibal is so much set by, and which recommendeth him as a special and singular gift to the world it is too much, and far unfitting for any one captain under a King : and more meet it of were that the King himself should be regarded and seen above all other, that the King, I say and one but the King should be the leader, conducter and commander of all. Again, if Armbal "chanced to milcary with a fleet, or to have his forces defeated, the loffe would be accounted no " more then if any other meaner captain had done it : but if the affairs should prosper and speed " well, Annibal should go away with the honour, and not Antiochus. Moreover, say that fortune were fo kind as to give Antrochus the upper hand of the Romans, and the entire victory over K them for ever, what hope or likelihood is there that Annibal would be content to live under the 6. King and suoject to him alone, who hardly could brook and endure the command and soversienof the whole flate wherein he was born ? To conclude the King (quoth he) Math no fuch need of Annibal in this war, as to make him a commander: wel may he ale him for " a counfeller, and to forth have him in his train and company; for some mean fruit and the of such " a nature, cannot be cumberforne, hurtfull, and dangerous : but if high and great matters be reach-" ed at, 1000 they may bear down and overcharge both the giver, and also the receiver. Andno of pirits are fo ready to envy and malice others, as they whole birth and parentage, whole degree L "and effate is not answerable to their hauty minds : and such commonly, as they hate the verue, o fo they depresse the good of another. Hereupon their course of sending Annibal into Africk, was forthwith laid alide and clean cast behind, which was fo well devised in the beginning of " the war.

Antiochus bearing himfelf aloft now, principally for that Demetrias was revolted from the Romans unto the Atolians, determined no longer to delay the matter, but presently to take a voiage into Greece. But before that he embarked and took the fea, he went up to Ilium from the isafide for to facrifice to Minerva; and when he was returned to his fleet, he made fail with 40 clole covered and hatched ships, and 60 uncovered and undecked, and after those followed 200 velks of burden, charged and fraught with viduals, munition, and warlike furniture of all forts. And first M he fell with the lland * Imbros : and from thence he cut over to Sejathos, where after he had tallied his ships which had been scattered one from another in the wide and deep sea, he arrived at Pteleum, the first town of the main and continent. Where Eurylochus the Magnetarches, [ithe toveraign of Magnefia] and the principall citizens of the State, who were come from Demetria, met him and joyned with him; who rejoyeing exceedingly to see so goodly a company of them in his train, the next day put into the haven of the City of Demetrias; and not far from thence landed all his forces, which amounted in the whole to ten thouland foot, five hundred horie, and fix Elephants : a imall power (God wot) and unfficient to leize upon Greece, all naked and alone, far forter then to hold and maintain war with the Romans. After it was reported that Antiochus was come to Demetrias, the Atolians proclaimed a councell, wherein they made a dette M to lend for Antiochus. For now the King knowing that they would patie such an Act, was acparted from Demetrias, and had withdrawn himfelf to Phalera within the gulph of Maless And after he had received once the patent of that decree, he went from thence to Lamia, wherehe was received with exceeding favour of the common people, with clapping of manus, flours, atclamations, and others figns, whereby the multitude used to shew & teltifie their great joy. When they were effembled together and fet in Councell, Phaneas the Pretor and other chief citizens brought him tolemnly in where Oyez made, thus the King began his speech, fittle exuling himtelf, in that he was come with a far fmaller power then all men hoped or looked for. "Andewen this (quoth he) may ferve in stead of the greatest argument that may be of my exceeding " love and affection toward you, in that being to unprovided and unfurnished of all things, and o " at a time so unseasonable for to sail, as too early to take the sea, I have not thought much but " am willingly come at the call of their Embasi dors : being thus assuredly perswaded, that the £. e tolians feeing me once, will suppose that in me alone consisted all their bope and defence whattoever. And yet I would accomplish I affure you, and fatisfie to the full even your contentment allo, whole expectation for the present may seem to have been disappointed; for soon asthe

A "time of the year will ferve, and the fpring is once come, that the feas are navigable, I will o-"verspread all Greece with men, borse, and munition; I will take up all the sea coalts with fleets, "I will spare for no colt, no pain, no perill, untill I have taken from their necks the heavy yoke of "the Roman empire, fet Greese free indeed, and the made the Etolians the chief commanders "therein. Nay, with mine armies besides thall come all kind of provision and furniture out of Afia But for the present (laith he) the Ætolians must see &take order, that my people may be served with corn and other victuals at a reasonable rate. To this effect when the King h d spoken with the great affent of all men, he departed. After the Kings departure, there role fome contention between two great men of the Ætolians, to wit, Phaneas and Thoas. Phaneas was of opinion, that it was better policy to tile Antiochia for a mediator and reconciler of peace, or to be an umpire or B arbitrator to decide the controversies bet ween them & the Romans, rather then to be the General of the war. For his very coming and majesty would be more effectuall then all his forces to strike some reverence in the Romans, and cause them to be respective unto him. For men oftentimes yeeld and remit many things of themselves willingly, to avoid war, which they cannot be forced unto by war and by arms, when they are once entred into action. These inferred again and faid, that Phaneas ipake not this for any defire & love to peace, but his meaning was to scatter and difpatch this furniture and preparation of war for this intent, That by this redious lingting, the Kings courage might abate, and the Romans gaintime to make themselves ready. For, that there was noreason possibly to be gotten at the Romans hand, they had tried sufficiently by good experience. in lending to many embassages to Rome, and in debating the matter to often with Quinting : neither would they ever have fought unto Antiochus and craved his aid, it all their hope other wife Chad not been cut off and clean failed. And now fince his helping band is prefented unto them somer then all men thought or looked for, they were not now to begin to faint and give over, but rather to request and intreat the King, that fince he was come bimtelf in person (which was the greatelt matter of all) to fet free and maintain Greece, he would fend for forces both at fea and land. For the King in arms, might peradventure obtein fomething: but dilarmed if he were, little or no reckning would the Romans make of him in the quarrely and question of the Ætolians, no, nor in his own affairs whenloever he should reason and deb tethereof. And here went the hare away. They all opened ftreight waies to ftile the King, with the name of Imperator [4.Emperour 2] and they choice thirty of the chief perionages to affift him in councell for all things requifit. Thus the Diet was distolved, and every man flipt away and retired to his own City. D The next day the King fat in a confultation with their Apocletes, in what place they should be ginthe war. And it was thought belt, first to affail the City of Chalcis, which lately the Etolians had assailed in vain. And for to effect this service, there was more expedition and speed required then any other great forces and preparations. Hereupon the King fet forward with 1000 footmen which followed him from Demesrias, and made by the way of Phocis: The Captains of the alio of the Ætolians, having levied tome few companies of their youth took another way and mee with him at Charonea, and followed with ten covered ships. The King encamped neer S. Alganea, and himself in person with the chief of the Etolians crossed the Euripus; and when he was landed and not far gone from the haven, the Magistrats and chief men of Chalcis came forth without E their gites, and some few of both fides met together for to parle. The Ætolians were earnest to perswade withthem, " That so far forth as they might without impeaching the Roman amity they would assume the King to be their allie and friend, for asmuch as he was passed into Europe "not to make war, but to deliver Greece, and fet it free in very deed, and not in word only and "falle semblance, as the Romans had done. And nothing was there more for the good and benefit " of the Cities in Greece, then to entertain the fociety and fellowship of them both. For under the "the defence and lategard of the one, they might be fure to guard themselves from the violence "and outrage of the other. But if they accepted not of the King, they were best to take heed "and fee what danger they prefently incurred : confidering the succours of the Rom ins to relieve "them were to far off, and the forces of Antisches their enemy to annoy them, to neer even at F" their gates, whom of themselves with their own power they were not able to withstand. To this, Mictio one of their chief men made this answer: I marvell much (q. he) who they be, that " Antiochus for to deliver and fet free, hath taken the psins to leave his own Kingdome, and to " pals over into Europe. For mine own part, I know no City in Greece, that either bath Roman " garrison, or payeth any tribute unto them, or is bound to unjust and unreasonable covenant, or " endureth any hards laws and conditions against their wils: and therefore the Chalcidians have "need of no perion to reftore them to freedoms, fince they be free already; nor yet of a gar-"rilon for their defence, confidering that by the grace and favour of the same people of Romo, they "enjoy peace and liberty already. As for the King, we refuse not his amity, nor yet reject " we the friendship of the Atolians. And we will take it for a speciall point of friendship that G "they shall do us, it they gently will depart out of our Iland and be gone : For, as for us, we are re-"folute in this, not to receive them within our wals, no, nor to contract with them any fociety, "without the advice and confent of the Romans. When these matters were related to the King. who trayed behind with the ships, he determined presently to return to Demetrias for that he was not come with such a power as to attempt any thing by forces where sleeing his first enterprise came to nothing the conferred with the Atolians what was to be done next : & cocluded it was to found the Achie ans, & Aminander the King of the Athamans. They inproted that the nation of the

Bosotians was clean eftranged and badly affected to the Romans ever fince the death of Barcillan and those troubles that ensued thereupon. They were perswaded also that Philopameners agreed H potentat, and principal leader of the Achaens, was both malicious and odious unto Quinting for emulation and jelousie of honour in the Laconian war. Aminander had espoused and taken to wife Apames the daughter of one Alexander a Megapolitan, who vannted himself to be defeended from Alexander the Great, named his two fons Philip and Alexander, and his daughter Apanea; whom being thus advanced by marriage with a King, her elder brother Philip accompanied into Athamania, This Philip a vain-headed young man, the Etolians and Antiockus had induced into a foolish hope (considering that for certain he was of the royall blond) toobtain the Kingdome of Macedony, if haply he could bring about to joyn Aminander and the Athamanians to Amischu. And these vain conceits of great behest wrought mightily not with Philip only, but also with A.

minander. Now in Achea there was a councell holden at Egium, and audience given there to the Embaffadors of Antiochus and the Etolians , before T. Quintius. Where the King his Embaffador spake first, and being, (as all those commonly are, that have intertemment and maintenance of Kings full of foolish babble, & making sea and land resound again with his vain pratting and sent leffe words; fet tale an end, and told them, what an infinit number on horiemen were palfing o. ver by Hellespont into Europe: whereof some of them were in compleat harness, armedatall peeces, whom they call Cataphratti: others were archers, and that of horieback, against whom there was nothing close, nothing fure enough, who when their backs are turned, and their horses run away, shoot so much the more furely, and even point-plank. And albeit these forces of horse by his report, were sufficient of themselves to defeat all the armies of Europe if they were put to- K gether, yet he addedbelides a mighty number, I wot not how many of footnen: and temfied them with namely a fort of strange nations, that scarcely had been heard of before, to wit, the Dakes, the Medians, the Ælymæans and Cadufians. But for his forces at fea, there was no baye, 66 harbors, nor havens in all Greece able to receive them. The Sydonians and Tyrians (fayther) " hold the right fide, the Aradians, and the Sidets out of Pamphylia keep the left; nations for sail and valour at fea incomparable. As for money and other provision and turniture for the war, "it were needlesse to discourse of, since they themselves knew well enough, that the realmost 66 Afia have alwaies flowed with gold, as their proper wealth. So as the Romans now werenot "to deal with Philip nor with Annibal, the one a chief person among many others of a City; " and the other limited within the confines only of the kingdom of Macedony, but with the great " Monarch of all Afia, yea, and of some part of Europe. And yet he, as mighty a potentatasheis " (not withstanding he is come to the utmost coasts and bounds of the Levant fea, to deliver and " and enfranchile Greece) demandeth nothing of the Achæaus prejudiciall to their fealty and ellogeance to the Romans their first aslies and affociats: for he required not them to take arms with "him against them, but only not to intermeddle and take part a his seeking is, that (asbeboreth "good friends and mediators between both parties) they would all well and peace among them, "and not interpole themselves in a quarrel of war. Archidamas likewile the Emb isadot for the & Etolians, requested in maner the same, that they would hold themselves quiet and in repose (a se thing most easily and tare for them) and being but lookers on the war, wait and attend the issue s' of others mens fortunes, without the hazard of their own ; yet hestaied not io, but proceeded fo M of far and overshot himself so much in words, that he brake forthat length in ill language, one of while railing against the Romans in general, another while against Quintine in particular; caling them ungrarefull and unthankfull persons, reproaching, upbraiding, and hitting them in the "teeth, how not only they had got the victory of Philip, but also taved themselves by the venue " and valour of the Ætolians : and as for Quintins he was to thank them and their means as much " as his own lile came to & the prefervation of his army. For wherin at any time (qd.he) perform-"ed he the duty and devoir of General in the field? Seen him indeed I have in the time of battell "and in the camp, take the flight of birds, kill facrifices, and make vows very devoutly, like fome " holy parish-priest or divining Prophet, whiles I my felf was fain in his defence to expose and " prefent my body to lances and darts of the enemies. To these challenges Quintins made solver N " in this wife, saying that Archidamus had more regard in whose presence he spake, then to whom " he directed all his speech : for the Achzans know very well, that all the valour of the Etolians, " ftandeth in bragging words and not in martiall deeds, as men that love to be heard in Diets and 44 assemblies rather then feen in the field and battell; and therefore no marvell if he made so small ereckning to speak unto the Acharans, considering that he knew, how well acquainted they were "with the maners and falhions of the Atolians. But he hath befides vaunted and made great brage " before the King Embassadors, and in their person, before the King himself in absence. And if a "man had not known before, what it was, and had to knit and united Antischus and the Etolians " together, he might perceive it evidently by the fpeeches of the Embaffadors: for by exchanging et lies reciprocally, and by bragging of their forces which they have not, they have inflated and c puffed up one another with vain hopes, whilestheytell and would make them believe, That o (1 Philip by them was vanquished, That the Romans by their valour were protected; and other gay matters, which erewhile ye heard building calles in the air, to the end, that you & other flates and nations would fide with them and take their parts : the King again (by his Embaffadours) overspreadeth all with clouds of horsmen and footmen, and covereth whole seas with flees

A " and armados. Now in faith this is mine hoft of Chalcis up and down, a friendly man I affure "vou, and a good fellow in his house, and one that knoweth how to entertain his guests and bid "them welcome. And verily I can liken this maner of dealing to nothing better then to a supper of his: We went upon a time to make marry with him, and I remember well it was not mid-"fummer (when the daies are longest and the fun at the hottest) where he made us passing good "cheer. And as we wondred how as tuch a teaton of the year he met with that plenty of venifon and such variety withall; the man (nothing so vainglorious as these fellows here) imiled plea-"fantly upon us and faid, we were welcome to a feast of a tame swine and no better : but well of freagood cook my mafters (qd.he) who by his conning hand, what with featoning it, and "what with ferving it up with divers fauces, bath m de all this fair shew of wild flesh, and the B "fame of fundry forts. This may fitly be applyed to the King his armes and forces of which even "now fo great boalt was made. For these divers kinds of arms, these many names of nations newer heard of before, to wit, the Dakes or Daheans (I wot not what to call them) the Medes, the "Cadusians, the Elimeans, they are but Syrians when all is done; who for their base minds by na. "ture, are much better to make a fort of flaves then a company of good fouldiers. And would to "God (you my mafters of Achea) I could repretent unto your eles the port and train of this great "King, when he ran from Demetrias, one whileto Lamia to the councell of the Etolians, & ano-"ther while to Chaleis: you should see in the Kings camp hardly two prety legionets, & those but " lame ones neither and not well accomplished: you should see the King sometime as good as beg-"ging grain of the Ætolians, to measure out among his hungry fouldiers : other whiles making "hift to take up monies at interest to make out their pay : now standing at the gates of Chalcie, Ca and anon shot out from thence and excluded clean; and when he had done nothing else but teen te Aulis and Euripus, returning fair into Atolia. Amiochus (you fee) hath yeelded but imall belief stothe Etolians, and the Atolians have as litle trufted & relyed upon the vanity of the King. And "therefore the leffe should you be deceived by them, but rather repose your selves assuredly in. the fidelity of the Romans to often tried, to often known and ap proved. For whereas they fay "It is your best course not to be embarked and interessed in this war, I ssiure you, there is nothing "more vain then this, nay, nothing so hurtfull unto your estate. For you shall be a prize and prey to the victor, without thank of either part, without any worth and reputation. Quincita was thought by the Achaens to have spoken not impertinently, but to have answered them both, fully and an case matter it was to approve his speech unto those, that were well enough enclined to have given him gentle hearing : for that it was no question nor doubt at all, but that every man would judge them to be friends or enemies to the Achaan nation, whom the Romans held for theirs : yes, and would conclude in the end of an act, to denounce war both against Antiochus & the Etolians. Moreover, according as Quintins thought good, they fent presently an aid of 500 fouldiers to Chalcis, and of as many to Pyracum. For at Athens there had like to have been a fedition and mutiny, whiles some drew the multitude (which commonly is bought and fold for mony) to take part with Antiochus upon hope of large rewards and great bounties, untill such time as Quinting was fent for by them that took part with the Romans : in to much as Apollodorns (who gave counsell and periwaded to revolt) was accused by one Leon, and being condemned, was E banished. Thus verily the embassage returned from the Achaeans to the King with present answer. The Bootians delivered no certainty athis only was their answer, Th a when Antiochus himself was come in Beoria, then they would confider and confult what they were belt to do.

Antiochus being advertifed that both the Achaans and King Eumenes also had fent men for the defence of Chaleis, thought good to make halt, that his forces might not only prevent them, but allo if it were possible receive them and cut them short as they came. And for this intent, he fent Menippus with three thousand fouldiers or thereabout, and Polyxenidas with his whole fleet. Himfelf a few dajes after marched with fix thousand of his own fouldiers; and of that levy, which on a fuddain might be gathered at Lamia, no great number of Ætolians. Those five hundred Achaens aforefaid, and the small aid that King Eumenes sent under the conduct of Xenoclides the Chalcidian, having fafely paised Euripus before that the waies and paisages were beiet, arrived at Chalcis. The Romans also who were upon five hundred, at what time as Menippus encamped before Salganea, came to Hermeum, where is the passage out of Baotia into the Iland of Enbaa, In their company was Million tent as Embassador, from Chalcis to Quintins, for to crave fome factour : who perceiving that the waies were laid and the streights kept by the enemics, leaving his intended journey by the way of Aulis, turned to Delium, minding from thence to cut over into Euben. This Delium is a temple of Apollo fituat upon the leastrand, and five miles diftant from Tanagra, from whence there is a short cut (little more then a league) over an arm of the sex unto the next parts of Eubaa. In this Temple and facred grove about it, fo religious, fo priviledged and secured (as are those franchised houses and sanctuaries which the Greeks call Assla) and Gatthattime, when neither war was proclaimed, or at leastwile not fo far proceeded, as that in the hearing and knowledge of any man there had been fword drawn, or blood field in any places In this place, and at this time, I lay, whiles the fouldiers wandred at their leifure and pleafure, some gone to see the temple above said and the grove, others walking upon the strand unarmed, and a great fort also of them scattered over the fields (such as were gone for forrage, and fewell) all on a suddain Menippus finding them loose and disbanded, charged upon them and flew them, and to the number of fifty he took alive: very few elcaped, among whom was Millio who got into a fmal vessel of merchandile. This occurent, as it troubled and disquiet. H ed Quinting and the Romans, for the losse of their souldiers, so it seemed much to eccease the right of their just quarell to make war upon Antiochm, Antiochm having advanced his army, and approached Aulis, after he had once again addressed Orators, partly of his own subjects, and partly Ætolians to Chalen, for to follow thote causes which of late he had commenced, but in more minatory terms, now prevailed eafily, notwithftanding Milligand Xenoclides laboured to the contrary, that the gates should be set open unto him. All those that were for the Romans, abandon. ed the City alittle before the Kings coming. The fouldiers of Aches and King Eumens, kent Salganea The Rom. fouldiers a fo (who were but tew) fortified and made a fconce upon the water of Euripus, to be a defence for the passage. Monippus began to assail Salganess, and the Kinghimielf to let upon the fort of Europus aforesaid. The Achaans and fouldiers of Eumenes first grew to I composition, and having capitulated to depart without any harm, quit their place of garrison. The Romans held out longer, and flourly defended the hold of Emripus: but even they allo being fo streightly invested both by land & water, and seeing now the ordnance and engins of battery, brought and ready to be planted against them, would no longer endure the fiege. When as now the King had poffessed himself of the City of Enbas, all the other Cities of that Island, refused not to submit and come under his subjection. And he thought he had made a good beginning and entrance in this war, in that so great an Island, and so many Cities commodiously seated, and or fuch importance, were reduced un der his obcifance.

O loon as P. Corn:lius Scipio the for of Cnew, and M. Avilius Glabrio, the two Confols M were entred into their magiltracy the LL of the Senat enjoined them (before any speech & question moved as touching the provinces) to facrifico greater beasts in all those temples, wherein the cultom was for the more part of the year to celebrat the iolemnity of Lettisterns, and to make their praiers in this maner, That whereas the Senat intended a new war, the gods would vouchfafe to bleffe and happily conduct the fame to the good and publick weal of the Senat and people of Rome. All those facrifices proved good and as they ought to be: eventhe very first beatts that were slain, prognosticated fortunat successe, and shewed apparent signs that the gods were pacified and well pleased. And thus the sooth aiers and bowel-priess, out of their learning, answered, It was evident, that by this war the bounds and limits of the Roman empire should be extended, and that both victory and triumph was forefignified. These answers being N reported, and mens minds fetled, and their confciences resolved of all scruples as concerning the gods, then the LL. of the Senat granted out an order, that a bill should be preferred solemnly anto the people in this form; Pleafeth it you, and is it your will, that war should be enterprized against Antiochus, and all that take his part? And if this bill paffe and be granted, are ye pleased, stat the Confuls, if they think fo good, refer the whole matter unto the Senat to take order for the managing thereof accordingly? P. Cornelius propounded this bill, and the people accepted therof. Whereupon the Senat let down a decree that the Confuls should cast lots for the government of staly and Greeces and that he whole hap it was to govern Geece, should over and above that number of sculdiers, which L. Quincius by authority and commission from the Senat had for that province o either enrolled or levied receive that army also which M. Babin the Pretor cauled to passe over the year before into Macedony, by vertue of an order from the Senat, in that behalf enacted and license he had, if need so required, to take up aid-fouldiers from among the allies without Italy, to as he exceeded not the number of five thouland. Also agreed it was, that L. Quinting the Conful of the year before, should be deputed lord General for that war. As for the other Conful, unto whom had been allotted the charge of Italy, he was commanded to levy war against the

A Boians and to their choice, whether army be had rather have of those two which the former Confuls conducted : and when he had received one, to fend the other to Rome, that those legions of Citizens should be in readiness for to be tent whither it pleased the Senat. This order being taken in the Senat, astouching the appointment and affiguration of those provinces, then it was thought good that the new Confuls shall cast lots for their governments. To Acilins befel Greece, and Italy to Cornelius. After this by a speciall lot there passed an act of the Senat, That whereas the people of Rome had ordeined to wage war at that time ag init King Antiochies, and thefe that were under his dominion, the Confuls thould caute a procediion to be tolempized. Alfothat the Conful M. Acilim should conceive and make a vow to Jupiter, for to celebrat the great Games in his honour, and to bring offerings to every alrar. This yow was by him pronounced in this form B of words, according as P. Liemius the Arch-Priest endited and prompted unto him. If that war which the people bath determined to be enterprised and made against King Antiochus, shall be performed according to the mind and contentment of the Senat and people of Rome, then fall the people of Rome celebrate unto thy honour, O Jupiter, the great Games for the space of ten daies together, and oblations shall be brought to every Altar, of that price and amounting to that sum which the Senat (hall ordain and fet down. And what Magistrais foever (hallexhibit those Games. or in what place, yea, and at what time foever they shall be represented, the same Games shall be held for good, and reputed as well done, yea, and the offrings accepted as rightly presented. After this, there was published and proclaimed by both Coil, a supplication for the space of 2 daies. When the Coff. had cast lots for the parting of their governments, the Pretots likewise went presently about the same for their provinces. To M. Junius Brutus fell both the jurisdictions, as well of C Citizens as aliens. A. Cornel. Mammula had the charge of the Brutii, M. Emylius Legians of Sicily. and L. Oppins Salinator of Sardinia. C. Levius Salinator was L. Admiral of the navy, and L. A. mylius Paulus governor of the nether Spain. And in this manner following, were the armies and forces distributed and appointed. Unto A. Cornelius were assigned the new souldiers which the former year L. Quintius the Conful, by vertue of an Act of the Senat, had enrolled. And his commission was to defend and keep in order all that tract and coast about Tarentum and Brundusium As for L. Emplins Paulus, who was to take a voinge into the farther Spain, he was allowed (befides the army which he was to receive of M. Falvins the Pro-Pretor) to have the conduct of threethouland new fouldiers footmen, and three hundred horfe : fo that of them, two third parts should confilt of allies of the Latin nation, and one third of Roman Citizens. The supply was D fent unto C. Plaminius into the higher Spain, whose commission was renewed for to have the command therestill. M. Emplins Lepidus had commandment to receive the government of the province, and withall, the conduct of the army, at the hands of L. Valerius, whom he was to succeed a and if he thought so good, to keep with him in the Province L. Valerins, in quality and and place of a Vice-Pretor: and to to divide the province, that the one part should reach from Agrigentum to Pachinus ; the other half from Pachinus to Tyndarium : also, that L. Valerius should defend the fea-coalts and the river with a ficet of twenty Gallies. The fame Pretor aforefaid was to levy and gather a double tenth of corn, and to take order for the convoy thereof to the lea, and so to be embarked and transported into Grecce. The like commission had L Opimius, to exact and take another tenth in Sardinia : but that grain was to be brought to Rome, and not to be carried over into Greece. C. Livius the Pretor and Admiral of the navy, was appointed with 300 fail ready rigged and trimmed, to fail into Greece with all speed, and to receive the ships that Acre lius had : likewile to repair, rigge and furnish the old veilels that rid in the habors, or lay at one fide up in docks. M. Junius the Pretor his charge was, to levy marriners and rowers from among the libertins, for to letve that Armado. And there were fent Embaffedors into Africk to Carthage. and into Numidia, three into either part, for to feek and purvey corn to be fent into Greece, for which the people of Rome would make prefent payment. And to wholly imployed was the City to prepare and take order for this war, that P. Cornelius the Conful published an Edict, that no Senators, or any that had authority to give their opinion in the Senat, neither any inferior Magigiftrats, should take any journey out of the City, farther then they might have return again the ismeday : Item, that there should not be five Senators absent at once from Rome. C. Livius the Pretor, whiles he used all diligence and care to prepare and provide his fleet. was empeached and hindred a time, by occasion of a debate and contention that arose between himand the Coloners of the lea-fide. For when they should be gathered and sen: to sea, they appealed to the Tribunes of the Com. from whom they were pur over and referred to the Senat . and the Senar with one voice and accord pronounced and determined, that these Coloners were not exempted from fea-fervice. The Colonies that contended with the Pretor about their immunity were thele, Hoftia, Fregena, Caftrum novum, Pyrgi, Antium, Tarracina, Minturna and

This done, the Conful Acilius by order from the Senat, confulted with the colledg of the Fe-This done, the Contul action by order from the ochar, whether the war should be proclaimed tisles or Heralds at arms, and demanded their advice. Whether the war should be proclaimed their source sufficient, to intimat and denounce and defiance given to Autiochus himfelf in person; or it were sufficient, to intimat and denounce the same to some one of his garrisons? Also whether they would advite to proclaim war against the Etolians apart by themselves . or whether it were not meet and convenient first to disclaim and renounce their lociety and friendship, and then to proclaim and denounce hostility? The Fecials answered, that heretofore they had determined and elected this point, at what time as their opinon was touching Philip, to wit, That it was all one, and made no matter, H whether the defiance were given him to his face, or only intimated to some garrisons of his. And as for the Ætoli ns, this was their mind, that they had quit already their amity, and abandoned all fociety, in that when our Embaffadors fo oftentimes had redemanded amends for wrones done, they never thought good to make restitution or satisfaction. Moreover, the Atolians had themselves sent defiance first and proclaimed war against the Romans, when as by somether fejzed Demetriat a City of our allies, and advanced before Chalcis, to affail it both by land andfea; and lastly, in that they had sollicited King Ansiochus and brought him into Europe, for to levy war against the Romans. All things now being sufficiently provided, M. Acilim the Conful published an edict and proclaimed, That all thole louldiers whom L. Quintins had enrolled, likewile all those whom he had levied of the allies of the Latine nation, who were to go with him into his, province, likewife all the Colonels and Marshals of the second and third legion, should render themselves, and be ready altogether at Brundusium upon the * Ides of May following. Himself upon the * fitth day before the Nones of the fame month departed forth of the City clad in his rich coat of arms. And at the fame time the Pretors alfotook their journies into their feverall provinces. Much about that time there arrived at Rome Embassadors from two Kings, to wit, Philip of

*Socoo pound both the Kings. And whereas both of them offred to come with all their power into Audia, and to be there in person, Ptolomee was discharged of that offer of his, but the Embassadors of w Philip received this answer, That he should highly please and content the people of Rome, in case he would not fail the Conful M. Acilius. In like manner there came Embaffadors from the Carthaginians and Mafaniffa. The Carthaginians made promife of a thouland Modii of Wheat, and that here wan- of Barley five hundred thouland for the army, and like wife to bring half to much to Rome; pray. ing the Romans to accept the same at their hands as a free gift and gratuity: adding moreover, tech the multithat they would n an out a fleet at their own charges, and were ready also to make one entireptyment of their tribute behind, which they were of duty to pay by fundry terms of many years. The Embafiadors of Majaviffa, promited in the behalf of their King, to fend five bundred thouland the proportion Modii of wheat, 30,000 of batley into Greece to the army, besides 500 men of arms and of the reft that or the ten unit followeth, nor twenty Elephants, unto M. Acidius the Col. As touching the corn, this answer was returned to to the magni- unto them, that they were content to accept thereof, fo that they would take money therefore to the worth. As to the fleet aforefaid, which the Carthaginians made offer of, they acquit them great ettate, to clean, fave as many fbips as they were to find and provide according to the tenor of the according ty quarters of and composition between them. Last of all concerning the tribus mony, none would they receive whear, who before the day.

Whiles the affairs passed thus at Rome, Antischus being at Chalcis, because he would not se sill lowed a hun- and do nothing, all a winter time, partly himfelf follicited (by fending Embaffadors) theminds of much, and yer, the States, and partly also there came unto him Embassadors from thence of their own accord: the fame pro-e and namely, among others, the Epirots prefented themselves by the common consent of their portion of bar- wholenation, and the Eleans alio came out of Peloponnefus. They of Elis craved aid against the u ley which now Achaens, who (they verily thought) would take arms against their City, because was was deat this prefent nounced against Antischus nothing to their will and good liking. Unto them were sent soon footmen under the leading of Euphanes the Cretensian. The embassage of the Epirots, plaid with both hands, meaning to deal roundly and fimply with no fide, but to go between the bark and the tree. Gladly they would make court to the King and curry favour with him, but so, as they flood " in good terms ftill with the Romans, whom they were loth to offend. For their request to him " was, that he would not draw them without great and important canfe into the quartell, confe " dering that they for the defence of all Greece lay open and exposed to Italy, and were lare before cothers to feel the Romans fingers, and receive their first affaults. But in case he were sble of " himself with his forces by land and sea to defend Epirus, and furnish it with garrisons sufficient, they would with heart and good will accept of him and his into their Cities & port-towns, but N "if so be he could not effect that, they belought him not to offer them, naked and unarmed men, to the violence of the Roman wars. Their drift was in that embassie (as it appeared) that if the King and his forces came not into Epirus (as they rather thought nay then yea) they might reletve themselves and all they had, safe, entire, and at their own liberty for the Roman armies, and win withall the Kings good grace in that they feemed to make an offer to deceive him: or if any came indeed, yet they might conceive good hope to find favours, and have pardon at the Romans bands, in that they had not expected their fuccours being to far off, but rather yeelded to the forces of Antioches being present there in person. In such fort they carried themselves in their embassage so perplexed and intricat, that the King knew not well how to answer them readily. but said, that he would fend his own Embassadors unto them for to parle and treat of all affairs perteining in common as well to them as to him. Then went he himself into Baotia, which countrey incolour and thew pretended these cruses of anger and spight against the Romans, that before I have mentioned, to wit, the murder of Barcillas, and the armies by Quintius levied against Coronea, occafioned by a massacre committed upon Roman fouldiers; but in very truth this was the reason, The fingular discipline and order of that nation in old time, was going downward and endlong many years and ages already, and the popular government of many, grown to decay and min. which cannot polifibly continue long without some change and alteration of State. Well, to Thebes he came, where all the principal and chief Stats of Bastia came flocking from all parts to meet him: Where in the General Diet and Councell of that Nation (notwithstanding he had founded the battell, and began the fray already by giving the first blow, in that he had forced the Roman garrison neer Delium and Chalcie, which were no small signs nor doubtfull overtures of war, yet hebegan with the same kind of speech he first used in the parle and conference at Chalcie, and which his Embassadors had followed in the general assembly of the Achaens, namely, demanding that they would enter into amity with him, without professing themselves enemies to the Romans, or pretending hottility against them. But there was no man there but soon found him and law him welenough: howbeit there passed an act and decree in favour of the King against the B Romans, under a vain and flight pretext and colourable the words. Having gained this nation allo, he returned to Chalcis, from thence he fent out his letters before unto the States of the Etolians, that they should meet him in Demetrias, where he would confer and consult with them of all their affairs to be managed; and thither came he by least the day appointed. Aminander allo was fent for out of Athamania to this confultation, yes, and Annibal the Carthaginian (whole countel was not required a long time) was present at this frequent Diet and Affembly. Much parle and great opening there was as touching the nation of the Theffalians; and all there in place were of common, that they should be sounded how they stoods feeted : but about the ma ner and some circumstance thereof, they were of divers minds, while some advised it to be done and executed out of nand : others thought good to put it off from winter feation (confidering now they were in the mids thereof) unto the prime and beginning of spring : others again said, that Embassadors only should be sent: and some hot-spurs there were, that gave counsell to go against them with all their forces, yes, and to fright and terrific them if they made flow halt. Now when all the krouand difficulty of this deliberation confifteth in one point, Annibal was requested by name to deliver his mind and speak to the cause in question: who turned the King and all that were present from other wandring cogitations, and induced them to the entire confideration of the totall war , and to this effect framed his speech in this wife. "If since the time that we passed over The speech of "into Greece, my hap had been to be called to any councell, when as some question was touching Anaibal. " Enhea, the Achaan; and the Bæotians, I had delivered that advice then, which now I purpole to atter this day in the question concerning the Thesialians. Above all things my counsell is, "that Philip and the Macedonians may by all means possible be wrought to this our association Duinthe war. For as touching Enbea, the Baotians and the Theffalians, who doubteth, but that "they (as nations that fland upon their own bottoms and are of no force by themselves) will al-" waies flatter them that are present in place, and be ready to crave pardon upon the same fear "that they ever shew when they are to take counsell and resolve? who doubteth (I say) but so "foon as they shal see the Roman army in Greece, they will to turn to their accustomed obedience, "and that it will be imputed to them no fault at all, that when the Romans were fo tar off, they were not willing to try the force of you(a pniffant Prince in person among them) or of your ar-" mies? How much rather ought we then, nay, how much better and more important would it be, to joyn Philipunto us then thefe? For if he once enter into the cause and be seen in action, he " can not politoly flart from us nor draw his head out of the collar : and moreover, he bringeth to that power with him, which is not to be held for a simple accour & addition to mend our forces, "but such as lately of it self without the help of others, was able to make head against the Roman "puffance. Let me have this prince on my lide, and (be it spoken without offence of any man here) "what need I doubt of the fequel & issue? especially when those, by whose means & assistance the "Romans prevailed against Philip, I (ee now ready to enter the field against them? The Ætolians "(I say) who as all the world kno weth vanquished Philip, shall now together with Philip, enter "into arms and fight against them. Over and besides, Aminander and the whole nation of the A-"thamans (whole lervice in the war, next to the Ætolians, stood the Romans in best stead) shall beon our fide, Philip at that time (O King Antiochin) full teined the fight and burden of the whole wer, when you fat fill and ftirred not a now both of you together, two most mighty monarchs. with the pullance of all Alia and Europe, thall wage war against one City and people, which to "less nothing of thing own fortune good or bad) certainly in our fathers daies was not able to "maketheir part good with one only King of the Epirots ; how hardy foever they will be when "they that be matched with you both together. But what moved me to think, yea, and affored me, "that Philip may be wonunto us to joyn in this action? One thing is this, a common good and be-"neft even the greatest bond that is of society and yet there is anothers besides it, namely, an "inducement proceeding from you that be here of Lielia : for Those your Embaliador (who (lippelent in place lamong other matters that he was wont to alledg for to animat & and move a Anisches to come into Greece, evermore affured him of this principally, and vowed that Philip "grumbled, bit the lip and freted, that under the colour and thew of peace, there were impoled gupon him hard conditions of fervitude and flavery. And he verily, I mean Those let out the fell anger of the King, and with all his words compared it to the wood rage of a wild beaft bound with "chins or being enclosed in some cage, would willingly break the gates and bars thereof. Now, if the be disposed thus, and of that courage, let us burit his bonds afunder, let us (I say) force open his iron cage, that his rage pent up to long may now break out upon the common enemies. And is inppose that our embassage effect nothing at his hands, yet may we provide and take order, that H "if we c mot work and win him to fide with our felves, yet that he fhall not combine and band " with our enemies. Your fon Selenem is now at Lysimachia, who shal not so soon with tholeforces " which he hath about him, begin to invade and wast (by the way of Thracia) the confines of Ma-" cedon, but he shal withdraw and turn Philip clean away (from giving succour to the Romars)10 "the defence especially of his own. Thus have you heard mine advice as touching Philip: nowfor the whole course and managing of the war, what mine opinion was, you have not been ignorant " of from the first beginning. It then, I might have had mine own water, and my counfell hid been "taken, the Romans should not have received intelligences of the taking of Chalen in Enbad. " nor of the forcing and winning of a little pile upon Enripm; but they had heard by this, that all "the coast of the Ligurians and of the " Cifalpine Gauls was up in arms and on a light fire of war, "and (which would have feared and frighted them most) that Annibal was in Italy. And (now "things standing as they do) my advice is, that you fend for all your forces both by land and sea. " Let your carriks and hulks with victuals and provision follow after your armado & ships of war. "For in this place, like as we are too few to perform any martiall exploits, fo we are too mink. " confidering our smal store of victuals. And when you rallied and united all your force together, "divide your navy in two parts: the one you shall keep in the rode of Corejra, to impeach the Ro-"mans, that they thall not paffe in fafety and fecurity, the other you shall cause to fail unto that " coast of Italy which looketh toward Sardinia and Africk. Your felf in proper person, withall "your land army shall march onward into the territory of the Bylliones: thence shall ye have good " means for the defence of Greece, as making the Romans believe, that your are upon the point K " to pass the seas, yea, and being ready indeed to crosse over if need should require. This gene-" rally is my connfell; mine, I fay, who as I will not take upon me a fingular skill in all kinds of war, " fo me thinks I should know how to war with the Romans, as having learned my skill thereby, s well to my colt as advantage, and as much with my good as harm, & look whatloever defign-" ment I have projected unto you, I promise and protest, that I will be faithfull and forwardin " the execution thereof: and the gods approve and bleffe that course, which your felf shall think the belt. To this effect, in a manner, was the oration of Annibal directed; which all that wat in place and heard it, rather praised for the present, then put in practice and effected afterwards For no one thing was done of all that he had faid, fave only Antioches lent Polyxenidas for a navy and army out of Afia; yes, there were Embassadors also dispatched to the General Dietsosine L Thessalians. And a day was appointed for the Ætolians and Aminander to meet the army at Phira, whither King Antiochus came ftreight after with his power. And whiles he staiedthere.expecting Aminander and the Etolians, he fent out one Philip a Megapolitan, with two thousand men to gether out the bones and reliques of the Macedonians about Cynofcephale, where the war with Philip was determined, and the quartel decided by a famous battell : were it that thereinhe followed his own head and took a concert, thereby to wind himfelf into grace and favour with the Macedonian Nation, and to bring the King into obloquie and difgrace, because he lest his souldiers unburied for that, as it is the vein (or vanity rather) engraffed in Kings by kind, he fet his mind and bufied his spirits in matters, for apparence gay and goodly, but in effect fond & foolish. There he made a mount (as it were) of a number of bones gathered together into one place, that lay lest-M tering and ftrewed here and there : athir g no doubt) that the Macedonians conned him no thank for, and which Philip (you may be fure) took in foul fcorn and malicious difdain. And therfore Philip, who at that time minded to take counfell of Fortune, and to be directed by her, as sheenclined now, tent to Marcus Bubins the Vice-Pretor, and advertised him, how Antischminvided Theffalie, and if it pleated him to itir out of his winter habour, he would meet him, that they night confer both together what were best to be done.

While Antiochus lay now encamped before Phere, where Aminander and the Etolians had joyned with him, there came Embaffadors from Lariffa, expollulating, Whereinthe Theffalians had to offended either by deed or word, that he would moleft and trouble them with war! and N withall befeeching him to retire & withdraw his forces, and debate the matter (if he had ought against them) by his Embassadors. At the same time they sent five hundred men in armes, wellappointed, under the governance of Hippolochus, to lie there in garison, who because they could not paisthither, by reason that all the avenues were seized and kept by the Kings forces, refinned to Scotufa. As for the Embassadors of the Larissans, the King made them a gracious answer, and sid, That he was entred into Theffal, not by way of hostility to distresse them, but in friendly manner to maintain and establish the freedome of the Theffalians, Likewild he fent an Empassador to Phere, to fignifie to much to them and in the fame terms. But the Phereans giving him to the fwer again, difpatched unto the King an Embalfador of their own, one Paulanias, a principal min of their City. Who after he had pleaded the femblable remonstrances to those, that had been o in the like case alledged and laid forth in the behalf and name of the Chalcidians, in that Comcell holden neer the streights of Euripus, and besides, uttered something else with more boldneffe and courage ; the King dismifled him, after he had willed them to confider more of the matter, and be well advised, that they took not that counfell which anon they would repent, whiles they fought to be too wary, provident, and forcasting the future time. When this embaffage was related at Phera, the Citizens took no long time to deliberat, but soon resolved in the maintenance of their faith and loislty to the Romans for to undergo whatfoever hazard

the formue of war should present unto them. Whereupon both they addressed themselves to defend the City with all their might, and also the King began to assault and batter the wals on all parts at once. And knowing well enough (as in truth there was no doubt) that in the iffue of the fiege of that City which he first enterprised, lay the whole importance and consequence of all, either to make him despised ever after, or feared and dread of the Theffalians, therefore he terrified the befieged inhabitants, on every fide, and by all means possible that he could device. The first assault they sustained stoutly and manfully; but afterwards feeing many of the defendants were either overturned and flain, or grievoully hurt and wounded, their hearts began to quait. yetreclaimed by the rebukes and chaftisements of their captains and leaders, and animated by their effectual exhortations, to perfift still in their purpose and resolution, they quit the uterost compass of their wall (feeing a what default they were for want of men) and retired themselves more inward into the City, into one part thereof, which was strongly fortified with a more and less circuitand compais then the other. At the length, overcome with travell and calamities, and fearing that if they were forced and taken by assault, they should find no mercy nor pardon with the conqueror, they yeelded themselves. The King following the train of victory, delaied to time, but whiles the fright was fresh, fent four thousand armed men pretently to Scotusa, where the townsmen made no stay, but rendred the town and themselves incontinently, having before their eies the fresh bleeding example of the Pherwans, who tamed by mere force and wofull miferies, were compelled to do that at last which they oblimatly refused at the first. Together with the City it felf was furrendred also Hippolochus and the Larissan garrison under his hand, All of them the King fent away without any hurt or violence offred unto their perions : for he shought therby to win the hearts and love of the Larifs ans. Having accomplished these exploits within ten daies after his first coming to Phera, he marched towards Crane with all his army, and at his full coming won it. Then he reguined and feized Cipara and Metropolis, and the borroughs & forts about them: fo as now all those quarters were subdued and put under his subjection, except Atrax and Gyrto. Then he determined to assail Larifa, supposing, that either upon the fearfull terrour of other Cities forced, or in regard of his demerit in dilmiffing the garrison to courteoutly, or by the present example of so many Cities yeelded unto him, they would not long persist in their oblinacy. And for to terrifie them the more, he commanded the elephants to march in the forefront of the vanguard, and approached himself in a square battell, with four sides, in such

The five and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Inthistime Aminander, with the whole youth and manhood of the Athamans, became mafter of Pelinaum. Menippus also with three thousand Atolian footmen and two hundred horie wentto Perrhabia, won Mallaa and Cyresia by alrault, and walted the territory of Tripolis, Flaving performed these exploits with great expedition, and celerity, they returned to Lariffa unto the King, and arrived even then when as the King was in confultation what to do with Lariffa: for the councell was divided into diverse opinions. Some thought it good to proceed forcibly, and not to defer and assail the Cities wals with fabricks and engins of battery on all fides at once; alledging that the town being fituated in a plain towards the champain field fide, might be ap-E prosched unto with ease and invelted every way. Others again inferred one while, that there was nocomparison between the strength of this City and of Phera: otherwhile that it was now winter time, and a featon of the year far unfit for warlike executions, and most of all other for the fiege and assault of Cities. As the King thus hung in the equal ballance of hope and despair, the Embafsadors of Pharfalus arrived, who, 15 good hap was, being come to furrender up their town, revived his spirits and mightily comforted his he rt.

n fort as the hearts of many of the Lirilszins waved in doubtfull suspence, between forced fear of present enemies, and kind regard of absent friends.

M. Babins in this mean while having parlied and conferred with Philip in the Dassaretians countrey, lent Appius Claudius by the common advice of thomboth, to the luccour and defence of Lariffa; who passed through Macedony, and by long journies came to the top of those hills that command Gonni. Now this Gonni is a town twenty miles diftant from Lariffa, feated jult Fin the very streights of that forrest and passe called Temps; who having taken up a larger circuit of ground to encamp in then was proportionable to his number, and made more fires in thew then need was for that company, gave femblance unto the enemie (which was the thing he aimed at) that all the Roman forces were there, together with King Philip. King Antiochas therefore pretending unto his army, that the unleatonable winter that approached, after he had stayed one only day before Lavilla, dillodged, and thence departed, and to returned to Demetrias. The A.tolians likewise and Athamanians repaired to their own countries.

Appine, albeit he faw that the fiege was levied (which was the only cause of his coming) yet down he went to Lariffa to encourage and confirm the hearts of the allies against the time to come. And a two-fold joy there was, both because the enemies were gone and had quit their coun-6 try, and also for that they saw the Roman garrison within their wals. King, Antiochus departed from Demetrias to Chalcis, where he fell in fancy and love with a damtell of that City, daughter of Cleoptolemus a Chalcidian. Now after he made means to the maidens father first by intercelfion of meffengers and mediators, and after by importuning him in his own person with earnest requests by word of mouth (who was very loth and unwilling to entangle & tie himself, in matching her to high above his own calling) at length to overcame the man, that he obteined his defire: and as if it had been a time of tetled and confirmed peace, he proceeded to confimmate and celebrat the mirriage. And forgetting clean, how at one time he had undertaken the charge of two H orat the mitriage. This rotation was with the Romans, and the deliverance of Greece, be pailed amants to important, to wit, in feafts and bankets, and in those delights and pleasures, which ordinarily (you wot well) follow upon the liberall drinking of wine; yes, and when he had there by rather wearied his body then fulfilled his appetite, he gave himfelt to fleep without compaffe. The by tames we are all soon hold of the rest of the Kings captains, by example in all places, but in Basia especially, such as commanded the garrisons. Nay, the very souldiers were let loofe and given overto take voluptuous waies, and not one of them would put on armor, keep the watch.attend the guard, or do any thing pertaining to the duty and charge of a fouldier. And therefore at the beginning of the pring, when he was come by Phoeis and Cheromea to the Randez-vont, where he had appointed from all parts his forces to meet, he foon perceived that the fouldiers had local, the winter as licentiously as their leaders, and kept no better order and ftreighter discipling, Then he commanded Alexander the Acarnanian, and Menippus the Macedonian, to lead the amy to Straint, a town in Retolia. Himfeli having done facrifice at Delphi to the honour of Anlie went forward to Nanpalkum. And after the Diet holden of all the States of Etolia, in the way which leadeth to Strains, along by Chaleis and Lysimachia, he encountred his own forces store. faid, that came by the gulf of Malea. Where Mne filochu, a Principal Acarnanian, but wrongh and bought with many gifts and prefents, not only himself won that nation to take part, & to life with the King, but also had drawn to his own mind and affection Clitus their Pretor, who at the time had the loveraign rule there, and might do all in all. He feeing that the Leucadians (who are the chief of all the Acarnanians) could not be easily induced nor brought to revolt, for the w awe wherein they flood of the Romanflect, which either was with Attilius, or about Cophale. nia, went cunningly to work with them. For having delivered his opinion in their general Councell, that the inland parts of Acarnania were to be well guarded and defended; and that as many as were able to bear arms should go forth to Medio and Tyrrheum, for fear those place should be seized by Antochus and the Atolians : there were again some who made answered faid, how there was no such need that all should be raised and levied so tumultuously in hall; for a garrison of five hundred men was sufficient. And when he had obteined that number of young & able men, he placed three bundred of them in garrifon at Medie, and two hundred at Tirthum: his reach and drift was to have them put into the Kings hands for holtages. And evenuther time arrived the Kings Embaffadors at Medio. whole embaffage being heard, they laid their beids I together and consulted in the publick assembly what answer to return unto the King. Somewere of opinion to continue still in the Roman fociety : others were of advice again, that the Kines offer of amity was not to be rejected. The counsell of Clytus was mean and indifferent between both, and therefore accepted to wit, that they should addresse the Embassadors to the King to intreat him that he would permit them to take a day of deliberation upon a matter of such confequence in a full Diet of the Acarnaniaus. In this Embassage Mnessochus, and thole of bissation were employed of fet purpote: who having dispatched messengers covertly to King, to advertife him to approach the town with his forces, trifled our the time themselves, and made no halt to fet forward in their embathe. Whereupon these Embassadors were scarcely gone touthof the City, when Antiochus was entred the borders, and anon shewed himself hard at the gate, M And whiles they that wift nothing of this treaton were affrighted, and in great trouble and turmoil, called the youth haltily to arm, he was by Clysus and Mnefilochus let into the City. Some willingly of themselves came running about the King : those also that were of the adverlepus, for very fear joyned with him. Whom he feeing to be afraid and terrified, he enterteined with gracious words, and to gently handled them, that in hope of his elemency to much disulged and spoken of abroad, certain States of Acarnania revolted and turned unto him. Then from Me die he went to Tyrrheum, unto which place he had fent Mnessleebus and his Embassadors afore hand But the treachery and accest at Medio being discovered, made the Tyrtheans more way and carefull then otherwise fearfull, who made him this plain direct answer without any double anbiguity, that they would admit of no new alliance, without the advice and authority of the Ro- N man Generals : to they thut their gates, and dispoted armed men upon their wals, Nowitell out very fitly and happily for confirming and encouraging the hearts of the Acarnaniaus, that Co. Offavius fent by Quintius, having received a garrison and some few ships of A. Posthamius, who by Assilius the Leutenant had been appointed Governour of Cephalenia, was come to Leucu, and and much comforted the Allies, and put them in good hope, who also gave them to undertised, that M. Acilius the Conful had already passed the seas with his legions, and the Romans were encamped in The flaty. And for as much as this bruit carried a great likelihood of truth, by realist that the leafon of the year ferved now for navigation, the King after he had planted a garrioust Medio and in other towns of Acarnania, departed from Tyrrhenm, and passing through the Citis of Atolia and Phocis, returned to Chalcis.

Much about the time M. Baviss and King Philip, who had communed and deviced togther before (during the winter) in the Dadaretians country, having tent Appins Claudinime The faly, for to rathe the fiege before Larifa; and because the season then was nomeer and too foon for execution of any exploit, were retired to their wintring harbours, now in the beginning of the Spring joyned all their forces together and came down into Theffaly. (Now at that time was Antiochus in Acarnania.) And at their first coming, Philip began to lay siege anto

A Mallan, and Babius to Phacium: which when he had forced in manner at the first affault, he won Phefius allo with like expedition. From whence having retired himself to Arras, he took Chretim, and so consequently surptised Ernium, and after he had planted garrisons in these towns that the had thus recovered, he joyned with Phil.p again lying in hege before Mallaa. Upon the very coming of the Roman army, when the townsimen had yielded themselves either for tear of forces, or for hope of pardon, they marched joyntly together with one army to recover those towns whereof the Athamans were feized: to wit, Agressem, Evicusium, Compbi, Silasa, Tricca, Melibes, and Pholoria: After this, they invefted P. discum, where Philip the Megapolitan by in garrifon with five hundred foot, and forty horie: but before they gave the affault, they fent a trumpet to Philip to give him warning, that he should not ad ensure to try the utmost hazard. But he re-B turned this answer again right frontly unto them, that he would be content to commit himself tothe Romans or the Theffalians he pasted not whether, but put his life and estate into the hands of King Philip he never would. Now when it appeared that they were to proceed by force, and for that it feemed that Limnaa also at the same time might be assaulted, it was thought expedient that the King should go to Limnan, and Babius staid still to batter and forcethe town of Pel-

It fortuned at the same time that M. Acilius the Cos. having passed the seas with a power of 10000 foot, and 2000 horie and fifteen Elephants, commanded certain cholen Colonels of footmen to conduct all the Infantry to Lariffa, whiles himself with the Cavalry came to King Philip before Limman, At the coming of the Conful the town was yielded incontinently: the Kings gar-Crison was delivered, and the Athamanians withall. Then the Consol went from Limnas to Pellineum, where the Athamans yielded first and afterwards Philip also the Megapolitan rendred himfelf. And as he came down from the fort, Philip the King chanced to meet with him, and in scorn and derifion commanded his men to falute him with the stile of King, and himself also by way of mockage came close unto him, and greeting him by the name of brother Plulip, scoffing and jefling in broad terms, far unfitting, I wot, his royall Majeffy. Then was he brought before the Cof. and put in ward, and not long after tent bound to Rome. All the multitude befides of the Athamamans, salfo of King Amiochus his fouldiers, which were within the garrifons of those towns that were furrendred about that time were delivered unto Philip, who amounted to the number of 3000. The Conful departed to Lariffa to confult and take advice for the generall course of the D whole war. And in his way there met him Embassadors from Pieria and Metropolia, for to render their Cities. Philip having contreoully and lovingly intreated above all other the priloners of the Athamanians, that by their means he might win the grace and favour of that nation, and conceived ome hope to conquer Athamania, led his army thither, and lent his captives aforehand into their leverall Cities. Now they were of great account and reputation among their countrimen, and with all made report of the King his clemency toward them, and how liberally and bountifully besides he ased them: And Aminander verily, whose presence and majesty had kept some of them in allegeance, fearing left he should be delivered into the hands of Philip (who long time had been his mortall enemy;) and unto the Romans, whom he knew to have just cause at that time to be offended with him for his revolt, departed out of his own Realm with his wife and chil-E dren, and retired himself to Ambracia. Thus all Athamania became subject to King Philip, and at

The Conful fo journed certain daies at Lavista, especially for to refresh his beasts, which first had been fea-fick, and afterwards were tired with long travel; and thus when he had renewed, as it were, and repaired his army with a little reft and repose, he marched to Craso. At his coming thither, these towns, to wit, Pharfilus, Scotusfa, and Phere, together with King Antiochus his garrifons that lay there, were yielded up unto him. And having put unto their choice, either to be gone or tarry fill with him: as many of them as belaw willing (and those were about a thouland) he delivered unto King Philip: the reft he tent back difarmed to Demetrias. Then he regained Proerna and the fortresses and piles there about it. Then began he to conduct forward his army toward the gulph of Malea: and when he approached the firaights upon which the town Thaumaa is situate, all the slower of the youth in their armour quit the City, and put themselves in ambulh about the woods and passages, and from the higher ground charged upon the Romans in their march. The Conful at the first lent certain unto them, to parl near at hand with them, and to fee if they could scare them from such desperate outrage: but perceiving that they persisted fill as they began, he commanded a Colonel with two entigns of fouldiers to fetch a compais about, in such fort, that he got between those armed men and the town, and kept them from entrance; whereby he possessed himself of the City, being void of defendants. They they that lay in the forrest mambush, hearing an outery behind their backs of the town taken, sled backward out of all pansof the wood, and fell upon the fword. The Conful then departed from Thanmaci, and the Gecond day came as fat as the river Sperchins, and so forward unto the territory of the Hypatains,

During the time of these occurrents, Antiochus lay at Chalcie, who by this time seeing that he had gettern in Greece, but the pleasure of one wintring, spent to delicionsly in Chalese, and a dishonourable marriage; began to blame the Æcolians for their vain promises, and especially Thous; but Annited he had in great admiration, reputing him not only for a fage and prudent man, but alfofora true Prophet, who foretold him of all things that then were come to pass: howbeit for fear that his cold flackness might not overthrow that quite, which his rash solly had begun and enterprised, he sent out his courriers into Atelia, to give them warning to levy all their youth and affemble them rogether; and himfeif for his own part had brought thither almost 10000 footmen, who were made up full and furnished by them that after came out of Asia, and soo horiemen besides. To this place perceiving that there repaired smaller numbers by many degrees thanever at any time before, and that they were but the Nobles only and tome few of their raffalls, who protested, that they had done their endeavor to levy out of their Cities as many as posfibly they could : but neither by authority, nor for love and favour, nor yet with abiolizecommand were they able to prevail or do any good with them that refused warfare:) and seeing himfelf thus forfaken on all fides, as well of his own subjects who dragged behind in Afia, as of his allies who performed not those matters, in the hope whereof they had called him to affilt them, I he withdrew himself within the ftraights of Thermopyla,

This mountain divideth Greece in the very middle, like as Italy is parted in twainby the ridge of the Appennine. On the fore-part of this straight and forrest of Thermopylatoward the North lyeth Epirus and Perrhebia, Magnesia and Thessaly, also the Phthiotæ of Achas, and the gulph Malen: but more fouthward is discovered the greatest part of Etolia and Acarnania, Phocis Lacris, and Baotta, together with the Island Eubaa joyning close thereto: behind it is situate the country of Attica running into the fea like a promontory, and besides it Peloponnes un. This mountain taking his beginning at Leucas and the Ponant or Westerniea, reacheth through Atoliato the Levant or Easterly Ocean, and is fo full of rocks and rough crags betwen, that no wholearmies no, nor fo much as single travellers lightly appointed, can find but hardly and with much ado k the waies and paths to pais through: the utm oft brows and the hils of this mountain bending toward the call they call Oesa; and the highest pitch and knop thereof, is called Callidromos; at the foor whereor lyeth the valley leading toward the gulph of Malea, wherein the plain is not above threeftore pares broad. And this is the only high and port-way by which an army may man hift it be not otherwise empeached. And hereupon it is, that the passage is called * Pyla: and of some (because there are found therein certain natural hot waters or bains) Thermop, la: even that very place which is to famous and renowned for the memorable death of the Lacedamonians more than for any worthy battell against the Persians. Here lay encamped Antiochus at this present(estrying nothing that mind nor resolution as those Lacedamonians did) within the gates as it were of the firaights, where he enclosed and fropped the pissage besides, with firong defences: And L when he had cast a double rampire and trenth, yea, and raised a mure and wall where need was (which to do the place afforded him great plenty of stone lying every where) and had made all fute: preluming confidently that the Roman army would never venture nor be able to break through those barricadoes that way : he sent of those 4000 Ato ians (for so many were mettogether) fome to keep a garrison in Heracles, situate even before the very gullet and freight; and others to Hipara: for that he made no doubt but the Conful would affail Heraclea, and many poss brought word, that all about Hypata was already wasted.

Now the Conful having spoiled the territory of Hypata first, and then of Heraclea, (wherethe Ætolians aids did no good and ierved to no purpose in the one place or the other) pitched his camp over against the King, even in the very mouth of the gullet, near the sountains of the hot M waters atorelaid: both those regiments above-named of the Ætolians were got within the town Heraclea, and there kept themselves fure. Antiochus, who before he faw his enemies, thoughtall was fast enough and sufficiently fenced, began then to fear lest the Roman foul diers would find out some privy paths and waies, thereby they might pass and get over those high hils that commanded his camp: for a rumour ran, that the Lacedamonians in times past were fo enclosed by the Persians, and of late daies also King Philip was likewise compassed and environed by the very same Romans. Whereupon he dispatched a messenger to the Ætolians in Heraclea, willing them to do him thus much service yet in these his wars, as to seize the tops of those hils and to keep them that the Romans might have no passage that way. Upon this message received there arole some diffention among the Atolians. Some were of mind to obey the King his will and N commandment and to go accordingly; but others thought better to tarry fill at Heracles, to attend upon fortune and fee what would happen: to the end, that if the King should chance to be vanquished by the Conful, they might have in readiness their forces fresh and in heart, to succour and aid their own Cities near at hand; or if his luck were to defeat the Conful then they might follow the Romans in chair, when they were disbanded and scattered afunder. Both parts, thus di ided as they were, not only perfifted fill in their severall defignments, but also put the same in execution by the mielves. For two thousand of them remained at Heraclea; the other two thost fand parted themselves three waies, namely, to Callidromos, to Rhoduntia, and Tichius, (thele at the names of three principall high hills;) and each company took and held one. The Confel when he faw that the Ætoilans were poffessed of these higher places, fent M. Porcius Cato and L. V. irrus Flaceus two of his Lieutenants (who both had been Confuls) with two thousand chosen men against these holds of the Actolians, to wit, Flaccus against Rhoduntia and Tithius and Coto against Callidromos: himself before that he advanced his battell against his enemies, made a brief speech unto his souldiers in this manner: "My souldiers, I see that the most part of you even of every quality and degree, are they that in this very Province sometime lerved "under the conduct, charge, and government of T. After this speech the assembly brake up, and the souldiers being dismissed, made ready their armor and weapons, before they took repast or repose. And in the m orning, by dawning of the day, the Conful put out the fignall of battell, and let his army in array, with a narrow and pointed front, according to the nature and straightness of the place. The Kirg feeing the enfigns of his enemies, led forth his forces like wife. Part of his light armours he planted before the rampier and trench in the forefront, then he placed the flower and firength of the Macedonians, whom they call Sariffophori, i.e. Pikemen, for the furety and fafeguard of his deferces and fortifications. And to flank these on the left side, he put the archers, the flingers of darts, F and flingers of stones, hard upon the foot of the hill, that from the higher ground they might affail and pelt the naked fides of the enemies. On the right flank of these Macedonians, at the very edge and point of the mures and defences, which as they were enclosed and mounded with those places which reach to the fea, and are unpassable by reason of the bogs, muddy marthes, quagmires, and quicklands, he fet the Elephants with their ordinary and usuall guard. After them his horemen and men of arms. Then leaving an indifferent space between, he ranged the rest of his forces in the second ward or middle battaillon. The Macedonians who were best owed before the campand the trenchat the first sustained the Romans easily enough (who assaid on every side to makean entry) for much help they had of them, who from the upper ground weighed bullets out of their flings, as thick as an hail florm, who lanched darts also, and shot arrows besides. But G when as afterwards greater numbers of enemies pressed upon them, and charged them with such violence as possibly might not be endured, they gave ground, and retired within their fortifications, keeping yet their array and their ranks whole. And then from the rampier they made (as t were/another pallisado with their long pikes that they held out afore them. were run clean through: and either they had given over and done nothing or else more of them H had died for it, but that M. Porciss Cato having beaten from the top of Callidroms the Atolia ans, and flain a great part of them (for he surprised them suddenly at unawares, and wost of them fast asleep) appeared upon the hill that commandeth the camp. Flaceus sped not so well at Tichisus and Rhodiuntia, who laboured to get up those cliffs and holds, but to no purpose, The Macedon nians and the rest that were in the Kings host and camp, at first, when they descried afar off nothing but a multitude and number marching, imagined verily, that they were the Ætolians, who having discovered the battell and fight a good way off were coming to aid them. But so soonas they beheld and discerned near at hand the ensignes and armour of the Romans, they took themselves in their own errour, and were upon a sudden strucken with such fear, that they all stung their weapons away, and fled. But both their fortifications and defences in the way & also the narrow. ness of the vale through which they were to be pursued, hindred the Romans in sollowing the chase. And the Elephants above all which were in the rereward took up the ground so, as that the footnen could hardly pais by them, and the horsemen by no means possible; so affrighted were the horses, and caused more trouble and disorder among themselves, than they didduring the battell, Besides the Romans staid sometime behind, whiles they risted and ransacked the camp, Howbeit, they had the enemy in chale that day as far as Lylaum, killing and taking in the very way, not only many horses and men, but also saying the Elephants which they could not take alive; which done they returned to their own camp, which that day had been affailed by the Ætolians. who were of the garrison of Heraclea; but that enterprise, as it was exceeding bold and audacious, fo it took no effect at all. The Conful having at the reliefe of the third watch the hight w ensuing sent before his Cavalry to pursue the enemy, advanced likewise the ensigns of his legions forward by break of day. The King by this time had won some ground, and got a good way before; for he never gave over galloping with bridle in horse neck, untill he had recovered Elatta Where first he gathered together the broken ends of his army thus dispersed in flight, and so has ving rallied a small and poor troop of souldiers, and the same armed by the halfs, he retired to Chalcie. The Roman Cavalry was not able to overtake the King himself at Elatia, but overthrew and cut off a great part of his army, which either for weariness refled themselves dragging hehind, or elle were scattered one from the other, as miffing their way in those unknown quarters, going as they did without their guids: and letting afide five hundred which kept about the King, there was not one that escaped of the whole army. Which was but a small number in proportion I. of 10000 (if they were no more) for so many (according to Polybius) we have written that the King conducted over with him for his part into Greece. What were they then to that great power, which (if we believe Valerius Antias) came with the King for he writeth that he had in his holt threescore thousand, and that forty thousand were slain of them, and above five thousand taken prisoners, with the loss of military enfigns two hundred and thirty. Of Romans there died in all a hundred and fifty.

As the Conful marched with his army through Phocis and Baotia, the States and Cities which were privy to the revolt and partly culpable, flood without their gates with their infules and veils in token of peace, and craved mercy, tearing they should have been pilled and ransacked as enemies. But his hoft journeyed every day as in a peaceable and friend-country, doing no hurt or M wrong to any earthly creature, untill they were come into the territory of Corona: where the Statue or Image of Antiochus erected in the Temple of Minerva Iionea kindled theircholer, and the fouldiers were permitted to spoil the country lying about that Temple. But bethinking themselves that (confidering the faid Statue was fet up with the publike confent of all Bactia) it was an indignity to deal fo hardly with that territory only of Corona, the fouldiers were immediatly called in and reclaimed, and to they ceased the wasting and spoiling thereof. The Bootians only had a check and rebuke by words for carrying to unthankfull hearts to the Romans of whom they had fo lately received such high favours and benefits.

At the very time of the battell aforesaid, there rode at an hor ten ships of the Kings, in the gulph of Malea near to Thronium under the charge and conduct of Isidorus. To which place Alex- N and r the Acarnanian, being fled from the conflict, fresh bleeding and full of grievous wounds, brought news of the unfortunat fight. Wherupon the ships in great fear for this late terrour, made haste and away to Cencum in Eubaa, where Alexander died, and was interred. But three other thips which were come out of Afia, and lay in the fame rode, upon the news of the defeat of the army returned to Ephelus. And Ilidorus crossed the seas from Ceneum to Demetrias, if peradventure the King were fled thither. About that very time, A. Attilus the Admiral of the Romannavy intercepted and surprised great store of the Kings provisions, which had passed already the straights near the Island Andres. Some ships he sunk, others he boorded and took: as for those that came hindmon in the rereward, they turned fail and shaped their course into Asia. Attilius being returned to Pyracim (from whence he came) with a fleet of thips taken from the enemies, divided great O flore of corn both among the Athenians, and other allies also of that country.

Anti-chas somewhat before the Consul his coming, loosed from Chalcie, and first fell with the Island Terus, and afterwards failed to Ephefus, Against the Conful his arrivall at Chalcis thegates were ier open for him, and Aristotle the Captain there for the King, quit the place upon the approachment of the Conful. A damage of any one City) the army was brought back to Thermopyla, and wan much more honour and commendation for the modelty used after victory than for the victory it self. From thence the Conful dispatched M. Cato to Rome, by whose certain and fore relation, the Senat and people might have full knowledge of all the affairs that had passed. Who taking sea at Creula(a port town of Merchandise standing within the inmost gulph of Corineh) arrived at Paire, a City in Achea, From Patre, he coasted along the rivers of Atolia and Acarminia, as iar as Corphu, and fo cut over to ' Hydruntum in Italy, from whence he travelled by land, and in exceeding of training great haste within five daies came to Rome. Early in the morning before day light he entred the City, and from the gate rode directly to M. Junius the Prætor, who affembled the Senat betimes by the break of day: and thither, L. Cornelius Scipio (who some daies before had been dismiffed R and lent away from the camp by the Conful) hearing at his first coming that Cato was got before him, and in the Senat, repaired, even as he was relating the news. Then theie two Lieutenants by the commandment of the Senat were presented in the generall assembly of the people where they declared the same which they had done before in the Senat house, as touching the deeds atchieved in Etolia. And ordained it was that a folemn procession for three daies should be holden, and that the Prætor should sacrifice forty head of greater beasts, in the honour of what gods he would bimfelf. And at the same time M. Fulvius Nobilior, who two yers before went as Prator into the farther Spain, entred the City in pomp of an Ovation, or perty triumph, He caused to be born before him of filver bigats 1 30000. And befides that, filver in coin and ready money, 12000 pound

C weight. Also in gold the weight of 127 pound. Acidius the Conful tent certain messengers from Thermopyla to the Etolians at Heraclea, to advertise them that before he came they would now at last be wifer, and bethink themselves (after such experience of the King his vanity and insufficiency for to deliver up Heraclea, and crave pardon of the Senat, either for their willfull folly, or their blind errour. Who used these and such like motives and inducements unto them, namely, That other Cities likewise of Greece (during this war) abandoned the Romans and revolted from them, at whose hands they had received so many benefits: yet because that after the King was fled (upon whose affurance they had disloyally broken their allegeance) they stood not out still, norperfilled obstinatly in their fault and folly, were received to mercy and protection. The Ætolians likewife albeit they followed not the King, but fent for him, and were rather conducters and D leaders, than companions and affociats in this war, yet if they could take up in time and repent, they might be pardoned and faved. But no answer returned they tending to peace: nay, it appeared, that the matter would come to a triall by arms, and for all the King was vanquished, yet the Atolian war was behind as wholly and entire as before time. Whereupon the Conful diflodged from Thermopyla, and marched directly against Heraclea: yea, and the very same day he rode on horseback all about the walls to view the fituation of the City. This Heraclea is seated at the foor of the mountain Octa: & though the town it felf standeth in a plain, yet a fortress it hath built upon an high ground, which as it overlooketh the City, so it is so steep on every side, that it is altogether inaccessible. After he had diligently beheld all things that were to be marked and known. he determined to assault the town in four places at once. Unto L. Valerius he gave in charge to E plant his platforms and to batter that fide where the river Afopus runneth, and where the publike place of exercise is built. T. Sempronius Longus had commission to assail the Castle, without the walls indeed, but yet better inhabited and more peopled (as a man would fay) then the town it felf. On that fide which standeth toward the gulph of Malea, which part yielded the hardest accels, he appointed M. Babins. And from another prety river which they call * Melas, he fet Appins *Black water Claudius opposite against the Temple of Diana. Through the great industry and earnest labour of these four gallunts, striving who could perform the best service, the work went so well forward, that within few daies the frames and platforms, the Rams and all other engins of battery meet for the affault of Cities were finished. For besides that the territory about Heraclea, being a moory ground and full of tall trees, afforded them plenty enough of timber to frame and per-F form all forts of fabricks : the houses also in the entry of the City without in the Suburbs standing void, by reason that the Ætolians had put themselves within the walls, yielded unto them not only posts, beams, joysts, planks, and boords, but brick, and tile, plaster, morter, and stone of all fizes for divers and fundry uses. So, the Romans assaulted the town rather with fabricks, ordnance, and artillery, than by force of arms: but the Ætolians contratiwite defended themselves by main strength and their weapons. For when as the walls should be shaken with the Rams, they caught not hold of them as the manner is with cords, and by plucking them ande, avoided their force; but armed in great number, they carried fire with they to fling upon the terraces and the fabricks. They had besides divers vaults and arches in the walls, at which they could readily and firly fally out: and ever as themselves closed up the breaches of their walls, or made Gnewfortheruinat, they would remember to make more of those vaults still, that in many places at once they might break forth upon their enemies. Thus for the first daies, whiles they were fresh in heart. they issued forth oftentimes and many together, and quit themselves right lustily: but afterwards in fewer numbers, and more flackly every day than other. For being evermore emplayed about many things at once, nothing so much tamed and wearied then, as watching. For

whereas the Romans had a great number of fouldiers, and one guarded after another incceffively by turns; the Ætolians being fo few, were constrained without any change, to continue in uncef-

fant labour night and day. Thus for the space of twenty four daies they had no rest nor respit but H day and night was all one unto them, maintaining fight fill, and labouring without intermifion against the enemies that assailed the City in all four quarters at once, When the Confulknew once that the Ætolians were wearied and overtoiled (partly by counting the time, and partly by that which he had learned of certain fugitives) he used this policy and fratagem. About midright he founded the retreat, and having drawn all his fouldiers at once from the affault, held them quiet in the camp untill the third hour of the day. After that, he began to give a iresh charge, and continued it unto midnight foilowing, and to gave over again untill the same hour before noon. The Ætolians supposing verily that the cause why they surceased the assaut, was for very wearineis (like as themselves were tired out) fo foon as the Romans had the retreat founded unto them, departed every man from his ward and quarter, as if they also by the same signal were called away, I and shewed not themselves in armor upon the walls before the third hour of the next day. The Conful having at one time given over the battery aforesaid at midnight, began at the fourth watch a fresh assault again with all forcible means in three parts: and at one tide, hegare commandment to T. Sempronius to keep his men together, and intentively to observe and wait for the fignall: affuring himlelf that in the alarm by night, the enemies would run to those places from whence they heard the noise. The Ætolians, many of them being found asleep, had much to do to rouse themselves, and were loath to rise up from their sweet sleep, their bodies being so weary with toiling, moiling, and watching before. Some of them who were yet awake ran in the dark to the place where the affailants made a noise. Their enemies laboured to get into the town some by mounting over the ruins and breaches of the broken wall, others by scaling and climbing with K ladders, And against them the Ætolians ran from all parts, ready to succour and help. One quanter, whereas there flood houses without the City, was neither desended nor affailed: but as there were fome ready and waited for the figual to give the affault, fo there was not one of the other part for to refift and defend. Now began the day to peep, when as the Conful put forth the fignal and the fouldiers began to mount over into the City, and found none to withfland them: fome entred at the wals half broken down, others scaled them with ladders where they flood whole and sound And the cry was not so soon heard that the City was taken, but the Ætolians left their guardson all fides, and fled into the Castle. The fouldiers that had won the town were permitted by the Cof to rifle and ranfack it: which was not done fo much upon anger and despite, as in this regard, that the fouldiers who had been kept short & fatting thus long (not with tanding so many towns l recovered out of the enemies hands) might once at length in lome one place taffe the fruit of victory. The Cof, having called from thence about noon, the fouldiers unto him, divided them into two parts, whereof he commanded the one to cast about the foot of the hils unto a rock or diff, which being in height equal to the Castle aforesaid, was notwithstanding divided from it by a valley between, seeming as if it had been sometime a part thereof and cut from it. Now these two points of the hils shor up so near together in the head, that from the top of the one, a man might lance a dart into the Cattle or fortress. The Cof, with the other half of the fouldiers staidbeneath, expecting a fign and token from them that were to get up the cliff behind, ready therenon to mount up from the town fide into the fort. The Ætolians that were within the Caffle could neither abide at the first the shout of those that had seized the cliff, nor afterwards the assault of the M Romans from the City, both for that their hearts failed them and were danted already, and also because they were unprovided of all necessaries for to endure any long siege and assault: considering that women and children and all the other impotent multitude unmeet to bear arms, were got thither in fo great numbers, that the place was hardly able to receive and contain much less to keep and maintain them; and therefore at the first assault, they cast down their weapons and yielded. Among other principal personages of the Ætolians, Damocri: us also was delivered; he, who in the beginning of the war when T. Quintius defired to fee a copy of the Decree of the Etolians for the fending for Antiochus, answered, That he would shew it him in Italy, when the Explans lay there encamped. For this proud speech of his the Romans now conquerors, were the gladder that they had got him into their hands.

During the time that the Romans assailed Heraclea, Philip also besieged and battered Lamia, according as it was before agreed between them: for near unto Thermopyle, at what time as the Cof, returned out of Baotia, he met with him, of purpose to fignifie his joy in the behalf of him and the people of Rome, for their archieved victory; and alforo excuse himself by occasion officenels that he was not present with him in person in the managing of the wars. From thencethey parted afunder, and took divers waies, for to affault these two Cities (as I said) both at once and diffant they were one from the other near seven miles. And for a much as Lamia was seated upon an hill therefore the town discovered and overlooked all the country about but especially on that side toward Heraclea, where, by reason that it seemeth a less compass, it representeth a full prospect to the eye. When as the Romans and Macedonians labouring and firiving who could do 0 better, were day and night emploied either about their fabricks and pioners work, or elle in skirmish and fight; the Maccdonians found more difficulty than they, in this respect, that the Romans were busied in platforms, mantlets, and works all above ground; but the Macedonians were put to undermine: and oftentimes (as it falleth out in such stony and craggy ground) they met with hard flints and rags not minable, and such as no iron or feel tool was able to could and pierce. The King seeing little good done by this means, and his enterprise going but slowly for

The fix and thirtieth Book of T.Livius.

A ward, began to found the townsmen; and to tempt them to render the City, using the mediation therein of their Chief Citizens whom he parled withall: for this reckoning he made, that if Herachas were forced before it; they within the City would looner yield unto the Romans than to him, and so the Consul should win all the thank to himself for levying the siege. And nothing was he short of his count; for immediatly upon the winning of Heraclea, a messenger came unto him from the Consul, willing him to surecase the affault and the siege; alledging, it was more reason, that the Roman souldiers who had fought in ranged battell with the Ætolians, should have the reward and recompence of the victory. By this means Lamia was abandoned, and by theruin of Heraclea her neighbour City, avoided and ectaged the like calamity of her own.

Some sew daies before that Heraclea was won, the Ætolians having assembled a Dier at Hyta-

Rta, addressed Embassadors unto Antiochus, and Thom among the rest even he, who aforetime had been sent unto him. His commission and charge was, first, To request the King that once again he would rally his forces as well by land as at fea, and in person pais over into Greece: secondly, If any other important affairs hindred him, yet that he would lend unto them both men and monev. For asit touched his Highness, in honour, reputation, and credit, not to see his airies abandoned; fo it made for the lafegard and fecurity of his own Realm and royall estate, not to lufter the Romans (after they had oncedefeated the Etolians) to fail over into Afia at their ease and pleasure, with all their forces. These were no fained devices, but true remonstrances indeed; and therefore prevailed the more with the King. Whereupon he delivered money prefently to the Embassadors, sufficient to defray the charges of the war, and promited certainly to send mento Cleve both by land and lea. Thear alone of all the Embaffadors he kept fill with him, who was not himself unwilling to stay behind, because he might be ever at hand to call upon the King for to perform his word and beheft. But the winning of Heraclea killed the heats clean of the Etolians in the end: and within few daies after that they had dispatched their Embassadors into Asia, about the renewing of the war and sending for the King, they laid apart all designments of arms, and addressed their Orators unto the Romans to crave peace. Who, as they began to make some speech, the Consul cut them off, and said, he had other matters of greater importance tothink upon and to dispatch; and commanded them to content themselves with a truce for ten daies, and to return to Hippata; and with them he fent L. Valerius Flucess, unto whom they should declare those things that they were about to deliver unto him, and whatsoever else they D had to lay. When they were arrived at Hypata, the chief and principall Ætolians affembled themlelves in the lodging of Flaceus, consulting with him what course they were to take in their treaty with the Consul. And when they went in hand to alledge the ancient rights of the leagues, and to lay abroad their good demerits, and what they had done for the Romans: "Flaccus bad "them lay a straw there, and speak no more of the priviledge of those covenants and accords "which they themselves had broken; shewing unto them, that they should speed better and "gain more by a simple confession of their trespass, and in recourse only to prayer and humble "iupplication; forasmuch as all the hope they might have of safety, rested not in their own defert and goodness of their capse, but in the meer clemency and mercy of the people of Rome; "promising for his part to affift them and second their petitions as well to the Consul as the Se-E chat of Rome; fince that thither also they must of necessity send an Embassage. This way seemed to them all, the best simply for their safety, namely, to put themselves to the disposition and devotion of the Romans: for they supposed by this means to drive the Romans for very shame to have regard of them & not to offer hutt or violent outrage to them, coming in the habit of poor suppliants: and yet withall if any opportunity of better fortune should in the mean time offerit self unto them, to be their own Masters nevertheless and at their choice. When they were come before the Cof. Phaneas the chief of that embassie, made a long Oration, couching and framing his words fundry waies right artificially, to mitigate and affiwage the wrath of the conqueror, which he knit up and concluded with this speech, saying, That the Etolians committed themselves and all that they had to the mercy and protection of the people of Rome. When the Cof. heard those words: See you do so then indeed (qd, he) O ye Ætolians, and take heed I advise you that you deal herein bona fide. Then Phaneas brought forth and shewed a fair instrument of a Decree, wherein the same was engrossed in plain terms, Since that (qd, he again) you mean good earnest, and are at our disposition I demand that ye deliver unto me out of hand Dicearchus a statesman of yours, and Menatus of Epirus, (who being entred into Nanpathum with a garrifon, had compelled the City to revolt) alto Aminander and all the Nobles of the Athamans, by whole comfell and inggestions ye fell from us and rebelled. Phaness interrupted the Cof. before he had well made an end of his speech, We yield not our selves (qd.he) to be your villains and slaves, but as allies to be protected by you: and I am verily perswaded you know not what you do to impose those things upon us against all the manner and custome of the Greeks. The Cos, replied again; In good faith, I pais not (qd.he) greatly what the Atolians deem well or ill done according to the fashions of the Greeks; all the whiles that I, after the custome of the Romans, have that power and command over them, who erewhile by vertue of their own decree yielded unto us, And heretofore by force of our arms have been vanquished and subdued by us. And therefore, unle's that be executed which I command, yea, and with speed, my will is, that presently here you be bound hand and foor: and with that he commanded chains and gyves to be brought forth, and the Lictors to come about them for to lay hold upon them. Then the stout courage both of Phancas

Phaness and the rest of the Ætolians, was well cooled & abated; and so at length they saw in what it poor plight they were. And Phaneas made answer, Thet both himself and the Ætolians there prefent in place, knew well, that those things were to be performed which were imposed upon them. but (quoth he) there needs a Councill of the Ætolians for to enact a decree thereof, and there fore he requested the Consulto allow a surcease of arms only for ten daies. Then Flacous began to speak for the Ætolians, and at his request the said abstinence was granted, and so they returned to Hypua. When Phaneas had related in the privy Councill of those elect peers of that netion called Aposleri, as well the demands that were commanded, as what had like to have falm upon them elves in perion, the peers fighed deeply and groaned again, to fee their misrable condition; howbeit they were all of opinion, that the victor must of necessity be obeyed. and a generall Parliament affembled of the Etolian Burgeffes out of all their towns and Cities, When all that multitude wasgathered together, and heard the same related again, their hearts to fietted within them at the cruelty and indignity of those Lordly commands, that if they had been well fetled in peace, yet such a fit of anger had been enough to have put them into arms. And to fiir the tume and choler the more, the difficulty of effecting the things demanded, helped well: for how possibly could they compass to deliver Aminander, being ashe was an absolute King? But even then there was preferred unto them by chance a new hope, For Niounder at that very time, coming from King Antiochus, filled the peoples heads with this vain expectation. namely, that the King made wondrous provision for war, as well by sea as land. This Nicander having accomplished his Embassage, and made return again into Ætolia, within the compass of twelve daies, after he was embarked, arrived at Phalera in the gulph of Malea: from whence having brought the monies which he had, down to Lamia, whiles himself with certain nimble men and light appointed, travelled toward Hypara in the evening, between the Roman and E. tolian camp, through paths that he well knew; he chanced to flumble, ere he was aware, upon the corps de guard of the Macedonians, and was brought to the King before supper was done, the table taken up, and the King rifen. When Philip was advertised thereof, he shewed no other countenance, than if a friend or guest, and not an enemy was come; he bad him sit down at the board, and eat his meat. Afterwards he kept him there with him fill in the room, and voided all the reft, willing him in no case to be afraid. "He blamed greatly the bad courses and design-"ments of the Ætolians (which evermore lighted upon their own pates) who first had brought "the Romans and then Antiochus into Greece, But for my part (quoth he) fince things done and of past, may sooner be blamed than amended, I am content to forget and put all under my sou, "and will never be the man that will feem to infult over them in their diffress and adventy, 4 And fo should the Etolians likewise take up in time, and lay aside all their rancor and make " to me : and Nicander especially ought to remember this day, on which by me his life waspre-"ferved. With that he lent him away with a good convoy, until he was past all danger; and this Nicander, as is beforefaid, came to Hipata, even as the Etolians were in deep consultation about peace with the Romans.

M. Acibus having either fold outright, or given away to the fouldiers the booty of the country about Heraclea, and hearing that the Councill at Hypata nothing tended to peace, and that the Etolians were run together to Naupastum, for to abide in that place the whole violence of the war; M fent App. Claud us afore with 4000 fouldiers to feize the tops of the mountains, where as the paltages were difficult; and himself ascended up to the hill Oera, and sacrificed to Hercules in that very place which they call Pyra, by occasion that the mortall body of that god was there confimed with fire: from whence he departed with his whole army & performed the rest of his journey well and marched with ease. Being come to Corax (an exceeding high mountain between Callipolis and Naupattum) he lost there many of his labouring beasts and sumpter horses, which together ther with their loads and fardels, as they went, tumbled down headlong from the mountain, and his men also were much troubled and encumbred. Whereby it was soon seen, with how lazy and idle an enemy he had to deal, who had not befet and kept with a guard that difficult passage, to empeach and thut up the thorow-fare from the enemies. Howbeit, as much toiled and troubled N as his army was, he descended to Naupattum. And having erected one Fort against the Calle, he invested all the other parts of the City, and divided his forces according to the situation of the walls. This fiege he found as toiliome and painful, as that at Heraclea.

At the same time began the Acheans to lay siege to Messen also in Pelaponnessas, for statistic used to be of their Councill and association. For these two Cities, Messen and Elis, were exempt from the Achean Diet and accorded with the Æcolians. Howbeit, the Elians, after that Antiochus was chased out of Greece, gave the Embassadors of Achea a more mild answer, to wit, That when they had discharged and sent away the Kingsgartison, they would consider of themater what to do, But the Messen aving without any answer at all, sent the Embassadors away, had levied war; and searing much their own estate, seeing their territory overspread with an amay, o and every where burned, yea, and their enemies encamped near unto their City, addressed with an amay, o and every where burned, yea, and their enemies encamped near unto their City, addressed with an amay, o in the second of the s a obeyed his commandment, and having railed his fiege, marched himselflightly appointed for speed before therest of his army, and about Andania, a imall town between Megistopolis and Meffene, encountred Quinting. Unto whom after he had shewed the capies of the nege, he received at his hands a gentle rebuke only, for that he had enterprised a matter of to great consequence without his authority; with an express commandment also to case and discharge his army, and not to diflurb and trouble the peace, made for the good and benefit of all. The Messenians likewise he charged to call home their banished perions into their City, and to joyn with the Acharans in their generall Diet and Assembly. And if they either had any matters to refuse, or would willingly provide for themselves against the future time, he willed them to make their repair unto him at Corimband enjoyned Diophanes immediatly to fummon the Diet of the Achaans for him, where B personally himself would be. Where, after he had complained as touching the Island Zacrnthus. that by fraud and treachery they had come by and kept, he required that it should be restored to the Romans. Now this Isle had sometime appertained to Philip the King of the Macedonians, and he gave it unto Aminander, in confideration, that he might conduct his army into the higher partsof Atolia, through Athamania: in which expeditions and exploits of his, the Etolians hearts were so abated and quailed, that they were constrained to seek peace. Animander made first Philip the Megapolitan governour of this Island; but afterwards, in time of that war wherein he banded with Antiochus against the Romans, he called him away from thence to imploy him in martiall affairs, and fent Hierocles the Agrigentin to increed him in his place. This Hierocles, after the defeat and flight of Amiochus from Thermopyla, and the expulsion of Aminander out of Athamania by King Philip dispatched of his own motion certain messengers unto Diophanes, the Prator of the Achaans, and for a fum of money agreed upon between them, betraied the Island to the Acharans. The Romans thought it great reason, that this Island should be theirs, in recompence for the wars which they had maintained; for a smuch as M. Acilius the Consul, and the Roman legions fought not at Thermopyla for Diophanes not yet for the A haans, Diophanes to these challenges and demands sometime excused himself and the whole nation, otherwhiles stood to it, and avowed the action, and maintained the cause by a plea of right. Somethere were of the Achains there, that both protested, how from the beginning they utterly milliked the course, and also at this present much blamed the Prator for his wisfull obstinacy. And by their advice and authority an act was fet down, that the whole matter should be referred and put to Quintius, to n determin what he pleased. Now had Quintius this nature, if a mancrossed and thwarted him, he was fierce and fell; if one yielded and gave place he was gentle again, and pliable. And therefore, without shewing any fign of debate, either in language or countenance, thus he spake. "If I "thought (qd.he) and were perswaded in my heart, that it were good and commodious for the "Achazans to hold and possess this Island in question, I would advise the Senat & people of Rome "to let you enjoy it, But like as a Tortoife, so long as she keepeth her self close within her shell (I "fee) is ture and fafe enough, against all blows and offence what soever; but when she once pur-"teth forth any parts, look what soever is discovered and naked, the same is weak and subject to "injury: even to you Achaans, being enclosed round about with the sea, are able easily to adjoyn "unto your selves what soever lyeth within the practinet of Pelopoanesus, and to keep the same also "when you have laid it to you: but so soon as for a greedy desire of having more and encroaching " further, you go beyond those bonds, you lie open without, and are exposed to all hurt and da-"mage. Thus Zacynthus was delivered to the Romans with the affent of all the Councill there affembled, and Diophanes durst not say a word more to the contrary.

At the same time. King Philip asked the Consul as he marched to Naupactum, Whether it was his pleasure, that he in the mean while should recover and regain those Cities which were revolted from the affociation of the Romans? And having a grant and warrant from him, he led his torces against Demetrias, knowing well enough in what terms of troubles that City then stood. For being forlorn and in atter despair, seeing Amiochus had forsaken them and no hope at all remaining in the Ætolians: they looked every day and night either for the coming of Philip their heavy friend; or else even the Romans themselves a worse enemy, like as they had a more just cause of anger and indignation against them. A consused and disordered fort there were of King Antiochus his souldiers, who being but a few at first lest there to lie in garrison, grew after to be more, and most of them unarmed; such as after the field was lost [at Thermoppla] thither chanced to flie, and neither had strength nor heart enough to abide a fiege. And therefore when Philip fent certain messengers before unto them, to signifie, that there was some hope that they might be purdoned: they made them this answer, That the gates were open for the King, and that he might enter at his pleasure. At his first entrance, certain chief men of mark quit the City and departed, and Eurilochus killed himself. The garrison souldiers of Antiochus (for so they had capitulated) were conducted to Lysimachia through Macedony and Thrace, accompanied with a convoy of Macedonians, for fear that any man should do them harm. There were some sew ships also in the rode of Demetrias, under the command of Isidorus, which together with their leader and Captain were dismissed. After this, he regained Dolopia, Aperantia, and certsin Civies of

if it might have been won by assault, it was thought that the whole nation and name of the £10. H lians there would have perished for ever. And albeit he had good cause to be highly offended and displeased with the Ætolians, in remembrance that they only checked and impeached his glory, at what time as he fet Greece free: and that they were nothing stirred and moved with his authority, when he (forewarning them that thole things would happen which afterwards fell out just so indeed) would have discountelled and scared them from toolish and furious designs : per, supposing that it was a special part of his charge and work, that no nation of Greece now freed by him Mould utterly be subverted and destroyed, he began to walk up and down along under the walis, to the end that he might be feen, and foon known of the Ætolians. And anon the tery formost guards took notice of him, & noised it was presently throughout all the ranks and companies that Quintins was there. And thereupon they ran from all parts up to the walls, every man stretched forth his hards, and with one accord and consonant voice called by name unto Quinting, befeeching him to help and lave them. And albeit he was moved at these their pitions cries with commileration, yet for that time he fignified by the turning away of his head, thathe refused and denied them : asking withall, What lay in him to do them any good? But afterwards, being come unto the Conful, "Know you not (quoth he) O M. He let the Conful by these words a longing, and caused him togic more attentive ear what he would say, and withall, Why do you not speak forth (quoth the Conful) and utter your mind what the matter is? Then quoth Quintins: "See you not that after you "have vanquished Antischus, you spend and lose much time here in the sege and assault of two w Cities, when as now the year of your government is wellnear come about? But it is nothing so good and expedient for us, nor standeth it us so much "upon, to take down the Ætolians and pare their nails, as to look unto Philip that he waxnot "too great: and (feeing you and your fouldiers have not got yet two Cities in reward and re-"compence of victory) not to fuffer him to go clear away with so many nations of Grace, The Conful accorded hereunto: but he thought it a shame and dishonour for him to give over the fiege and effect nothing: but afterwards, all thematter was put unto the disposition of Quintime. Who went again to that fide of the wall, whereas a little before the Ætolians called and I cried aloud unto him. And when as they intreated him more earneftly and with greater affection to take pitty of the Ætolian people, he willed some of them to come forth unto him. And immediatly, Phancas himself with other principall persons of the Ætolians, went out unto him; unto whom lying proftrate and groveling at his feet: "Your prefent fortune (quoth he) and hard " estate wherein you are, caused me both to temper my choler and also to stay my tongue. Those things you now ice are fall out, which I foretold would come to pais. And not fomuch as this "is lest unto you, That the calamities fall upon your heads can be truly faid to have light upon "them that have not described as much. Howbeit, fince it hath been allotted unto me as it were "by deftiny to be a fofter father (as I may fo fay) to nurse up Greece, I will not cease eventodo co you good, as thanklels and ungratefull persons as you are. Send your Orators to the Conful, M to intreat him to grant you a truce for to long, until you may address your Embassadors to "Rome, by whom you shall wholly refer and submit your selves to the Senat: and I will not fail to be an intercessor and advocate to the Consul for you and likewise unto the Senat. And as Quintins counselled them so did they. Neither rejected the Consul their Embassie, but granted them abilinence of war for such a term as within which they might have an answer of their Embassage to Rome: so he dislodged, the siege was raised, and the army sent into Phocis. The Conful together with Quintim paffed over the sea to Agium, unto the generall Councill of Achas. There was much treaty and parly about the Eleans, and the restoring of the Lacedamonians exiles: but nothing was effected in the one or the other. As for the Lacedamonians, the Achans were desirous to reserve that for themselves, and to win thereby a thank, as proceeding from N their speciall grace. And the Eleans, chose rather to come and be united to the Achaans Paniament of themselves, than by the mediation of the Romans. The Embassadors of the Epirots came unto the Conful, who (it was well known) carried not themselves sound and upright in the entertaining of the Roman amity: howbeit, they had not levied a fouldier for Antiochiu. Charged they were to have relieved him with money; and deny themselves they could not but they had sent their Embassadors unto the King. And when they pur up a petition, that they might be accepted again into the ancient band of amity: this answer the Consulreturned unto them, That he knew not yet whether to range them in the number of enemies, or peaceable friends, and thereof the Senat should be judge; and therefore he referred their whole entire cause to Rosse, And to that purpose a truce he granted them of sourscore and ten daies. The Epirotsthus O fent to Rome, presented themselves besore the Senat, and when they stood rather upon these terms in recounting those things wherein they had not shewed any open hostility, than inclearing themselves of those matters that were laid against them; they received such an answer, as whereby they might be thought rather to have obtained pardon; than to have madegood and justified their cause. The Embassadors also of King Philip about that time had audience given them in the Senat, who came to congratulate with the Romans, testifying their own joy, and wishing theirs for their victory: and upon their request, that they might facrifice in the Capitoll, and offit an oblation and present of gold in the Temple of Jup. Opt. Max; the Senat gave the good leave, So they presented and officed 4 crown of gold weighing on a hundred pound. These Embassadors had not only a friendly answer and gracious dispatch: but also Demetrius the son of King Philip, who had lien as an holtage at Rome, was delivered unto them, for to bring home again unto his father. Thus was the war atchieved and brought to an end, which M. Acilius the Consul waged against King Antiochus in Greece.

The other Contul P. Cornelins Scipio, who e lot was to govern the Province of Gaul, before that he took his journey to that war which he was to make against the Boians, demanded of the Senat, that money should be assigned unto him, for to perform those plaies and games which the had promiled by vow, as Vice-Prætor in Spain, when he was driven to a great extremity in a battell. This feemed to be a firange and unreasonable demand. Whereupon the LL of the Senat ordained, That what plaies the Conful had vowed on his own head without asking the advice and counsell of the Senat, the same he should exhibit and set forth either with the issue of the spoils got from the enemies, (it haply he had referred any money railed thereout to that purpose) or elfe defray the charges out of his own purie. These plaies and games P. Cornelius represented for the space of ten daies. And near about the same time, the Temple of the great goddess dame Cybele (or Idea) was dedicated. This goddess being brought out of Asia, in the time that P. Cornelius Scipio (fornamed afterwards Africanus) and P. Licinius were Confuls, was conveyed from the lea-fide into the mount Palatine. The Temple was fet out to be built at a price (according to Canact of the Senat) by M. Livius and C. Claudius the Centors, when M. Cornelius and T. Sempion as were Consuls. Thirteen years after the bargain was made for the editying thereof, M. Junins Bruins dedicated it. and for the honour of this dedication were the first stage-plaies exhibited (as Valerius Antias mine author faith) called thereupon Megalefia. In like manner, C. Licinius Lucullus (one of the two Duumvirs) dedicated the Temple of the goddels Juventus in the great Race called Circus Maximus. The fame had M. Livius the Conful vowed fixteen years before. eventhat very day in which he defeated Afdruhal and his army. The same Livins in his Censorthip, went through and bargained for the building thereof, whiles M. Cornelius and T. Sempronim were Confuls. And in the honour of dedicating this Temple, the plaies were fet forth: and all was done with more devotion, because there was a new war intended against King Antroochas. In the beginning of this year in which these things passed, whiles P. Cornelius the Consul Haid Hill behind at Rome, (for M. Acilius was gone forth already to war :) it is found in records, that two tame oxen climbed up a ladder in the fireet Carina, to the tile-roof of a certain house there. And the foothiayers gave express order that they should be burnt quick, and the ashes to be thrown into Tyber. Allo it was reported, that at Tarracina and Amiternum, it rained stones fundry times. Item, That in Minturne the Temp e of Jupiter and the shops about the marketplace, were blafted and smitten with lightning; and in the very mouth of the river Vultureus, two ships caught fire from heaven, and were consumed. In regard of these searfull prodigies, the Decemvits by order from the Senat went to the books of Sibylla and perused them; and out of their learning pronounced, that a folemn fast should be now instituted in the honour of Cores, and the same to be observed and holden every fift year: also that a novendiall sacrifice for nine daies together could continue; and a supplication for one day: and that they who went in this -procession and supplication, should wear garlands and wreaths of slowers upon their heads: lastly, That the Conful P. Cornelius (hould facrifice to what gods. and with what beafts, the Decemvirs would appoint and pronounce. When the gods were pacified, as well by the accomplishment. of the vows accordingly, as by taking order for the expiation of those wondrous figns the Consult took his journey into his province: from whence he commanded Cneus Domitius the Pro-Prator (after he had caffed his army) to depart to Rome: and himself entred with his legions into the territory of the Boians;

Within a little of that time the Ligurians (by vertue of a facred law that they had) levied and affembled an army, and by night affailed the Camp unawares to Quintus Minutius the Pro-Conind. Minatius kept his fouldiers in order of battell untill day within his hold, having an eye and circumspect regard, that the enemy should not mount over the trench and defences in any place. And at the day break he fallied forth at two gates at once: neither were the Ligurians repulsed (as he hoped they should) at the first charge; for they sustained and held out the skirmish above two hours, with doubtfull event on both fides. At the last, when band after band issued out, and ttill fresh souldiers succeeded in the room of the wearied, for to maintain fight, the Ligurians in the end (befides other diffresses, lost for want of sleep also) turned their backs. Of the enemies were flain above four thousand; of Romans and allies under three hundred. Two months after or fomewhat less, P. Cornelisis the Conful gave battell to the Boians and won the day; flew 28000 enemies. (as Valerius Antias Writeth Itook 3400 priloners, gained 124 military enfigns, 1230 horses, chariots 247: and of the winners (as he saith) there died not above 1484. Where (by the way) how little credit foever (as touching the number) we give unto this Writer (for in that point there is none over-reacheth more than he) yet apparant it is, that a right great victory it was both for that the camp was won, and the Boians after that battell prefently yielded themlelies; as for that in regard of this victory a joyfull procession was by order from the Senat holden and greater beafts flain for facrifice.

Not much under or over this prefent time, M. Fulving Nobilior returned out of the father province of Spain in pomp of an Ovation, and carried in hew 1 0000 pound weight of filver in bol. lion; of Bigats in filver coin 130000, and in gold 126 li, weight. P. Cornelius the Conful having first taken hostages of the Boian nation, and disseized them of the one half of their country, to the Inhabiting whereof the people of Rome might if they would fend their Colonies; at his departure from thence toward Rome to an undoubted and affured triumph, licensed his amy with commandment to meet him there and give their attendance upon his triumph-day. The morrow after that he was come, the Senat had immons to affemble in the Temple of Bellona; where there he had discoursed of his acts and deeds atchieved, he required that he might be permitted to enter the City riding in triumph. P. Sempronius Blasus a Tribune of the Commons for the time being flepped forth and faid," That his advice was that Scipio should not flatly be denied the honour of "a triumph, but to put it offto a farther day. And why? The wars (qd.he) of the Ligurians have "alwaies been joyned and linked with those of Gaul: which nations being so near together the ever mutually one to succour another. If P. Scipio (after the Boians defeated in battel) had lol. "lowed the train of victory, and either himself in proper person with his brave conquering any "paffed into the territory of the Ligurians, or but fent part of his forces to Q. Minni in, who now " for three years (or fast upon) both been detained within those quarters in a war of doubtful ii. "fue; we might have feen an end ere this of the Ligurian war alfo. But now (forfooth) his fouldiers are dismissed, and brought home to accompany him & to solemnize his triumph; who might well have been employed Hill and done good tervice to the Common west: yea, & maydovet " (if the Senat be 10 disposed) by deferring the time of triumph, for to make amends and regain. "that which by over-hastiness of triumph hath been over-slipped. And therefore, in my opinion " (ad he) they should do well to command the Consulto go his waies back again, and take his "army with him into his Province, & to do his best and utmost endeavour to subdue the Liguis-"ans alfo, For unless they be brought under and made subject unto the people of Rome, the Boi-"ans be ye fure will not long be quiet: either we must have peace or war at once in both places, "And fo P. Cornelius in quality of Pro-Conful(as many others before him, who in their full Magi-(fracy triumphed not) may after some few months have his triumph. To this the Col. answered "again and faid, That neither the Province of the Ligurians was any part of his charge bylot rei-"ther warred he at all with the Ligurians, nor yet demanded to triumph overthem. As for Q. "Minutins (qd.he) I hope that shortly after he hath subdued them, he both will require his due] e triumph, and shall likewise obtain the same. For mine own part, I seek no more but to triumph "over the Boians in Gaul, whom I have vanguished in plain battell, beaten out of the field and " camp; whole whole nation within two daies after the fight and their general discomfing yiel-"ded and rendred themselves into my hands; and from whom I have carried away hostagestor " affured pledge of future peace: nay, that which is much more than all this. I have had the killing e of formany Gauls in open battel, and fought with formany thousands of Boians, as no General e-" ver did before me: the better half of 50000 men are fain upon the edge of the fword, and many "a thousand taken prisoners; so as the Boians have none left but old folk and young children. "Can any man make a wonder then, why a victorious army, leaving no enemy behind in the Pro-" vince, is come to Rome to honour the triumph of their Conful? Whose emploiment, if these M "nat be disposed to use in any other service or Province, Whether of these two waies think they "will make them more willing and ready to put themselves into new dangers, and enterinto-"ther fresh labour and travell; either to pay them without delay & content them with the duc & " deserved hire of their former peril and pain, or to send them away with bare hope only instead " of the substance, for to expect still without effect: since they have been once already put by and disappointed of their first hope and expectation? Now for mine own part, I obtained honour e enough that day on which the Senat sent me (deemed & declared the best man in all the City) " to receive that great goddels & dame of Ida. This title alone, without any other additionofith "umph, shall be sufficient to recommend to all posterity for honesty & honour both, the Image of " P. Scipio Nafica. This faid, not only the whole Senat themselves condescended generally to grant N him triumph, but also with their countenance & authority compelled the Tribunes of the Commons to give over their hold and furcease their interposition of a negative voice. So P. Cornelius the Coffriumphed over the Boians, In which triumph he caused to be carried for shew in French chariots, armor, enfigns, and spoils of all forts: also French vessels of brass and copper. He commanded likewise to be led in pomp a number of horses taken, together with Noblemen and Gentlemen captives. Of chains of gold he made a fhew of 1470. Befides, there was born in pomp, of gold 245 pound weight: of filver unwrought and wrought into plate, not unworkmanly after their manner (and namely in fundry French veffels) 2340 pound weight: lawly, of bigats in coin 234. To his fouldiers that followed his triumphant chariot he gave 225 Affes apiece, double as much to a Centurion, and trebble to an horseman. The next day after he called the people to a general as 0 fembly, whereafter he had discoursed again of his exploits, and complained of the wrongs that the Tribune had offred unto him in that he would have tied him to the war of another, with intento defraud himself of the fruit of his own victory, he cassed his souldiers and discharged them quite. After he heard that the Roman Conful and King Philip, were about the pass of Thermopyla, and there lay in guard; that the fleet rid at anchor in the port and harbor of Pyrasum; he thought it good to use expedition, and to make speed for all occasions whatsoever, and incontinently determined to fail forward to Peloponnesus. And having at one instant wasted Samos and Zacynthus as he went, because they chose rather to band with the Etolians, he fee fail for Malea and having a good wind, within few daies he arrived at Pyraeum, where the old fleet anchored. At Scyllaum King Eumenes met him with three ships: who had been a long time at Aging, unresolved in himself, whether he should return to defend his own Kingdom (for he heard that Antiochut made preparation at Ephefus for war, as well by Sea as Land) or not to depart a foot from the Romans, upon whole fortune depended his whole state. But his navy made fail to Cyffus, a port of the Erythraans, to attend the coming of the enemy these as in a place more commodious. The Romans, when the Northern winds Were once laid (for they were aloft for certain daies, and locked them in) failed from Delos to Pha-Maja haven Town of the Chians, bearing toward the Ægeansea. From thence they cast about with their ships to the City, and there having victualled themselves, they crossed over to Phocaa. En-

menes who was gone to Elaa toward his fleet, within few daies after, with four and twenty to H vered finips, and more uncovered, returned to the Romans; whom he found preparing and marshalling themselves (a little short of Phocea) for a battel at sea. Then set they all forward with hundred and fifty close covered ships, and more open and without hatches: and being with fide Northern winds, at the first driven to the sea shore, they were forced to fail single in rank one after another. But afterwards, as the violence of the wind began to be allaied, they affaied to crossorer to the haven Corycus, which is above Cyffus. Polyxenidas, as soon as he heard that the enemies were at hand, rejoyced that he had occasion presented unto him of a naval battel: and himself firetched forth the left point of his fleet embattelled far into the fea, willing the Captains of the ships to dilplay the right wing broad, toward the land: and so with an even front, headraned forward to the fight. Which the Roman Admiral feeing, firuck fail, took down the mafts, and laying together al thetackling of the ships in one place, attended their coming that followed after. By which time there were thirty in a rank afront, with which, because he would make them equal to the lest wing of the enemy, he set up the trinkets or small fails, meaning to make way into the deep, commanding them that followed fill, to make head, and direct their prows against the right wing neer the land, Eumenes was the rere-Admiral, and kept the rereward close together: but fo foon as they began to be troubled with taking down their tackling, he fet forward with all speed and half that he could make: and by this time were they in view one of the other. Two Carthaginian ships led before the Roman navy, which were encountred with three of the Kines thips. And confidering the ods of the number, two of the Kings came about one. And fifthey wiped away the oars on both fides, then they shewed themselves alost with their weapons, and k boorded her, and after they had either overturned or killed the defendants, they were mafters of that ship. The other that was in single fight, and assailed but by one, seeing the other ship taken by the enemies, fled back into the main fleet, before the was environed by the three enemies, Livius chafing hereat, and angry at the heart, advanced forward with the Admiral ship alront the enemy : against her, those other two which had enclosed the Carthaginian ship aforesaid, hoping to do the like by this came onward; which Living perceiving, commanded the rowers to let their oars hang in the water on both fides, for the more stay and steadiness of the ship, and likewikto cast their iron hooks fashioned like hands, for to grapple the enemies ships, as they approached and came neer unto them; and when they were come to close fight in manner of land-service, then to remember the valour of the Romans, and not to hold the Kings flaves for men of any worth, I And with much more facility and ease, than the two ships before conquered one, this one forthat gained two. By this time the main fleet on both fides encountred on all fides, and fought pellmell. Eumenes who being in the rereward, came last in place, after the conflict was begun, perceiving that Livius had disordered the left wing of the enemies, made head against the right, where he saw them fighting on even hand, not long after the left wing began to Hie. For Polyxenidas, so soon as he saw himself without all question overmatched in valour of the souldiers, caused the trinkets and all the cloth he had to be iet up, and purposed to flie amain. Those likewisethat were toward the land, and fought with Eumenes, within a while did no lefs. The Romans and Eumenes, so long as the mariners were able to plie their oars, and so long as they were inhope to annoy the tail of the enemies, followed the chase lustily enough: but after that they perceived M their own ships (charged and heavily loaden with viduals) follow after to no purpole, and to lag behind nor like to overtake them which were the swifter, because they were the lighter stand at length their pursuit, after they had taken 13 ships both with their souldiers and mariners, and funk ten. Of the Roman Armado there perished but one Carthaginian, which at the first encountr was beiet with two ships. Polyxenidas never gave over flight, but made way still until he had tecovered the haven of Ephefus. The Romans abode that day in the place from whence the Kings armadocame, purposing on the morrow to make fresh fail after the enemy. And in the mids of their course they met with those 35 Rhodian ships covered, conducted by Pifffrains their Admiral; and taking those also with them, they followed the enemy even as far as Ephefus, where in the mouth of the haven, they rid in order of battel: by which bravado, having wrung as it were from N the enemies a plain confession that they were vanquished, the Rhodians and Eumenes were sent home. The Romans letting their course for Chins, first failed by Phanicus, an haven Town of Ergthan, and having cast anchor that night, the next day they weighed, and arrived within the Island, close to the City it self, where having sojourned some few daies, especially to refresh their rowers, they passed forward to Phocea. Where leaving four quinquereme Galeaces, the fleet arrived at Cana and because the Winter approached, the ships were laid up in their docks on drie Land, and for their sasety were trenched and paled about. In the years end the General assembly for election of Magistrats was holden at Rome, wherein were created Confuls, L. Corneline Scipio, and C. Leliu. For now all men had an eye to the finishing of the war against Antiochus. The next morrow were the Pretors also chosen, namely, M. Tuccius, L. Aurunculeius, Cneus Pulvius, L. Emylius, P. Jr o nius, and C. Atinius Labeo.

The seven and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Hen L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lalius were Confuls, after order taken for the fervice of the Gods, there was no matter treated of in the Senate, before the fuir of the Ætolians. And as their Embassadors were instant and earnest, because the term of their truce was but fhort, fo T. Quintins, who then was returned out of Grece to Rome, seconded them. The Actolians, relying more upon the mercy of the Senate, than the inflice of their cause, and ballancing their old good turns done to the Romans, to the late harms and trespasses committed, used humble supplication. But so long as they were in presence before the Senators, they were wearied with their interrogatories of all hands, who fought rather to letch and wring from them confession of a fault, then any other answer; and when they were bidden to void out of the Senat-house, they cansed much debate within. For in the handling of their matter it was feen that anger bare more fway than pity, because they were not so much offended with them, for being enemies, as they blamed them for an unruly, uhramed, and unfocia-Eble nation. And after much hard hold for certain daies together, they refolved at length, neither to grant nor deny them peace. Two conditions were tendered and prefented unto them, either to refer themselves wholy to the pleasure and disposition of the Senate, or else to deliver a 1000 talents: and withal to hold those for friends or foes, whomsoever the Romans reputed theirs. And when they were defirous to draw from the Senators thus much as to know in what points, and how far forth, they should submit themselves to the discretion of the Senat; they could have no certain answer to build upon. And thus without any peace obtained, they were dismissed, with expreis commandment to void the City that very day, and to be gone out of Italy within 15 dayes following. Then they fell to confultation in the Senat about the government of the Confular provinces. Both Confuls defired to have the charge of Greece, And Lalius was a great man with the Senat, Now when the house was minded that the Confuls should either cast lots or agree between themselves for their Provinces, he rose up and said, That it was more decent and besitting to put thematter to the judgment of that honorable court than to the blind hazard of lots, To this Scipio for the present made answer, that he would consider better of it: and after he had conferred sectely with his brother apart who advised him to be bold and put it to the Senat) he gave Laling to understand, that he was content to do as he would have him. When this strange course and manner of proceeding (either new and unheard of before, or elle after fo long disease of the practise thereof forgotten and taken up again) caused the Senat to arm themselves against a great strife and cemention, then P. Soipio Africanus faid, That if they would ordain his brother L. Scipio to have the Province of Greece, he would accompany him in that voiage in quality of his Lieutenant, This one word of his (accepted of them all with a general confent) staied all debate : for a great mind they had to make a trial; whether Annibal being vanquished could aid King Antiochus more, than Africanus the Conqueror affift the Conful and the Roman legions. And all in a manner affigned Greece to Scipio, and Italy to Lalins. But the Pretors had their Provinces, fet out to them by lot; L. Auruneuleius obtained the civil jurifdiction of citizens, and L. Fulvius of forginers : L. Emplius Regillus was L. Admital of the armado, P. Innius governed Tuscany, M. Tuccius Apulia and the

Brutii, and L. Atinius Sicily. Moreover that Conful, who was to be employed in Greece, had all commission granted, besides that army which he should receive of M. Acilius (and those were two legions) to turnish himself with a supply of 3000 footmen, and 100 horsemen of Roman citizens; also of 5000 foot, and 200 horse of allies that were Latins: and before, granted it was in the same commission, that when he was arrived into his Province, he should pails over with his army into

Afia, it he thought it to expedient for the Common-weal.

Unto the other Conful was allowed an entire whole army of new fouldiers, confifting of two Roman legions, and fitteen thouland loot and fix hundred horse of the Latin allies. Q. Minning had direction (by reason that he wrote how he had performed in his Province all that there was to be done, and that the whole Nation of the Ligurians had yeelded subjection) to translate his forces out of Liguria into the Boians countrey, and to deliver the same to P, Cornelius the Pto-1 conful. Out of that territory which he had taken away from them after they were vanquished. those City legions were withdrawn, which had been levied and enrolled the year before; and committed they were to the charge of M. Tuccius the Pretor, befides 15000 foot, and 6000 horse of Latine allies: and all these forces were to be employed for to defend and keep in obedience. Apulia and the Brutians countrey, As for A. Cornelius the Pretor of the former year, (who with an army had the government of the Brutii) he was commanded to deliver unto M. Acilius (if the Conful thought logood) the legions transported overinto Etolia, if he would remain there fill : but if Acilius would rather return to Rome, then A. Cornelius with that army, was to remain in Etolia, Thought good it was, that C. Atimus Labes should receive of M. Ampling, the government of Sicily and his army : and if it pleased him, to take up and enrol out of that very w Province 2000 foot and 100 horse, for to supply and sulfill the broken companies. P. Janus Prutus had commandment to levy a new army for the government of Tufcany to wit, one Roman legion, and 1 0000 foot of Latine allies, and 400 horie. Also L. Emilius the Admiral, was to receive of M. Iunius the Pretor of the former year, twenty Gallies, and the mariners and oars thereto belonging; and befides, to levy himself 1000 mariners more, and 2000 footmen; and with those thips and souldiers to fail into Asia, and to receive the fleet of C. Liviur. As for them that were already in the government of both the Provinces of Spain and of Sardinia, they were to continue there fill for one year longer, and to have the same armies at command. This year were two tenths of corn levied of Sicily and Sardinia: and order was given for all the Sicilian comto be fent into Atoliato the army: but out of Sardinia, that one part should be brought to Rome, [and the other transported over into Atolia, even to the same place that the other of Sieily alore-

Before the Confuls fet forward into their Provinces, it was thought meet, that the Pontifies should give order for the expiation of certain prodigies: for at Rome the Temple of Inno Lucina' was imitten with lightning; fo as both the lantern, yea, and the leaved dores thereof, werefoully disfigured. Likewife at Puteoli, the Town walls in many places, and one gate, was blafed with lightning, and two men besides were strucken dead therewith. At Narsia it was for certain known that the day being fair and cleer, there arole a flormy tempet, wherein also two free men lost their lives. The Tuculans reported, that with them it rained earth. And the men of Reate brought word, that within their territory a semale mule foled. These prodigies (Isay) were er M piated : and the Latine festival holy-daies were celebrated anew, for that the dole of sless was not given unto the Laurentins, which of duty should have been delivered. Moreover, a solemnsupplication was ordained, in regard of all errours and faults escaped in divine service and religious observances. Also out of the books of S bylla, the Decemvirs declared and shewed, to what Gods, sacrifice should be made: and ten young springals free born, and ten Virgins likewise, whose fathers and Mothers yet lived, were employed about the ministery of those facrifices. The Decemvirs also by night factificed young fucklings. And P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, before he took his journey, erected an arch in the Capitol (over-against the high street that leadeth thither) with 7 gilded statues and 2 horses: and before that arch, he set up two cesterns or lavers of marble, About this time, 43 principal persons of Etolia, (among whom were Democritus and hisbrother) N were conveighed to Rome, by two Squadrons or cohorts sent of purpose from M. Acibus; and there were laid up fast in the prison called * Thestone quarries : which done, the cohousasorefaid were commanded by L. Cornelius the Conful, to make return to the army. From Proloment and Cleopatra (King and Queen of Agrpt) there came Embassadors, testifying their joy which they conceived in the behalf of the Romans, in these terms, That M. Acilius the Conful had chafed King Antiochus out of Greecesexhorting also the Romans to transport an army into Miss for that not in Afia only, but likewise in Spria, all men were smitten with fear and amazed. As so the KK, of Agypt they would be ready to do for their parts, what foever the Senat should set down. Thanks were returned to the K. and Q. aforesaid, and order wastaken, that to the Embassadors for a reward should be given 4000 brasen Asses apeece.

L. Cornelius the Conful, having accomplished all things to be done at Rome, published an Edickin a general affembly, That aswell those souldiers whom himself had enrolled for supply, as they who were with A. Cornelius in the Brutians country, should all meet at Brundusum upon the Ides of * Q cintelis. Moreover he nominated three Lieucenants, Sex. Digitius, L. Apuflius, and C. Fabricins Lufcinns, for to gather thips together out of all the Sea-coaffs into Brundusium. And when he had prepared and ict all things in good order, he departed from the City, cladinhis rich coat of arms. There presented unto the Conful as he went forth, to the number of 5000 volinitaries. Romans and allies, together, who had ferved their full years in the wars under the conduct of P. Africanne, and now were exempt from fouldiery, who all offered to go with him and to be enrolled as preft fouldiers, Much at the time that the Contul took his journey (during the feftival Apollinare games in the honous of Apollo, upon the fift day before the ides of Inly) it chanced, that in the day time when the air was cleer and fair, there arose a suddain darkness during the Eclipse of the sun, by reason that the body of the moon was directly under the Circle and rundle of the fun. L. Emyling Regillus also Admiral of the war, at the fame time went to Sea. L. Aurunculeius was charged by order from the Senat, to build 30 Galeaces with five banks of oars. and 20 Gallies with three banks, because a bruit was blown and Diazed abroad, that Antiochus B upon the late battail at Sea, was about to prepare a much greater armado.

The Expliane, after their Embassadors were returned from Rume and had made relation, that there was no hope of peace, albeit all their Sea-coalts (especially toward P. Loponnefus) were spoiled and wasted by the Acharans, yet minding more their peril like to ensue, than remembring their loss received, seized the mountain Corax, intending to impeach and stop the passage of the Romans. For they made no question nor doubt, but that the next spring they would return to befieze and affault Naupactum. Acilius, who wift well what they expected, thought it better to go in hand with an enterprise unlooked for, and namely, to affail Lamia: for thus he thought, That feeing they had been already brought to a great frait and extremity by King Philip; now they might be taken suddainly and surprised at unawares, because they stood in sear of nothing less, Whereupon, removing from Elatia, he encamped first in the country of his enemies neer to the River Sperchius: from whence by night he dislodged, and advanced forthwith his entigns, and by theday break had invested their walls round about. Great fear and hurly there was, as in an accident unlooked for : yet all that day they defended the City more resolutly, than a man would have believed and thought they could have done in so suddain a danger: whiles men sood at defence upon the walls, women fer up ladders in many places, and brought the men weapons and darts of all forts, yea, and it ones up to the walls unto them. Acilius, after he had founded the retreat, brought back his men into the camp about noon; and after they had there refreshed their bodies with meat and reit, he gave them warning (before he dismissed the Pratorium) that ere day-light the next morning they should be ready in arms: for that he would not come back again with D them into the camp, before they were mafters of the Town. At the fame time as the day before, he gave affault in many places: and for as much as the Townsmens strength decaied, their darts and weapons failed, and above all, their hearts fainted, within few hours he wan the City. After hehad made a riddance of the pillage, fold some part, and given a way the rest, he fell to take counsel what to do afterwards. There was not one man of opinion to go against Naupactum.considering that the Atolians held and kept the pass of Corax. Howbeit Acilius, to the end that he would not keep the field in summer without doing some exploit, and that the Ætolians might not enjoy that peace by the flacknes of the Roman fouldiers, which obtain they could not at the Senats hand, he purposed to besiege Amphissa: and so the army was conducted thither from Heracles, by the mountain Octa. When he had encamped himself under the Town walls, he began norto investir round with men as he did Lamia, but with ordnance and engins to batter in In many places at once he ran with the ram against the walls: and albeit they were shaken, the Townmen were not about either to make ready, or to device and invent any means of defence against that instrument or engin. All their hope was in trusty atmour and hardy valout. And so often they fallied torth, that they disordred and troubled not only the guards of the enemies, but allo those that attended about the fabricks and artillery. Howbeit, in many places the wall was battled and breachesmade: and even at that very instant news cameunto him, that his successor had landed his army at Apollonia, and was coming by the way of Epirus and The saly. Now came the Conful with a power of 1 3000 foot, and five hundred horie. And by this time was he pafed as far as to the vale and level of Malea: and having fent certain afore to fummon the City Hy-Fire, and received answer again, that they would do nothing but by a publick decree of the fitolians; because the siege of Hopera should not stay him, and Amphissa not yet won, he led his forces against it, and sent his brother Africanus before. Ere they came, the Oppidans had quit the Town, for by this time the wall in many places lay open and naked, and were all fled armed and marmed into a Castle which they had, impregnable. The Conful pitched his tents fix miles from the Town.

Thisher arrived the Athenian Embassadors, and first they repaired to P. Scipio, who, as we have said, was gone before the main army, and afterwards to the Conful, intreating for the Ætolians. Of the twainthey received a gentler answer at the hands of Africanus, who seeking some honest occasion to leave the Ætolian war, fee his heart and eye wholly upon Afia and King Antiochus: and to this purpose he willed the Athenians to perswade not only with the Romans but also with the Etolians, 10 prefer peace before war. And speedily, through the motion and perswasion of the Athenians there was a foleum embassage of the Ætolians dispatched from Hypata. Induced "they were the rather to hope for peace by the speech of Africanus (for to him they came first) "who discoursed unto them, bow that many Nations and Cities in Spain first, afterwards in "Africk, had put themselves under his protection, and in them all he had left greater testimonies "of his clemancy and bounty, than of his warlike valour and martial prowels. Thus they had brought the matter (as they thought) to a good pais, and made it fure: but when they camebe u forethe Conful, they had the same answer of him, with which they were sent away from the Senate, and commanded to avoid. The Etolians wounded therewith anew, feeing they could win nate, and to manufacture of the Athenian embaffage, nor the gracious answer of Africanut, faid, they would make report thereof unto their States and country-men. So, they rerurned from thence to Hipata, where they were to feek what to do, and could not refolve: for neither had they whereof to raise a thouland talents: and again, if they should absolutely put themich es into their hands, they feared to feel the fmart thereof in their bodies. Therefore they commanded the same Embassadors to go again to the Consul and to Africanus, and to exhibit a petition, that if they were minded indeed and verity to grant them peace, and not by vain flow and semblance only to frustrate and delude the hope of poor suppliants they would either rebate 1 them a quantity of that grand fum of money, or elle accept to of their absolute surrender, that no free citizen might be touched thereby in his person. But nothing could be gotten at the Conful hands, for to alter or relent any jot: thus was this embassage also sent away as it came, and nothing done. The Athenians came after them in place, the principal man of whole embaffage, Echedemus, leeing the Ætolians wearied with so many repulses, and lamentably to no purpose bewsil. ing the mi erable estate of their country; put them still in some new hope, and gave them counsel to trave true for fix moneths, that they might address their Embassadors to Rome, and receive an answer from thence: shewing unto them, that this delay could not augment their present clamity, which could not worfe be; but contrary-wife, time and space coming between might affoord many accidents whereby their present misery might be mitigated and allayed. So by theadrice w of Rehedemus, the same men were tent once again, who had communed before with P. Scipio and by his means obtained of the Conful a truce for that term; which was the thing they craved The fiege being raised before Amphissa, M. Acilius, after he had delivered up his army into the hands of the Conful, refigned his government, and departed out of the Province: and the Conful likewise from Amphissa returned into Thessaly, intending through Macedony and Thraciato conduct his army into Afia.

Then Africanus entred into speech with his brother, and said: " The journey which you enet terprile L. Scipio, I for my part approve and think well of, but all refleth in the will and ples " fure of Philip: who if he be fast and faithful to t'e state and Empire of Rome, he will grants "paffage, he will afford us victuals, he will furnish us with all things which in so long a voyage I "are necessary to the help and sustenance of our army: but if he fail and for sake us once, you "must make accompt of no safety and security throughout all Thracia: therefore I am of advice "that the Kings affection be first founded. And that will hest be done if the messenger who shall "be differented unto him, may come upon him on a fuddain, and take him unprovided and ha-"ving no time to put any prepented plot in practile. T. Sempronius Gracelius, a most nimble and active young Gentlemin, was at that time cho'en for the firtell per'on to perform this action: who taking fresh post Hories all the way as he rode, with incredible celerity made in hipsed,

The King was at a feast or banket when he came, and wine he had taken full liberally. And finding him thus disposed to solace and recreat his spirits, he had no reason to suspect that heway minded and inclined to any change or alteration: and so for that time this guest was bidden well come, and had good cheer made him. The morrow after he faw the provision of victuals in great flore ready for he armies, he beheld the Bridges made over the Rivers, and the high #175 mended and prepared, where passage was difficult. With these intelligences he returned to the Conful, with as great speed as he went, and met him at Thaumaci. From whence, theamyin much joy and with greater and more assured hope, entred into Macedon; where all was provided to their hands. The King at their coming received them right flately, and at their departure conducted them on the way as royally. Very willing, ready and courteous he shewed himself:

that from Amphiffa (for thence he had his dispatch) in three dayes space, he arrived at Pellas

which Africanus much liked and highly commended, being a man as in all other things fingulat, so in allowing of elegancy and humanity, if it were without superfluity and excess, nothing nice N and freight-laced. Thus they held on their journey unto Hell Sportus, paffing through Marche my and Thrace, and Philip still accompanied them, and provided all things for their neafore-

After the battail fought at Sea neer Corneum, Antiochus having had all the wirter time free without any empeachment to furnish himself with forces both for Land and Sea, above all things studied and devited how to repair his fleet, for fear he should be quite diffeized and dispossessed of the Sea. And evermore this ran in his mind, that he had an overthrow, and yet the Rhodians fleet was away. For thus he cast with himself, that if they also should be present at the next conflict (and wrely the Rhodians, thought he, will not for any thing be behind again) he then should have need of a mighty number of ships to match the enemies Armado as well ingreatnes as good. ness. And therefore he had both fent Annibal into Sir afor to take up the ships of the Phanicians, and also commanded Polyxenidas to repair those vessels which he had already, and tomake and rig others with so much more diligence as his fight afore was less fortunate, Himself passed the winter in Phrygia. and feeking for aid out of all places, he fent out as far as into Gallogracia. The people there at that time were great warriors; keeping fill the courages of Gauls, for that the race of that nation was not yet extinct and worn out. His fon Selencus he had left in Ealis with an army to keep the maritime Cities in obedience, which Eumenes from Pergamus of one fide. and the Romans from Phocas and Erithre on the other fide, follicited to rebellion. The Roman fleet, as I said before, wintered at Cana. Thither in the mids almost of winter came Eumenes with two thousand foot, and a hundred horse. Who having given out unto Livius, that great prizes might be raifed out of the enemies territory about Thyaira, had so perswaded and wrought with him, that he fent with him five thousand souldiers: who being set forth to this rode and expedition, in few dayes drove away a mighty booty. Amid these matters, there hapned a mutiny in Phocas, by occasion of some that would have withdrawn and turned away the hearts of the multitude unto King Antiochus. The wintering of the fleet was chargeable to that City. The imposition of a tribute was heavy, in regard that they were put to the finding of five hundred fide caflocks, and as many coats for liveries : the fcarcity of corn also was grievous unto them; for B which default the ships and the Roman garrison abandoned the place and departed : whereupon that faction which in all their speeches and assemblies drew the common people to side with Antiochus, was rid of all fear. The Senat and the principal citizens of Phocaa were of opinion to continue to the last, in the affociation of the Romans: but the perswaders and counsellers of a revolt were of more credit with the multitude.

The Rhodians were not so slow the summer past, but they were as forward now in the spring: for before mid-March, they fent out the same Paufistratus Admiral of a fleet of fix and thirty fail. Andby this time Livius loosed from Cana, and failed toward Hellespontus, with thirty ships, and feven Gallies of four banks of oars, which King Eumenes had brought with him, to the end that hemight prepare things necessary for the passage of the army, which he supposed would come by hemight prepare things to century to the pay or port which they call, The rode of the 'Acharans, from * Where they whence he went up to Ilium, where, after he had factificed to Minerva, he gave gracious audience lay fometimes to the embaliages of the neighbors bordering, which came from Eleus, Dardanus, and Rhoetium, against Troy. who committed their Cities unto his protection. From thence he directed his course to the threights of Hellesponeus, and leaving ten ships in the rode over-against Abydus, with the rest of the fleet, he passed over into Europe, to assault Sestos. As the armed souldiers approached their walls, thefrantick Priests of Cybele called Galli, bereft of their wits, presented themselves first unto them before their gates, in their folemn habit and vestments, saying, That they being the servants and ministers of Dame Crbele the mother of the Gods, were come by the instinct and commandment of that goddess to be seech the Roman General to spare the walls and the City. And not one of D them had any harm done unto them. Anon, the whole body of the Senat with the Magistrats came forth to yeeld the Town. From thence they crossed over to Abydus, where (after many parlies, in which they had founded their minds, and could have no answer tending to peace) they addressed themselves to lay siege to the City, and to assault it.

Whiles these things stood thus about Hellespont, Polyxenidas a Rhodian born, but banished his countrey, and a Captain for King Antiochus, hearing that a Rhodian fleet was gone to Sea, and that Pauliftratus their Admiral, had in open audience given outcertain proud and disdainful speeches against him, entred into a privat quarrel with him tossing and devising in his mind night and day nothing elfe, but how he might by some effectual and worthy deeds, check and confute those brave and glorious words of his. He dispatched therefore unto him as a messenger, a man well known unto him, with credence and instructions to give him to understand, that himself would (if he might) fland both Paufistratus and his country in good flead: and that Pausistratus (if it pleased him) had means to restore him again into his native country. When Pausstratus marvailed hereat, and was very inquisitive to know how this might be effected; and gave him his faithful promise (at his request) either to joyn with him in the action, or essert conceal all and keep counsel: then the messenger declared, that Polyxenidas would make over unto him the Kings navy either entire, or the greater part thereof: and in confideration and recompence of this so great demerit, he desired no more but that he might return into his country. The importance of this matter was so great, that he neither believed his words, nor yet neglected and depiled the fame. So he went to Panormus, a place in the Land of Samos, and there he abode to view and see the thing that was offred unto him. Courriers there ran between, and never would Pauffratus give credit to the party, until Polyxenidas wrote a letter with his own hand in the preface of his faid messenger, that he would perform what soever he had promised, yea, and sent the ame letters sealed with his own sign Manual. By this sure pledge or gage, Pausistratus made sull account that he had the traitor furely bound and obliged unto him. For thus he thought, that Palyamidas living as a subject under the King, would never hazard the danger of such pregnant matter to appear against himself, testified under his own hand-writing: so from that time forward themeans of this pretended and counterfeit treason was devised and agreed upon. Polyxenidas gavehim to understand, that he would of purpose lay aside and neglect preparation of all furniture, that he would neither have rowers nor other mariners in any number about his fleet: moreover, under a colour of calking and califerting he would lay up some ships on dry Land: others he would fend away into the havens neer at hand, and keep some few riding at anchor before Ethe far in the haven, and those (if he were forced to battail) he would set out to fight. The same regligence that Paulistratus heard say Polyxenidas would use in his sleet, the same himself presentwhewed in his own, For some of his ships he sent to Halicarnas us for victuals, and other to Samothe City, to the end that he might be in readiness when the traitor gave the signal of assault.

Polynenidas fillby falle femblance encreased the errors and vais imaginations of Panfifram: for forme thins indeed he drew aland and laid up dry and as if he meant to hale up more, he repaired and amended the docks. Oremen and mariners he fent not forth out of their winter harbors to go to Ephesus, but secretly assembled them to Magnesia. Now it forwared that a certain souldier ferving under King Antiochus, who was come to Samor about some private affairs of his own was apprehended therefor a toy, and brought to Panormus before the Admiral Paufifirains, Whole. ing demanded what they did at Ephelius; I know not whether for fear, or upon mall loyaly that he bare to his Prince and countrey, discovered all: namely, that the fleet rid in the haveninged. decked and trimmed in readiness: Item, that all the rowers and mariners were sent to signature Magnesia: Item, that tome vessels, and those very few, were drawn up to land, and the docks and harbors were shut up close: and lastly, that never at any time before, the navy was so carefully looked unto, nor Sea-affairs fo well managed. But the mind of Panfiftratus was fo possessed be fore, with foolish conceits and vain hopes, that he would not believe these informations and in telligences for true. Polyxenidas having fet all things forward and in good readiness, by night fet for the rowers and mariners from Magnesia: and having in great halt shot to Sea, and set after those vessels which lay at one side upon the land, after he had spent the whole day, not so muchin making provision, as trifling out the time on set purpose, because he would not have the fleet to be leen when it let forth, weighed anchor and loofed after the fun was gone down: and with 70 fail of covered ships, because he had a contrary wind, entred the Bay of Pygala before day, where resting all the livelong day for the same purpose as before, the next night he sailed to the next coafts of Samos. From whence he gave commandment to one Nicander an Archpirat, toletially for Palinurus, with five close covered ships, there to land; and from thence to march with his armed fouldiers over the fields the neerest way to Panermus, and to come upon the backofthe enemies: himself in the mean while divided his fleet into two parts, and made way to Panormus, there to keep the entry and mouth of the haven on both fides. Paufiftratus at first was troubled for a while at this unexpected occurrent : but afterwards, as one that was an old beaten fouldir, he quickly took heart again, and calling his wits together, supposed that he might more easily repulse the enemies by Land than by Sea; and led his souldiers in two Squadrons unto the promontories which bearing out into the Sea like two horns, to force the haven: from which two cores or heads he supposed that he might easily set back and put by the enemies with shooting dans from both fides, But Nicander who was fent by Land, impeached this defign of his, to that he was forced fuddainly to change his mind and alter that course, and therefore commanded all his men to go a shipboord and away. Hereupon exceeding fear there was both among the souldiers and also the mariners, as if they were to take their flight by Sea and not to fight, seeing themselves invironed at once both by Land and Sea. Paulifratus inppoing the only way to escape and fare themselves, was to make way through the mouth of the haven, and so to recover sea-room; after he had seen all his men embarked, commanded the rest to follow, and himself first plying and labouring hard with oars, sendded amain with his ship to the entrance of the haven. Now when the was once past the streight and come into the open Sea, Polyxenidas was there to welcome him with three Galeaces of five banks of oars, and to befet him. The poor ship was wounded with the iron pikes bearing out in the beak heads of the Galeaces, and to bouged and funk withal. They defendants upon the hatches were overwhelmed with shot of darts, and among the rest, Paulina two himself mansully fighting lost his life. The rest of the ships were boorded and taken some before the haven, others within: and some there were that by Nicander were seized as they laboured to loofe from the land, and to lanch forth. Five ships only of Rhodes, and two of Cons, escaped chet and fled, which made themselves way even among the thickest of their enemies, by the means of fearful burning flame of fire that they had with them. For they fet me two long perches or poles bearing forward at the prow, like two sprit-sails, inevery ship, carying iron pots and passasore them full of light fire. The Gallies of Erythrea, meeting the Rhodian thips not far from Samues they fled the which were coming to help them, turned their course backward into Hellesporter, unto the Romans. About the same time Sciences gained the City of Phocas by treason, enting in N at a gate which the warders let open of purpole for him. And for fear, Come and other Townsol that goaff revolted unto him.

Whiles these things thus passed in Eolis, and that Abydus had endured the siege for censindayes by the defence of the Kings garrifon that manned the walks: now that all were overtoled and wearied, the Magistrats of the City (by the permission of Philoras Captain of the garrison) anicked with Livius upon conditions to render the Town. The only point whereupon they flood, and which flayed the conclusion, was this, for that they could not agree whether the Kings souldiers should be sent away armed or disarmed. And whiles they debated hereabout, news came of the Rhodians defeat, and to the opportunity of gaining the Town flipt out of their hands, For Living fearing, left Polyxenidas puffed up with the fuccess of fo great an exploit, would surprize the flort of that rid at Cana, leaving presently the fiege before Abydas, and the garding of Hellefont, puttosca afresh those ships that lay dryar Cana. And Eumenes came to Elea: But Living went to Plusas with all his fleet, to which he had adjoyned two trireme gallies of Mitilena, But when he heard fay it was kept with a firong garrison of the Kings, & that Seleucus was encamped not far of alter he had pilled the fea-coaft and charged haftily his fhips with a good booty, & those were prizes of men especially, he stayed no longer there than until Eumener might overtake him with his ster, but directed his counterrieighteo's and a "The Rhodress' bon' the first liews of this their over-throw, feated much and with a languary for word: for before the loss of their sea-fouldiers and hips, they lost also the very flour and the origin for their youths for almuelt as many young Gentle-men of their robbility accompanied Passifity aims; and not only the surface of his authority, which was right great and for good delets a mong his contraction. But a tree wards considering how treacherously they were over-wrought, and maniely; by one of their own citizens, born among them, their melandioly turned into choler, and their forrow into anger. Whereupon they ient forth ten thips immediatly, and few dayes after other ten under the conduct of Endamer the Admiral over them all swho albeit he were not for other fears of arms and martial skill equal to Paufifirant, yet they supposed verily he would be a leader to much the more wary and circum-B (pect, ashe was the leis hardy and coungious. The Romans and King Entheres fifth fell with the lland Brith as, where they flayed one might, and the morrow after gained the point of Corrent, a promontory of the Telans, From whente when they purposed to erofs over to the neerest parts of Samos, not waiting for the fun-rising, by which the Pilots might observe the disposition of the weather, they hoised up tails against a very doubtful and dangerous tempest for the wind turned weating they market to full North; as they were in the mids of their course, whereby they began to benightly tossed among the surging billows of the rough and angry Sea. Polyschilds supposing that the enemies would take their course directly to Swmos, there to joyn with the Rhodian fleet, departed from Ephofac; and first anchored at Myonefus: from thence he failed to an Hand called Maeris, to the end that as the enemies fleet failed by he might take advantage to fet upon either some ships singled and severed from the body of the fleet or play upon the tail and reregard thereof. After that he perceived the Whole fleet to be dispersed by force of the tempest, he thought first to take that occasion to fall upon them : but the wind rising still more and more, and railing greater waves, because he saw he could not possibly come neer to boord them, he cut over othe lland Ethalia, minding the next day to affail the ships in the main Sea as they passed to Samos, Some small number of the Roman ships in the beginning of the night put into the haven of Samia, which they found void and empty: the rest of the fleet after they had been toffed and commented all the night long in the deep at length light upon the same harbor. Where being adveniled by the pealants of the country; that the enemies ships lay in the rode of Athalia, they fell to confult, whether prefently to bid battail and put it to the hazard, or expect the arrival of the Rhodian fleet. Deferring therefore that enterprise (for so upon advertisement they were agreed) they traversed to Corychi, from whence they came. Polyceinidae likewise, having staid at anchor in vain stumed to Ephoses; and then the Roman ships, while the Seas were thus cleer of enemies, failed over to Samos, Thither also arrived the Rhodian fleet few daies after : and that it might appear how long looked for it was, they all presently set fail for Ephofus, with purpose either to try an issue by a battel at Sea, or else if the enemy resuled the tryal, to express and wring from him a plain confession of cowardise: which was a material point and of great importance to move the minds of the other neighbour-cities. Being arrived to the very haven mouth, they embattailed' their ships and stood directly affront opposed unto it. And when they saw none make sail nor ser out against them, the one part thereof rode aflote at anchor still in the very haven mouth sithe other discharged the souldiers and set them a land. Upon whom (as they were driving a mighty booty which they had raised by foraging all the country over) andronicus a Macedonian, who lay ingertiion at Ephefus, fallied forth, even as they approached the walls of the City; and having ealed them of a great part of their prey aforelaid, he chased them to the Sea unto their ships. The morrow after, the Romans having beflowed an ambush about the mid-way between, marched in order of battail against the City, to see if peradventure they could train forth the Macedonian agin without the walls: but perceiving that no man durst come abroad for suspicion and fear of anawait; they returned to their ships again; and when they saw their enemies would not abide them neither at Sea nor on Land, in the end the fleet failed again to Samos from whence it came. There ethe Pretor made one two Gallies of Italian confederats, and as many Rhodians under the standard of Epicrates the Rhodian Admiral, to defend and keep the threights of Cephalenia, which Hibrifus the Lacedamonian together with the youth of the Cephalens, infested with his roving and robbing, in so much as there could no ships pass by Sea to and fro with victuals bet ween Italy. and that coast. At Pyraeam Epicrates met with L. Aemilius Regillus Coming to succeed in the Admirally: who hearing of the defeat of the Rhodians, and having himself but two Quinquereme Gilleices, brought Epicrates back with him into Afia with four thips. There accompanied them allothe open ships of the Athenians. And he passed over by the Sea * Ageum. Thither also arrived Tima fiorates the Rhodian in the dead of the night with two Quadrireme gallies from Samos, Who being brought unto Æmylins, declared how he was fent to quiet and defend that Sea-coast, which the Kings roving thips and men of war by their often excursions from Hellespantus and A-Goden, had made too hot for the Hulks and other ships of burden which used to passthat way. As Emplus failed from Chios to Samos, two Rhodian Quadrireme Gallies were lent by Livius to meethin and King Eumenes also with two Quinquereme galleaces presented himself unto him. Being all arrived at Samos , Emplius after he had received the navy of Livius, and facrificed orderly as the manner was, called a councel. At which C. Livius (for his opinion was asked first) spake and hid, "That no man giveth more found and faithful counfel than he, who periwadeth another man to that which himself would do in the same case. "Charged with heavy ballest of grayed and and no link; them in the yeary haven mouth dotto

"Chock it up. And to make this baragainst the bayen, it was a matter (fail he) of lekelishings,
"For that the mouth and guller of the haven, was in manner of a tiver-long, narrow; and full of of their and fhallows. By which mean I should have cut off the benefit of the Sea from the comp. and make him loke the use altogether othis navy. But no man share besides himself should well of this device. King Emmenes demanded, what they would do then after this hosting up and stoppage of the haven passage, by finking the ships? whether they would depart from thence with their own navy at liberty, to help their allies and terrifie and affright their enemies; or never the later fill, keep the haven (as it were) in fiege with the whole fleet? For if they departed who could make doubt but that the enemy would pluck up those dams and bars that there has drowned; yea, and with less ado and trouble, open the haven again, than it was stopped? and? they meant to tary there nevertheless, to what purpose then was the haven four up? But come ry-wife, they within Ephefus (quoth he) being in furery for any danger from their haven and ha ving a most rich and wealthy City of their own, furnished with all things out of Asia, would pair the fummer feason in rest and repose; whiles the Romans floring in the open wide Sea, exposed to the violence of waves and lying at the mercy of tempelts, should be driven to keep a continual guard, disturnished of all things, and rather tied up and debarred themselves, for being able to effect those things that were needful to be done, than in case to empeach and shut up their enemies. Then Endamenthe Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, opined for his part, and toake tothe question, (aying, That he rather disliked of that course, than knew himself a better, or could det. vise what was to be done. Epicrates the Rhodian was of mind, to leave Ephelus for thepresent, and to fend part of his ships into Lycia, for to affociate unto them Patarasthe capital City of that nation: shewing two things of great consequence, that hereby would accrue, For, both the Rhodians affured of peace, and secured from all danger of those quarters, that lie about their illand. might thereby attend wholly, and employ all their forces upon the regard of this only war again Antiochus: and also the Armado which was prepared in Lycia might be stopped and empeached for ever joining with Polyxenidas. This opinion imported, and prevailed most. Howbeltshough good it was and agreed upon, that Regillus should present himself before Enbefus, with the whole fleet, to firike a terror into the enemies. And C. Living was fent with four Rhodian quadrume Gallies, and two Smyrnean open ships into Lycia, with direction to take Rheder in the way, and with them there to communicate all his counsels. The Cities which he passed by, namely, Miletus, * Myndus, * Halicarnaffus, * Cuidus and Cous, performed willingly whatfoever was enjoined Caftello S.Pe and imposed upon them. Being arrived at Rhodes, he declared unto the Rhodians the effect of his commission, and withal required their advice. They all approved the defign, and when he had taken of them to the fleet that he had of his own, three quadrireme gallies more, he failed to * Patara. At the first he had a merry gale of wind, that set them fotward directly toward the City, and good hope they had with their fuddain terrour to do iomegood with the inhabitants: but afterwards, the wind being come about the Sea rose, and the surging waves beganto make it troublesome and dangerous; howbeit they laboured so with oars that they gat to the shore side, But neither was there about the City any fafe bay to ride in, neither were they able to keepthe M Sea with anchor without the haven mouth of the enemies City, the Sea was fo rough, and the night so neer. So passing along by the wall side of the City, they failed to the port of Phanicus, kis than two miles diffant from thence, which was a fafe rode for their ships from all danger of Sea, but high cliffs and rocks there were over their heads which commanded them, and tholette Townsmen quickly seized, with the assistance of the Kings souldiers whom they had ingamion, Against whom Livius sent out the aid-souldiers of the Isleans, and the nimblest and most agile young men of the Smyrneans, not with standing the landing places were very difficult and untoward. These sustained the fight at first, so long as they shot darts, and made petry excursions and profess rather of skirmishes, than a direct battel, as being but sew in number. But after that they ran our of the City in great numbers, and that the whole multitude was iffued forth, Living leared left not only those auxiliars should be environed and enclosed, but also the ships diffressed and endangered from the land: so he brought forth to fight, not the souldiers only, but all the subbleof the mariners also and the rowers, armed and furnished with whatfoever weapons they could find And even then also there was a doubtful and dangerous conflict, wherein besides certain souldiers L. Apuffins, died in the conflict of this suddain and tumplenary skirmish. Yet in the end, the Ly cians were discomfited, put to flight, and chased into their City. The Romans likewise retired to their ships, carrying away, with them no bloudless victory for their part, From thence they shaped > might fail directly into Italy. Emplies when he had intelligence, that the defignment intended in Lycia was given over, and that Livius was departed into Italy, being himselfalso returned to Samot for that he was by violence of tempest repulled from Ephefus, without effect of his enterprise) thought it was a shame and dishonour, that the adventure was given upon Parara in vain, and therefore determined in > their course to the gulf or narrow streight of Telmesfus (which of one fide toucheth Caria, and Ly cia on the other) laying afide all hope to affail Patara any more; and fo the Rhodians were dil-charged and fent home. Livius after he had coasted along Afia crossed over into Greece, to the end, that having communed and conferred with the Scipios (who then abode about The flat,) he

proper person to make a voyage thither with his whole fleet; and to affault the City with all the force he could possible. And having passed along Miletus, and all that coast of the affociats, they disbarked from the gulf or creek of Bargilla, and came a land neer Iassus. The City was held by a garrison of the Kings: and the Romans wasted by way of hostility, the territory about it. Then Emplies fent certain to parle with the chief citizens and the Magistrats, to found them how they were disposed, and also to sollicite them to revolt : but being answered again that it lay not in their own power to do as they would, he marched forward to give an affault to the City. Now there were certain Iashans, banished persons, in company with the Romans, who in great number belought and importuned the Rhodians, not to fuffer a City, so neer a neighbour and linked in bloud unto them, for to perish and come to ruin, especially having no way offended: alledging, B that the only cause of their banishment was their loyalty unto the Romans, and by the same violence of the Kings garrison souldiers, were they a so held in awe who remained in the City, by which themselves had been expelled. For all the Iassians in general were of one mind, most willing and defirous to avoid and shake off the servitude under the King. The Rhodians were moved incompassion with their prayers, and joining unto them King Eumenes also, partly by shewing the contanguinity and kindred between them, and partly by pitying and lamenting the diffrested flate of the City (befreged, as it were, already by the Kings garrison) they prevailed so much that they forbare to affail it. So they departed from thence, and because all other parts were peaceable; they failed along the coast of Asia, until they arrived at * Lotyma, a port or haven town even a - Mario gainst Rhodes. There in the Principia began first a secret whispering among the Colonels (which afterwards came to the ears of Empline himfelf) namely, That the navy was led away far enough off from Ephefus, where by right and of duty he was to war; to the end, that the enemy being left atliberty behind their backs, might attempt to do what he lift without controlment, against so many Cities and States of the Roman allies, neer unto him. Emplies was moved herewith, and calling unto him the Rhodians, demanded of them, Whether the whole armado might ride conveniently within the haven of Patara? And when they answered No, he took that occasion to pass no further, but to give over the voyage, and to brought back his thips to Samos.

Inthis same time Seleucus the son of Antiochus, after he had kept his army all winter time in Esta, employing it partly in succouring his associates, and partly in sacking and pilling those whom he could not draw into affociation, intended to invade the confines of King Eumenes his realm, n whileshe (together with the Romans) was busied far from bome, in assailing the maritime parts of Lycia. And first he approached Elaa in countenance of an enemy, with banner displaied; but afterwards, leaving to befiege the City, after spoil made in hostile manner of the territory, he ancourage, searing to beinge the City, and capital fittingth of all his Kingdom. Per- Pirgammarched forward to beliege and affault the head City and capital fitting to Gibbs mich his. Begame. gamur, Attalus at the beginning seemed rather to brave and provoke him unto fight with his strong guards that he had placed without the City, and excursions with his horsemen and light armour, thanto stand upon his guard and defence, and to receive the forces of his enemy: but at length, seeing by these light skirmishes that he was in no respect able to match Selenous, he retired himself within his walls, and so the City began to be besieged. And much about the same time, Antiochuralio being departed from Apamea, first lay encamped at Sardis, and afterwards, not far From the camp of Seleucus, neer to the head or source of the river * Caicus, with a mighty army composed of diverse and fundry nations. The greatest shew of terror in this army was a redou- Girmasti. bled Regiment of Gauls, to the number of four thouland, hired for wages, who in with some few other among them, he fent out to wast and destroy all parts of the territory about Pergamus. When news hereof came to Samos, Eumenes at the first, being called away by this war, (begun at home, even at his very dores) made hast with his fleet to Elas; where finding in readiness certain hossemen and sootmen both lightly appointed, by their sure convoy and safe conduct, he came to Presamur before the enemies had knowledge thereof, or enterprised anything. Where once again they began to make light skirmithes by way of excursions, for in truth Eumenes lay off, and was not willing to hazard the main chance upon a throw. Few dayes after, both the Roman and Filhodian fleet came from Samos and were arrived at Elaa for to aid the King Eumenes. When Anischus was advertised that they had landed their forces at Elas, and that so many armadoes weemet together in that one haven, and hearing withal about the same sime, that the Consul resalready with a power in Macedony making reparation of all things for his passage over Helloman he supposed now it was high time (before that he were pressed at once both by Land and Sea)totreat for peace, and therefore he seized a certain hill over against Elea, to fortify and encampin. Where, leaving his whole power of Infantry, he descended into the plain, under the very wills of Elea, with all his Cavalry, to the number of fix thousand Horse. And sending an herald to Emylius, he gave him to understand, that he was desirous to have a treaty of peace. Empliusent for Eumenes from Pergamus, and they both, together with the Rhodians, debated Suconnel what to do. The Rhodians refused not the offer. But Eumenes said it was neither honourable to parle of peace at that time, nor yet possible to conclude thereof, if they went about it. For being as we are (quoth he) pinned up within our walls and befieged, how can we receive hom another, conditions of peace, saving our credit and honour? and who will hold that for a fin and affured peace, which we shall contract without the presence of the Consul, without the amhority of the Senat, and without the grant of the people of Rome? For I demand of you, when

"It have made a peace, whether you will return presently into Italy or no? whether you will

"withdraw your fleet and army? or rather wait and expect to know the Conful his mind and H " advise, the Senats pleasure and ordinance, and the general affent of the people in that behalf it " remaineth then after that is done; that you fray till in Afra, and that your forces being brought 6. back again into their wintering harbors, (after they have done with warfare) fall to confume and eat out our allies, by charging them with provision of victuals: and afterwards, if it shall fo " please the higher powers, and those that are in authority so to ordain, we must begin that war are anew, which now we are able (if we flack not the time nor flop the forward course wherein we "are) before winter come, with the favor and power of the Gods, to finish and bring to a final " end. This advice took place; and answer was returned unto Antiochus, that there could be no treaty of peace before the Contul his coming. Antiochus having thus in vain sought for peace. when he had first forraged and wasted the territory of Elaa, and afterwards of Pergamus, left his t fon Selencus there, and went himself in perion to * Adramsteum, pilling and spoiling all the way as he journeyed, in all kind of hostility. Now this territory is a rich country, called, The champain plains of Thebe: much renouned by the Poet Homer in his poem; and in no one place befole of all Asia got the Kings souldiers a greater booty and more pillage. Thither arrived also to 4dramytteum both Emylins and Eumenes (having fet a compais by ica) for the defence of the faid City. During this time, they fent for a thousand foot, and a hundred horse out of Archan to come unto Elas : all which forces were commanded by Captain Diophanes. So foon as they were disbarked and landed, there were ready to receive them certain men fent from Arralus of purpofeto meet them, who by night conducted them to Pergamus, I hey were all old foundiers and wellerperienced in feats of war: and their leader Diophanes had been brought up and trained under Philonamenes, the greatest warrior in those dayes of all the Greeks, who took but two dayes forto rest his horse and men, and to take view of the enemies guards, namely, in what places and at what time they used customably either to come forward, or to retire. The Kings souldiers were approached almost to the very soot of the hill, where the City is situate. By means whereof the might forage behind at their will, and there was not one issued out of the City so much astolane a dart aloof against the corps de guard of the enemies. After they were once so neer driven tories. that they were fain to keep themselves close within the walls, the Kings souldiers without bon first to contemn, and afterwards to neglect them. Many of them had not their hories so much as fadled and bridled, and some sew were left in arms and in ordinance of battail: the rest were gone ande and spred over all parts of the champain: some went to play and took themselves to youthful sports and want on rior: others fell to feeding pampering their bellies, and making good cheer under covert shade, and many were laid along afleep. Diophanes beheld all the manner hereof aloft from an high turret of the City Pergamus, and presently gave commandment to his fouldiers to take arms and to be ready at the gate. Himself went to Attalus, and told him, that he purposed to affail the enemies corps de guard. Attalus (although he were very loth) gwelim leave; for he faw full well, that he was to fight with one hundred horse against three hundred: and one thousand foot against four thousand. Being out of the gate, he sat him down noths from the enemies corps de guird, waiting when some good opportunity and occasion would offer it felf. Both they within Pergamus of one fide, deemed this to be folly rather than hardines; and also the enemies on the other fide making towards them for a while, and perceiving themnoton flir, altered nothing of their usual negligence, and that which more was, made a mockety and scorn of their small number. Diophanes kept his men still a good time, as if he had brought then forth only for a shew; to see and to be seen: but after he perceived once the enemies to be dibanded out of their ranks and ranges, he commanded the footmen to make all the hast they could after, whiles himself leading the way first among his horsemen, ran with his whole troopspon the sour as hard as ever he could, and setting up a shout and cry aloud on all hands, as well with foot as horse charged suddainly upon the enemies guards, ere they were aware of them. Man and horse both were greatly scared: and the horses especially having broken their collers and halters wherewith they flood tied made foul work and much trouble among their own pany, some few of the horses kept their standing still unaffrighted, and even those they had much ado to sad 10 dle, to bridle, and to mount upon; with so great a terrour came the Achaens, and with much more than so small a number could be thought to make. And as for the sootmen in order arranged and well provided they fell upon those that were negligently dispersed abroad erethey looked for them, and in manner half offeep. Great execution and butchery was committed upon them all the fields over, and they fled amain. Diophanes, having followed the chase as they ran away in scattering wife, so far as he might well with safety of himself, returned to the guard and defeat of the City, having won great honor to the nation of the Achaens by this exploit for not on the men, but women also beheld this fervice, and looked on him from the walls of Pergamm. The next day after, the Kings Corps de guards were better-ordered and kept closer together.yes, and to tired half a mile farther from the City, where they encamped themselves. The Achaans likewife much about the same time advanced to the very same place. Many hours together they looked one upon another who would begin first, expecting every minute when the charge should be given. But after the sun was neer going down, and that it was time to return into the camp, they of the Kings part began to ruffle their enfigns and guidons together, and fet forward with their bands, ordred in manner of a march for the way, more like than marchalled fortoficht a battail. Diophanes fat still so long as they were within fight: but then he charged upon their rete

ward, with as great violence and fury, as the day before, and put them again into fogreat affright and trouble, that they gave them leave to wound them on their backs, and not one would flay to make head and refiff, but trembling for fear, and hardly keeping the order of a march, they were bearen into their camp. This boldness of the Acharans forced & element to dislodge and remove our of the territory of Pergamus.

Antiochus after he heard fay that the Romans and Eumenes were come to the defence of Advamyttenm, medled no more with the town it felf, but after he had laid the fields wafte, departed from thence, and forced Perana Colony of the Mitylenzaus. As for Cotton and Corplenus, Aphrodiffia and Priese, they were won at the first affault, and so he returned to Sardie by "Thyatira. Se- "Tire. leucus remaining still upon the sea-coasts, as he astrighted some so he defended others. The Ro-Bman fleet together with Eumenes and the Rhodians failed fift to Mitylena, and back again from thence, returned to Elea from whence the came. So they held on their courie to Phocas, andfell with an Island called Bacchine, fituar above the City of the Phoceans: and after they had pilled and rifled by way of hostility the Temples, which heretofore they had forborn, and taken away the Images (for the Illand was magnificently adorned and beautified there with) they cooffed over to the City it felf, which they affaplied in divers quarters, according as they had divided their forces into three parts: but feeing that it might not be won with bare scaling and strength of ams, without planting engins of battery and other fabricks; and besides, that three thousand armed men lent from Antiochus for desence, were entred into the City, presently they gave over the fiege and the fleet retired to the Islands, having done no other exploit, but only pilled the terri-Ctory about the City.

This done, it was thought good that Eumenes should have licence to depart into his own hingdom, that he might provide for the Conful and the army, all necessaries toward the passage over Hellesponsus: also that the Roman and Rhodian fleets should return to Sames, and there remain inguard, and have an eye unto Polyxenidas, left he removed from Epbefus and made fome attempt that way, So, the King returned to Elea, the Romans and Rhodians to Samon, where M. Fingliss the Prator his brother departed this life. The Rhodians, after his funerall obsequies performed, failed to Rhodes with thirteen thips of their own, one quinquerem galeace of Costs. and the other of Guidos, there to lie in rode, ready to make head against the fleet, which as the buit blazed, was affoat and coming out of Syria. Two daies before that Endamus looked from D Same with the Armado, thirteen thips fent from Rhodes under the conduct of Admirall Pamphilida to encounter the faid Syriack fleet, taking with them four other ships, which were for the guard of Caria, delivered from fiege Dedata, and other petry forts which the Kings fouldiers affailed. Then it was advited that Endamus should incontinently set forward on his voyage. And to that fleet which he had under his charge, he adjoyned allo four open ships. Being departed, he made fail in all hastethat he possibly could, and arrived at the port called Megiste: where he oversook those that were gone before; from whence they came in one band and train joyntly together unto Phofelis, and then they judged it the best way, in that place to attend the coming of the enemy. This Phafelis standeth upon the confines between Lycia and Pamphylia. It lieth far within the fea, & is the first land that sheweth it felf, to them that fail from Cilicia to Rhoder and from thence a man may ken and discover ships under fail afar off: for which cause especially, this was cholen for a fit and convenient place, wherein they might encounter the enemies fleet. Butly reason the air was unwhollome, and the season of the year unhealthful (for it was midiummay and the (mels and stinking savours such as they had not been acquainted with; many contagious difeafes and maladies which they forefaw not began to spred commonly abroad, and especally among the mariners : for fear of which, plague and mortality, they departed from thence, and passed beyond the gulph of Pamphylium: and being arrived in the river Eurymedon, they recived advertisement from the Aspendians, that the enemies were already before Sida. Those of the Kings fide had failed but flowly in regard of the adverte featon of the winds named * Eteffe, . Easterly which kept their fet and certain time like as those do which they call * Favonii, Now of the Rho. winds yearly times there were 32 quadrisone Gallies, and 4 other tricenes besides. The Kings sheet consisted of plowing about 37, and those of greater burden and bulk: among which were three mighty Galleaces of *7 banks dissummer for the space of the burden and the same of the space of the had. The next morning by break of day both these steers for forth of the haven, as if they would winds in the baselonghe that wery day, And after that the Rhodians had passed the cape, which from Sida han-foring or only many and the cape, which from Sida han-foring or only many and the cape, a gathors: into the less, the sprefearly were they discovered of the enemies, and the enemies like - Hepters. miledined by them. The left wing of the Kings fleet, flanked with the main fea, was commanded Heptoen. by Amidal, and Apolinius, one of his gallants and courtiers led the right: fo as now they had ranged diei, fipips broad in a frost trank. The Rhodinas advanced for ward ordred in length and cathe sheurbattell into files, In the varguard the Admiral ship of Endamus was formost; Carycling sheurbattell into files, In the varguard the Admiral ship of the middle ward Endamus seemed the transplated in the conduct of the middle ward Endamus seemed the conduct of the middle ward and the conduct of the middle ward the conduct of the he the enomies hattell spranged and ready for conflict, put forth into the open fea, commanding the the followed after aportice to keep their array, and to directly to affront the enemy: which athe first provided dome tramble; for he was not for far advanced into the deep, that all the ships could be fer in array cloug the land fide , and befides, himfelf making too much hafte, with five hip only, encounted danishal, for the seft followed not after him, because they were bidden to range afront. Now the rereward had no room left them toward the land: and thus whiles R they hastily were jumbled together, the fight by that time was begun in the right wing sgainst Annibal. But at one instant the Rhodians cast off all fear, as well in regard of the goodnes of their ships, as of their own experience and usuall practice in service at lea. For their ships with great quicknels and agility making fail into the main lea, made room for every one that came after along the land fide: and withall, if any one hapned to run upon a fhip of the enemies with her piked beak head, either it rent the prow, or wiped away the oars, or passing clear through, between the ranks and files turned again and charged upon the poop. But the thing which turnfied the enemy most was this, That a great galleace of the Kings which had seven banks of oats on a fide, was bouged and took a leak with one only knock, that it received by a Rhodian ship far less: whereupon the right wing of the enemy doubtless enclined to flie away. But Annibals prefied Endamus very much in the open fea, most of all with multitude of ships: for otherwise in all respects Eudamus had the odds and better hand of him by far: and certainly he had compasfed and enclosed Endamns round, but that a flag was put out of the Admirall, (by which figual the dispersed ships are wont to rally themselves together:) whereupon all those that had got the better of the enemy in the right wing, made hafte to joyn in one for to fuccour their fellows, Then Anniba! also and the ships about him, took their flight: but the Rhodians were not able to make way after them and to maintain the chase, by reason that the rowers many of them were fick, and therefore the sooner weary. Whereupon they cast anchor in the main sea, and staid to eat and take some relection for to strengthen their bodies. And in this while Eudamus espied and beheld the enemies how they haled and towed by ropes at the tail of the open ships (that went w only with oars) certain other which were lame, maimed, fore bruifed, and cracked : and might fee 20 others not much founder than they, to leave the rest and depart: wherenpon causing an Oru and filence to be made from an high turret in the fore-castle of the Admirall, Artie my hearts shith he) and see a pleasant fight yonder and a goodly spectacle. So they all arose at once and beheld how the enemies were afraid and what poor shift they made in haste to flie, and with one voice they all in a manner cried out to follow after and pursue them. Now Eudamus his own ship was shaken in many places and fore bruised; whereupon he commanded Pamphilidas and Charidian to make way after them, to far forth as they thought they might without danger. And for agood time they held them in chase: but seeing Annibal approaching near the shore, and fearing let the wind would lock them within the enemies coast they returned toward Eudamus and drew along with them the great galleace which they took, and which at the first encounter was pierced, and with much ado trained it to Phaselis. From thence they retired themselves to Rhodes, not so joyous for this victory, as blaming one another that they had not either funk or taken the wholefleet of the enemies, having so good means as they had to do it. Annil al daunted with this one infortunate battell, durit not even then pass along the river of Licia, but defired to joyn unto the old fleet of the Kings as soon as possibly he could. To impeach him for effecting that, the Rhodius set out Charielitus and twenty war thips with piked flems, toward Patara and the Port of Megife; and commanded Endamus to returnunto the Romans to Samos with seven of the talefffings in all the fleet whereof he had the command: to the end, that he might induce the Romans with his counsell and advice yea, and with all the countenance and authority that he had, forcethem to lay fiege unto Patara and to affault it. The Romans took great joy and contentment, first at the news and report of this victory, and afterwards at the return of the Rhodians. And it feemed if that one City flood not in their way to flay them, and that they were once rid of that care, they would without any let and empeachment, make all the fea coasts fore enough for any danger and danger from those quarters. But because Antiochus was departed from Sardis, the Romans held them back, and would not suffer them to abandon the guard and defence of Lolis and Ionia, for less left the Cities upon the fea-side might be surprised. And so they sent Pamphilidas with sour covered ships to the fleer that lay about Patara.

Antiochus gathered together not only the garrisons and aids of all the Cities that were about him, but also addressed his Embassadors with letters to Prusias the King of Bit hynia, whereinhe N gave out hard words of the Romans for their passage into Asia: namely," That their coming only was for this to demolish put down, and overthrow all kingdoms, and to set up the only Roman "Empire that none else might stand in the whole world. Thit Philip and Mabis already were sub-"dued and deposed and now himself was to make the third, against whom they were come Nei-"ther would they make an end there but go on ftill, like a continual! fire that burneth forward, " and take all afore them and ever as they vanquished one, proceed to another that is next. And "no doubt, they would make a bridge of him to passonward into Bithynia, now that Eumend "hath gently taken upon his neck the yoke of voluntary fervitude. Prufias was somewhat tonched with these letters, but when there came others written from Scipio the Conful, and his biother Africanus especially he was wholly averted from entertaining any such suspition. But the chief thing of all that most confirmed the mind of K. Prussas, was the com-Bing of Livins unto him in embassage from Rome he, who aforetime in quality of Prator, had been Admiral of the navy. Who shewed and declared unto him, how the hope of victory was much more assured to the Romans than to K. Antiochus; and withall how the Romans would be the fafter and furer friend of the twain, yea, and make more confcience of keeping amity, Antiochus being put befides all hope of the association with Prussus, departed to Ephesus from Sada, to visit and see the steet, which for certain months had been rigged and in readiness: and this he did the rather, because he saw that he could not hold our with the Roman army and the two Scipios the commanders thereof, than for that his sea-service in it self at any time before sped well; or could affure him now of great and certain frecels. Yet fome little dram he had of good hope for the present, in that his intelligence was, that a great part of the Rhodian sleet was about C Panysand King Eumenes also with all his own ships departed into Hellessontus, to meet with the Conful. Besides this; in some measure his spirit was pussed up with the remembrance, how the Rhodian Armado had been defeated at Samos by a cautelous plot and practice contrived beforehand Having laid there conceits for a ground, he fent Polyxenidas away with his navy to hazard the fortune of a battel in some fort or other (it made no matter how :) whiles himself in person led his whole army to Notium (a town of the Colophonians, feated upon the fea, and diffant aboutwo miles from the ancient City Colophon.) The City it felf he had a good mind to conquer andbring in subjection unto him : for, being so near unto Ephefus as it was, there could not any thing bedone either by sea or land, but it was within the eye of the Colophonians, and by their means notified freights values to the Romans. Now he made full account that they would remove D their fleet from Samor to fuccour that affociar City of theirs, and fo Polyxendas might thereby take his time and spood opportunity to execute some notable exploit. Whereupon he went in handto plant fabricks against Colophon, and having raised his rampiers, and cast trenches on both fidesalike, even to the very fea, he approached with mantiets and terraces, as well the one part as theother, close unto the wals, and under the * roof-works plaid upon them with the push & force * restudition. of the ram. The Colophonians much troubled and affrighted with these dangers and diffresses, fent their Ofators to Samos unto L. Emylius, to crave in humble manner the aid and fuccour of the Prator and people of Rome, Emplins was much discontented and offended in his heart, that hehad made to long abode at Samos and performed no fervice. Nothing less thought be than that Polywenidus, whom twice a lready in vain he had challenged and sidden battell, would now offer E to fight, He reputed it also for a disgrace and shamefull indignity unto him, that Eumenes his fleet affifted the Consul to wast over the legions into Asia, and himself was affigued and enjoyined to faccour and aid the City of Colophon befreged, the iffue whereof would be so doubtfull and uncerains. in the deep sea afar off, they made all the fail they could, and fled. Yare of steerage they were and H good of fail, by reason that their vessels were more light, and made of purpose to rid way, and be fides nearer they were to land, And therefore they had recovered Myone fue, before the fleet could come any thing near unto them. The Prætor thinking verily to force them out of the haven, made after without direction of a skilfull pilot, and knowledge of the place, Now this Myonefulka promontory or cape between Teios and Samos, a very mountain made in fashion of a steeple broad enough at the foot, but rising narrower still, and runners up to the top sharp pointed. On the main or land fide it hath one passage by a straight and narrow path. From the sea it is founded upon rocks, beaten and eaten with the continual furging waves of the fea, infomuch, as in fomenlaces the cliffs that hang over, bear more into the feathan the veffels that lie under the harbot, take up of the fea. The Præt or with his ships durst not approach near unto those crags, for fear of be-r ing within the fhot of the pirats, who were perched upon the top of those fleep rocks, and so they spent that day and lay off. At the last, a little before night they gave over that vain enterprise with ont effect, and the morrow after arrived at Teios; and having lodged their ships within the hubor, which themselves call Geraisticus, (and it lieth out at the back fide of the City) the Pratotset ashore, and sent out his souldiers to sorrage the territory about the City. The Teians seeing how their lands were spoiled even under their very noses, addressed certain Orators to the Roman Admiral arraied alt in white, after the manner of humble suppliants. And as they would have seemed to excuse their City, for having done or said any thing against the Romans tending to hossility; he both charged them directly that they had relieved the fleet of the enemies with victuals, and also told them what quantity of wine moreover they had promised to Polyxenidas, But and if they w could be content to do the like by the Roman fleet, he would recall his fouldiers from pillage, otherwise he would repute them for his enemies. The Embaffadors aforefaid made relation of this heavy answer. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City assembled the people together, forth consult and conclude about this matter what they were best to do. Thither as it hapned, was Polyxenidas arrived with the Kings Armado; who having loofed from Crlophon, when he head that the Romans were departed from Samos, that they had chaired the Pirats as far as Myoneline and were now wasting and harrying the lands of the Teians, also that their ships anchored in the rode Geraificus, himself also cast anchor overagainst Myonesus, hard by an Island which thesis lers and mariners call Macris, in a secret bay hard by, escouting and espying from this near hisbor, what the enemies did and intended. And at the first in good hope he was to discomstand. deseat the Roman fleet, like as he had beforetime the Rhodian Armado near unto Samos, by sizing the mouth of the haven, and empeaching their issue forth. For this bay was in all respects like unto the other, lying just between two Capes, which meet so near, and in manner enclose the mouth thereof, that hardly two ships at once can go forth together. And to this purpose Palyarnidas intended in the night season to take possession, and makehimself sure of the said strights, there to place ten gallies under either Cape, which standing there at a vantage, should from both points flank the broad fides of his enemies ships in their going forth; and withall out of his other vessels to disbark and land armed souldiers, like as he had done at Panormus, and so at once to affail them both by sea and land, and make an end of them for all. Which designment of his no doubt had taken effect, but that the Romans, after that the Teians had promifed them to do M whatfoever they should command thought it more commodious for the receiving of their provifion of victuals, to pass with their ships unto the other harbor which was before the City, to the open sea. Some say that Eudamus the Rhodian, shewed the inconvenience and discommodity of the other harbor, by occasion that two gallies fortuned in that Braight to be so intaged, that they brake one anothers oars with justling together. And among other motives the Prator was induced to change the harbor, because from the land side there he should lye within danger, confidering that Anniochus himfelf was encamped not far off. Thus the fleet being brought about close to the City fide, the fouldiers and mariners (without the knowledge of any commanders) were disbarked for to dispose & dispense the victuals and wine especially to every ship. But about noon-tide a certain pealant of the country chanced to be brought before the Prator, whogave N intelligence, That there was a fleet of ships which two daies already rode at anchor under the Island Macris; and that but a while ago, certain vessels of them were seen to weigh anchor, as they would hoise up sail and be gone. The Prætor moved at this sudden occurrent, commanded the trumpets to found the alarm, and to give knowledge and warning, that in case any were strage ling abroad in the fields, they should retire. The Colonels he sent into the City to gather the souldiers together and the mariners, that they might repair to thip-boord. This alarm cauled asgrea a trouble and confusion, as usually is seen in a sudden scarefire, or when a City is surprised by the enemies. Here was founding into the City to recall their fellows; there was running our of the Ci ty to recover their ships; not knowing who commanded, by reason of the dissonant noise of men and found of trumpet: howbeit, as hap was, at length they can all toward the ships, but in such 20 hurly-burly and dilorder that they scarcely knew their own vessels; or if they did, they could bad ly for the croud and preis, get thither and embark themselves. Neither had this affright passed clear without danger both by sea and land, burthat Empline gave direction to every one what todo, and put out of the haven first himself with the Admiral ship into the open fea, & there received every vessell as they followed one after another in their order, & ranged them all aftrom and if Endamus also with the Rhodian fleet had not staid at the shore to see good order, that the fouldiers might be fet aboord without hurrying in fearfull hafte, and every thip go forth as it was fitted and made ready. By this means both the formolf of the wanguard were assanged in the fight of the Prator, and the Rhodians also kept their order in the receguard in such sort, as they put themselves into the open sea in as good array, as if they had seen the Kings seet under fail, But they were between the two promontories, Monefus and Coryous, before they descried the enemy, The Kings Armado came forward in long files, two and two in a rank, who displaied and spread themselves also affront towards the wing in such wise, that they might be able to compais and enclose the right wing of the enemy. Which Endamss the rere admirall perceiving, and seeing withall that the Romans could not possibly make head alike and extend themselves as broad as the enemy, and were at the point already at the right wing to be environed, made hafte with his own B vesses (for the Rhodian barks were of all other in the whole steet swittest by sar) and after he had fronted equally and matched wing for wing, he made head with his own thip against the very admirall of the enemies, wherein Polyxenidas himself was abound. By this time the battell began betweenboth the main fleets, all at once from every part. Of the Romans fide there fought fourstore in all, whereof two and twenty were Rhodians. The enemies armado consisted of fourscore and nine, all ships of greatest bulk and making, and had among them three galeaces of fix banks of oars on a fide, and two offeven. For goodness and strength of ships, as also for valour of fooldiers, the Romans far (urpaffed the Rhodians. But for agility and nimbleness of their vessels, forskilfull knowledge of Pilots, and expett cunning and readiness of mariners, the Rhodians were as much beyond them. And those above all the rest that carried fire before them in their noses Croubled and scared the enemies most; and that stratagem and device which had been their only help and means of lafery, when they were surprised and befet at Panormus, was now the thing that flood them in best slead to win the victory. For the Kings ships searing the fire that threatned their very faces, turned a fide, because they would not run a front with their prows: so as, they neither could themselves smite and hurt the enemies with their brazen pikes in the beak head, noryet avoid them, but expose their own broad sides open to receive all pushes and violence from them. If any one fortuned to encounter and run upon them the was fure to be paid and fped with fire that was flung and cast into her: and more running there was to quench the same, than otherwife to fight. Howbeit, the resolute valour of the Roman souldiers (which ever in war prevailethmost) was it that did the deed. For after the Romans by mere force had broken and clo-D von the main battaillon of the enemy in the very midft, they turned about again and presented themselves behind, and plaid upon the backs of the Kings ships whiles they sought asront and made head against the Rhodians: and thus at one instant the battaillon in the midst, and the thips in the left wing that ferved King Antiochus, were befer round about, and funk to the bottom of the fea. The right wing as yet entire and found, was more terrified at the lois and overthrow of their fellows, than for any proper danger of their own. Howbeit, after they faw the other invefied, and the Admirall her felf with Polyxenidas in her, to abandon her companions and to hoife up fails, they likewife in hafte fee up all their cloth and fmall trinquet fails (for a good forewind they had for Ephefus) and fled as fast away as they could. Two and forty ships they lost in this fight: of which thirteen were boorded and taken for the use of the Romans, the rest were either g Consumed with fire, or devoured of the sea. Two Roman ships were shattered and broken in pieces, and some other hurr, bruised and cracked. One Rhodian chanced to be taken by a notable and memorable adventure. For having with her piked beak head firicken a Sidonian ship, with the violence of the blow the shook out her own anchor, which by one of the flouks took fast hold as if it had been a grapling hook by the prow of the other ship. The Rhodians much troubled herewith, gave over rowing streight, as willing and desirous to be loose and parted from the enemy: and whiles they were butte thereabout, the cable which the anchor drew with it caught among the oars of her own ship, and swept them clean away, and so lest one side of it naked, whereby the ship being much weakned and enseebled, was taken by the other that was smitten and tied fast unto her, Much after this manner was the battel fought at sea near Myonesus. Whereupon Antiochus was fore affrighted: for being thus dispossessed of the ica, he distrusted himself that he thould not be able to hold and defend the places farther off: and therefore commanded the gariion to retire from Lylimachia, for fear it should be surptifed there by the Romans. But this was but a bad piece of councell as the sequell and iffue proved afterwards. For it had been an easematter not only to defend Lysimachia against the first assault of the Romans, but also to hold out the firege all winter: yea, and by drawing out the time on length, to bring the very affailants themselves lying in leagues, to extream necessity and want of all things: during which space they might have taken some occasion and opportunity, to find a mean and make way for peace. Neithe did he only quit Lyfimachia and leave it for the enemies after this unfortunate battell, but allo middhis fiege before Colophon and dislodged, yea, and retired himself to Sardis: from whence he fert into Cappadocia to Ariarates for aid, and to all other places where he could, to gather more forces: and now was he fet upon no design else, but to give battell, and to hazard all upon the

After this Navall victory, Regillus & mylius failed directly to Ephefus, where he embattelled his hips in array even before abe haven, and when by this bravado he had at last wrong again. from the enemies a plain and evident confession that they had abandoned the sea unto him, he fat fail for Ghim, unto which he had intended to shape his course from Samos before the late battellupon the fea, There he repaired and calked his ships which were shaken and cracked in R the forfaid fight : which done, he fent L. Emyliu Scaurus with thirty fail toward Hellespontuto transport the army. And when he had rewarded the Rhodian ships with part of the pillage, and honoured them with the navall spoils, he gave them the renvoy, and sent them home. But the Rhodians luftily out-failed Scaurus; and prevented his ships to set over the forces of the Conful: and after they had performed that service also, then they returned to Rhodes.

The Roman Armadosailed from Chio; to Phocaa. This City is seated far within the gulph of the fea, builded fo, as that it lieth out in length. The wall containeth in compais the ipaceoftwo miles and an halt: and from both fides it groweth narrow fill, and meeteth in the midfl, rekm-*In Malonry. bling the form of a wedg or *coin, which the Inhabitants themselves call Lampter, in which place the City is a mile broad and a quarter with the vantage, From which canton or corner then is a bank of firm land running a mile on end into the fea like a tongue, which divideth the haven just in the midst, marked out (as it were) just by a certain line. Where it joyneth to the narrow ftraights it hath two most fure harbors of both fides, and those lying two contrary waies. The which looketh toward the South, is called according as it is indeed, Nouftachmos [namely,a ship-rode, or harbour for it is able to receive a great number of ships: the other haven is next unto the very Lampter aforesaid. When the Roman fleet was once possessed of both these most fure and fafe harbours, the Prætor thought good before he fet in hand either to scale the walls, or to raise any fabricks and plant engins against the City, to lend certain of purpose to sound the minds and affections of the principall Citizens and the Magistrates within, But after he perceived they were obstinatly bent, and would not come on, he began to lay battery against it in two sere- R rall quarters. The one part was not much peopled, and had but few dwelling houses in it; and the Temples of their gods took up a good space thereof; and there began he first to approach with the ram, and therewith to batter the walls, and shake the turrets: and by that time that the multitude ran thither in great numbers, and presented themselves ready to desend, the ram was pulling also at the other part: So as now the walls were laid along in both places: and upon the fall thereof whiles some of the Roman souldiers presently gave the assault at the very breach, mounting and marching upon the ruines of the stones that were faln: others also assaid to gain the top of the upright walls with scaling ladders. But the townsmen with sood them so stiffy and with such resolution, that it was well seen they reposed more hope of desence in arms and valout. than in the strength of their wals. Whereupon the Prator seeing in what danger his soulders L flood, and fearing to expose and sacrifice them ere they were aware to the fury of these peoples enraged like desperate and madpersons, commanded to found the retreat. And notwithstanding the affault ceased and was given over, yet betook not the town men themselves to rest and repost, but ran from all parts every one, to raise countermures, fill up the breaches, and repairthernus where the wall was down. As they were wholly employed about this business, Q. Antonius lent from the Prætor, cametoward them: who, after he had reproved and rebuked their wilfull obflinacy, and made remonstrance unto them, that the Romans had more care and regardshanthey themselves of the City, that by continual affaults and batteries it should not utterly bedeltioyed: and how if they would be reclaimed and forgo their outragious tolly, he would make them this offer, That they should yield under the same conditions and in those very terms, as alone M time they had submitted to C. Livius when they came under his protection: At the hearing of that, they demanded and had five daies space to consider of the matter: during which time they made means to receive some aid from Antiochus; but after their Embassadors whom they dispatched to the King, had made relation, That there was no succour to be expected from him; then they lit open their gates, having articled and capitulated beforehand, that no outrage by way of hollilly should be exercised and committed upon them. As the Romans entred into the City with bannets displaied the Prætor declared with a loud voice, That his will and pleasure was they should be fpared, for a fmuch as they had yielded. Whereat the fouldiers on all hands fet up a great cry. That it was an intollerable shame that the Phocæans / who were never true and loyal confederates, but alwaies dogged and malicious enemies) should go away so scotfree, and not setter for their fins, At which word (as if the Prætor had given them a figurall of ranfacking) they ran into all parts of the City to rifle and spoil. Emplius at first staid them what he could. and reclaimed them 2again, saying, That it was not the manner to lack Cities rendred by composition, but such as were forced and won by affault; and even those also were at the disposition of the Generalland notos the fouldiers. But feeing that they in their angry mood of revenge, and covetous define of goods, were of more power than the respective reverence of his person, his quality and commandment; he sent out beadles and trumpetters throughout the City, charging all persons offree condition whatfoever, to repair before him into the market place, to the end, that no villany and outrige might bedone upon their bodies. And so the Prztor did his best to perform his word and promise in whatsoever lay in his power: for he restored unto them their City, their lands, and their own laws. And for that the winter approached, he made choice of the two harbours of Phicesto bestow his ships there for the winter time.

Near about that time, the Conful having passed beyond the borders of the Adrians and Maronits, received news, that the Kings navy was defeated at Myonefus, and Lyfimachia disfimilied of the garrison and this latter tidings was more acceptable and pleasing unro him, than the other of the navall victory; and especially, when they came thither: where in very truth the City (plenteoully)

A (plentoully stored with all forts of victuals, as if they had been provided of purpose against the coming of the army) received them curreoully; whereas they made no other account, but to endure extremity of want and painfull travell in befieging thereof. There they abode some few daies as it were in camp, untill such time as their carriages and sickly persons of their train might reach unto them; such as they had left behind in all the torts and cattles of Thrace, wearied with long journey and enfeebled with divers infirmities. When all were come and well refreshed and recovered, they put themselves again in their journey, and marching through Chersonessus, they came to Hellespoor: where, finding all things in readiness for their transporting (fuch was the industrious care and diligence of King Eumenes) they passed over without trouble and molestation into the peaceable coalts of their allies and friends, without empeachment of any perion, notwithstanding B some ships arrived in one place, and some in another. And this was the thing that much contented the Romans and mightily encouraged them to see they had so free passage into Asia, which they made full reckoning would have been a matter of great difficulty and trouble. After this, they encamped and made their abode a certain time near Hellespont, by occasion of those daies which hapned then to be, wherein the Salis used to dance with their fourthions called Anothia; during which time they made cruple of conscience to take any journey untill those Ancilia were beflowed again in the Tempie of Mars. By reason of which daies, P. Scipio also withdrew himfelf anatt from the army upon a more strick regard of conscience & religion, which touched him nearerthan other, because he was himself one of the Salii, and was the cause that the army staid behind and came not forward to overtake the camp.

C And even then there hapned to come unto the camp from Antiochus, one Heraelides a Byzantine, having in charge to treat as touching a peace: and good hope he conceived to obtain the same with ease, by reason of the long abode and stay of the Romans in that one place : of whom he had looked for no other, but that as foon as they had let foot in Asia, they would have marthed apace straight waies against the Kings camp. How beit this course he took not to go directly uno the Conful before he had spoken and conserred with Scipio, (and indeed such direction and charge he had from the King himfelf) in whom he had reposed his greatest hope: for besides his mignaminity and noble courage, as also the satiety of glory and honour, whereof already he had his full. (great inducements unto the King that he would be early wrought and made most pliable to hearken after peace) all the world knew full well how foberly he had carried himfelf in his D victories first in Spain, and afterwards in Affrick: and more than all this, a son of his was captive in the faid Kings hands. But where, when, and by what chance he was taken prisoner, writers agreenot no more than inmany things elfe, Some fay, that in the beginning of the war, he was beferandenclosed round within the Kings ships, at what time as he sailed from Choleis to Oreum. Others write, that after the Roman army was passed over into Asia; he was sent one in espiall with a troop of Frægellan horiemen to view and discover the Kings camp: and when the Kings Cavalry made our to charge upon them, he made haste to retire, and in that hurry his horse fell with him and to he and two other men of arms with him, was surprised, taken, and brought to the King, But thisone thing is for certain known, that if there had been fure and firm peace between the King and the Romans, nay, if there had been familiar acquaintance and hospitality between E him and the Scipios, this young Gentleman could not possibly have had more friendly entertainment, not been more kindly intreated, liberally nied, yea, and honourably regarded than he was. Forthele causes the Embassadorattended the coming of Scrpio: and io soon as he was arrived, presented himself unto the Consul, requesting that he might deliver his message and be heard. Whereupon in a frequent affembly he had audience given him, and thus hespake: "Whereas (quoth he) there have been divers and fundry embassages passed to and fro as touching peace, "and no good as yet done; I lay this for a ground and affire my felf now to speed, because the Commercemballadors hitherto have effected and obtained nothing: for in all those treaties and "diputations the question was about Smyrna, Lampfacus, Alexandria, Trow, and Lysimachia, "which is in Europe. Of which Cities, the King my Master hath already quit Lysimachia, to the end you should not say that he hath any one City at all within Europe; and as for those other in Asia he is ready to surrender them also yea & all the rest what soever, which the Romans would recover our of the Kings hands and dominions, in regard they had sometime sided & taken part with him. And for the charges which the Romans have defraied about this war, the King will be willing to disburfe and make good the one moity unto them again. And thus much spake beconcerning the articles and conditions of the peace. The rest of his speech behind, was beflowed in advertizing and putting them in mind of the alternative revolution of this world and "the affairs thereof: that as they should use their own good fortune and prosperity with mea-"fur and moderation fo they ought not to prefs down others in their advertity; but hold them "chrontented within the bounds and limits of Europe, and that was a dominion sufficient (a "man would think) and exceeding great: confidering this, that it is an easier matter to win one thing after another by way of conquest, than to hold and keep them all together when they are "woo To conclude, if the Romans were minded to difinember any part from Ass. so they would make an end once, and limit out the same within certain precincls without any sutther doubt "and difference, the King for the love of peace and concord, would suffer the Romans in their measurable defire, and appetite, to surmount and outgo his temperance and moderation, But those matters which the Embassador supposed were of great importance and effectual to obtain peace, the Romans made a pish at it, and lightly regarded for they judged it but meet and reason, that the King should discharge all the expences they had been at in this war, considering shrough his default it first arose: also that he ought to withdraw his garrisons not only out of Ionia and Aolis: but also, like as all Greece hath been made free and delivered to the Greek Cities likewise in Asia ought to be enfranchised and set at liberty: which possibly might not beinks Antiochus were disleized of the possession of all Asa on this side the mountain Tamm, The Em. baffador perceiving well, that there was no reason to be had in the affembly, assaid privativio found and to win the heart and good will of Seipio, according as he had in charge from the King. And first this way he went to work and laid, That the King was minded to send him his son again freely without raniom: then (ignorant as he was both of Scipio his nature and the manner of Romans) he promited him a mighty mais of gold, yea, and to be made equal companion in the government of the whole kingdom (the Kings name and royall style only reserved) in casehe would be an instrument and means to effectuate peace. To these motives and offers Sciplo returmed this answer, "That you neither know the Romans all in general, nor my self in particular un-"to whom you were fent, I less marvell, seeing you are altogether ignorant of the state of him "who hath fent you hither. For if ye had meant to have lought for peace at our hands, as of men who were in care for the doubtfull event and iffue of the war, ye should have held and kept Lise fimuchia fill, for to have empeached our entrance into Chersonnesus, or else ye should have made head against us in Hellespontus, and staid our passage into Asia: but now seeing ye have granted " paffage into Affa, and suffered your selves not only to be bridled and curbed, but also to be vot-" ked and like beafts to bear and draw too; fince I say there is no remedy but ye must endure to 64 be under our subjection what equals and indifferent means of treaty is there less for you? Now, "as concerning my fon, I will accept it as a great prefent, and beferming the munificence and libese rality of a King, in case he send him to me again. As for the other matters, I pray God I bene-" ver driven in regard of mine effate, to have that need: for furely, I carry a mind that will never "find the miss and want thereof. And for these great offers that the King maketh unto me, he 6 fhall find me thankfull unto him, if it please him for any private benefit unto me done, to requir at my hands a private favour and pleature again: but as touching the State and publike weal, he "fhall pardon me; I will neither receive ought from him, nor bestow any thing upon him, And il " that I can do for him at this present, istogive him good and faithfull counsell. Go your was "therefore and tell him from me, That his best courie is to abstain from war, and not to refuse will condition of peace whatloever. But all this nothing moved the King, who made re koning that any hazard and fortune of war would be good and fafe for him, fince that there were laws impofed upon him already, as if he had been quite vanquished and overcome. Whereupon, without any more parl of peace for this time, he bent his whole mind and employed his fludy about provision and preparation for war.

The Conjul having given order for the execution of all his plots and defigns, distodged from thence, and marched first to Dardanum, and after to Rhateum: the inhabitants of both which Cities came forth to meet him upon the way in great multitudes. From thence he went forward to Himm, and encamped in a plain under the very walls: then he entred into the town, and accorded up into the Cattle, where he offered facrifice unto Minerva, the patronels of that City. The Ilian M entertained them with all fhew of honour, as well in deed as in word, acknowledging that the Romans were deteended from them, and the Romans again were as joyous and glad to fee the place of their first original and beginning. From thence they removed, and the fixt day after arrived # the head or spring of the river Caicus. Thither also Eumenes the King (who at first assaid to bring his fleet back from Hedefpontus, to winter before Elas, and afterwards, when he could not for (8) tain daies double the point of Lettos, by reason of the contrary winds, went a land) because he would not fail but be present at the beginning of these great affairs, made haste the next way with a small power to the camp of the Romans, From the camp he was fent back to Pergamus, 10 give order for purveyance and provision of victuals: and after he had delivered out corn to those whom the Conful had appointed to receive it, he returned again to the same leaguer. The Conful his pur N pote and intent was to be provided aforehand of vi Stuals sufficient for many daies, and together in one train to go against the enemy, before the winter surprised them,

Now the Kings camp lay about Thyatira: where Antischus hearing that P. Scipio was tartied fick to Elaa, sent certain Embassadors of purpose, to present and deliver his son again unto him, which present of his, he took not only great contentment in his spirit, as a father might do for the ceiving his dear son, but much easement also and comfort to his sick body. After he had satisfied himself at length with much embracing of his son, "Ye shall (saith he) recommend me unto the "King your Master, and tell hims from me, that I thank him most heartily, and that I have no good it hing at this time to send to him again, but only this, That I advise him to take heed that hear termed." ten not into the field to give battell, before he hath heardsor certain, that I my selfam returned. "to the leaguer. Upon relation hereof, Antiochus albeit the was in camp seveny thousand son and twelve thousand horse and above strong (which pussion has no otherwhile animated, and sed him with the hope of good issue of battell) yet moved with the authority of so great apsile and twelve thousand horse and above strong (which pussion has a otherwhile animated, and sed him with the hope of good issue of battell) yet moved with the authority of so great apsile in warshe retired hack, and passed over the river Phypsius, and pirched his camp about Magnessa and the security of security of the security

there) the Romans would affay to force his defences, he cast a trench, fix cubits in depth, and twelve in in bredth; and this trench he environed with a double bank and course of strong stakes and pales, and upon the inward circuit and enclosure he opposed a mure with main turrets, for the more easie empeachment of the enemy, when he should pass over the trench. The Consul suppofing the King to be about Thyatira, marched continually, and upon the fift day came down into the plains of Hireania. And when he understood, that the K. was dislodged and departed thence. he followed him by the tracts, and on this fide the river Phrygius encamped four miles from the he follower and the second of cians, some Dacians, with certain archers on horseback of other nations intermingled among Galatia, now them) who in great hafte having passed over the river, charged upon the corps de guard of the called Gulaid Romans, At the first they put the Romans to some trouble, finding them out of order and arrays but as the skirmish grew hotter and continued longer, and the number of the Romans soon increased, (by reason their camp was so near to yield them succours) they of the Kings side being now weatied and not able to make their part good against so many of them, began to retire: and certain of them before they could take the river, were overtaken by those that followed the chale, and killed outright. For two daies after they stirred of no hand, for neither the one nor the other went over the river. The third day after the Romans all at once passed over, and encamped about a mile and a half from the enemies. But as they were pitching their tents, and bufied about fortifications and defences, three thouland chosen horsemen and foottogether from the Kings Camp, came upon them with a great trouble and affray. The number of them that were in guard, Cwas less a good deal; howbeit, of themselves alone, without calling to help and aid the souldiers from their work about the fortification and defence of the camp, they not only at first receired the charge with equal valour, but also afterwards, as the fight encreased, put the enemies to flight, when they had killed some hundred of them, and taken prisoners almost as many. For the face of four daies next ensuing, both armies flood embattelled on either side before their Camp, And upon the fifth day the Romans advanced forth into the middle of the plain. Antiochus camenot forward with his enfigus, infomuch, as the hindmost were not an hundred foot off from the trench. The Conful perceiving that he fell off and would no battell, called a councill the next day, to be advised and resolved what he were best to do, in case Antiochus would not be fought withall. For confidering that the winter approached, the fouldiers were either to lie in the need under their tents, or elle if they minded for the winter feason to retire unto their garrison towns, the war must be put off untill the next summer. Now the Romans never made so small reckoning of any enemy as of him. Whereupon, throughout the whole affembly they called upon the Conful with one voice to lead forth to battell out of hand, and take the fouldiers whiles they were in this heart ready if the enemies would not come out into the field, to pass over ditch and rampier, and break into the camp amongst them; making account, that they were not to fight with so many thousands of enemies, but rather to make a slaughter and butchery of so many beafts. Whereupon Cn. Domitius was sent to discover the way, and to view the place where was best entring upon the trench and rampier of the enemies. After he had brought certain relation of all things, it was thought good the next morrow to approach near unto their camp : and on the third day the enligns were displaied forth into the midst of the plain, and they began to range the army in battell array. Antiochus likewise supposed it was not expedient to lie off and stay any longer, for fear lest in refusing still to fight, he should either abate the courage of his own men, or increase the hope of his enemies, and therefore came abroad with all his forces, and advanced so farforward from his camp that it appeared well he meant to fight. The Roman army flood embattelled in one manner of form, as well for men, as munition and armor: for of Romans there were two legions, and of Latine affociats as many, and every legion confilled of five thousand four hundred. The Romans put themselves in the main battell, and the Latines kept both the points. The Hastati were placed with their enfigus formost in the vanguard. After them the Prinin the mide, and the Triarii in the reregard. Without this compleat battell, thus marshalled. the Conful fet to the right point the auxiliary fouldiers of Eumenes, mingled together with the targetteers of the Achaans, to the number almost of three thousand, whom he ranged equally afront, and beyond them more outward he opposed about three thousand men of arms; whereof eight hundred were sent from Eumenes, the rest were the Cavalry of the Romans. Without all thelein the outmost place, he put the Trallians and Candiors, who in all made up the number of firehundred. As for the left wing, it feemed to need no fuch fuccours, by reason it was flanked with the river and high steep banks, how beit, in that side shere were planted sour troops of horsmen. Thus you fee all the forces that the Romans had befides two thousand Thracians and Macedonians mingled and blended together, who followed as voluntaries, and were left for the guard of the Camp, and fixteen Elephants, which they bestowed in the rereguard for the desence of the Triani. For, over and besides that they were not like to hold out against the Kings Elephants, which were in number fifty and four, you must consider that those of Affrick are not able to match them of India, say they were in number equall: either because in bigness the Indians exceed the other (as in truth they are much greater by ods) or surpass them incourage and domack. But the Kings army was compoled of divers nations, different as well in arms as in foulders, He had of Macedonians fixteen thousand footmen, heavily armed after their manner, called Phalangite; these made the main battell, and in the front stood divided in ten fquadrons, parted and fevered one from the other by two Elephants placed between. More inward behind the forefront, the battell was displaied in two and thirty ranks of fouldits. This was the strength of the Kings army, and as in other respects, so especially in regard of the Elephabrs surmounting alost over all the souldiers, represented to the eye a searfull and terrible fight. For bendes that they were high and lofty of themselves, their crested headstalls withplumes upon them, their turrets upon their backs, and in every turret four men standing in glitteringarmour besides the Malter and governor himself, made the apparence and shew far greater. On the right wing, he placed close unto the Phalangites, a thouland and five hundred horizon of the Gallogreeks: unto whom he adjoyned three thouland lances in compleat armour, mounted upon baid hories, and those men of arms they themselves called Caraphratti. To these were added ann. ther wing of a thouland horsemen, which they named Ageme, Medes they were, elect and the fen men, together with more horsemen of the same region, mingled of many nations one with another. Close unto them in the rereguard was fet a troop of fixteen Elephants. On which file also in a wing tomewhat farther drawn out stood the King his own cohort, bearing the name of Argyraspid s, by occasion of the filvered shields which they bare. After them followed 1200 Dz. *Like to Car- cians, archers on horseback. Then, three thousand footmen lightly armed, and composed part. ly of Candiots, and partly of Tralleans, in number almost equal, and 2500 Mysians attended upon the archers. And the utmost side and tail of that wing was guarded with four thousand Cyrtean flingers and Elymean archers forted together. On the left wing likewife there flood faff unto the Phalangites aforefaid 1500 horsemen Gallogracians: and two thousand Cappadorianearmed after the same manner, sent from King Arrarathes. Then the Auxiliaries of all forts 2700; besides three hundred lances in compleat harness upon barbed horses armed at all pieces, and 1000 other horiemen. As for the Cornet of the Kings, it was more lightly armed, as well themfelves as their horses but their setting out and furniture otherwise, all one. And these were Syrians for the most part, with Phrygians and Lydians together. Before this cavatry went thechariots of four wheels, and drawn by as many horses, armed with sharp and trenchant hooks like fith-blades, and the camels called by them for their swiftness Dromedaries. Upon these were mounted the Arabian archers, who also were armed with keen swords four cubits long, that if ting as they did to aloft, they might notwithly anding reach their enemy. Then after their me fer another multitude equall to that in the right wing, whereof the formost were terrain hour. men called Tarentins, and after them 2500 Gallogracian horse Likewise of Neotretansal thousand and of Carians and Civilians one with another 1 500 armed alike. As many Trallians and three thousand targetteers. These were Pisidians, Pamphylians and Lycians; and last of all, the succours in the rereguard of Circeans and Elymeans, in like number as they that were plant of the succours in the rereguard of Circeans and Elymeans, in like number as they that were plant of the succours in the rereguard of Circeans and Elymeans, in like number as they that were plant of the succours in the rereguard of Circeans and Elymeans, in like number as they that were plant of the succession o ced in the right wing, with fixteen Elephants also distant a pretty way alunder. The Kinghimfelf in person had the conduct of the right point of the battell, and ordained Science histon and Antiquer his brothers fon to command the left. The main battell in the midfl wascommilted to the leading and governance of three Captains, to wit, Minio, Zeusis, and Philipthe Mafter of the Elephants. There was a certain milt arose in the morning, and as it waredfather day gathered alost into thick clouds, and made the Weather dark: befides, by the South-windit resolved into a small dristing rain, which wer and drenched all. This did little harm to the Roy mans: but contrariwife, was much hurtfull to the Kings fide. For, albeit the air was dimand dark, yet by reason that the Roman battaillons took up no great compass of ground, they could for all the air was overcast, discern from one end to the other; and the moisture that fell, dulid nothing at all (to speak of) either the swords or javelins of them that were heavily annel: whereas the Kings army being embattelled so broad, had much ado, and hardly could see from the middle of the main battell to the wings of each hand, and much left differn from one skin and flink of the battail on to the other. Moreover, the dropping weather flugged their bows, for ned their flings and loops of their darts. Their fithed chariots also wherewith Antiochus madefull account to break thearraies of his enemies turned to the diforder and fright of themselves, Now these chariots aforesaid were in this manner armed for the most part: certain sharppikesthey N had about the spire-pole, bearing forward from the spring-tree; ten cubits in length, likeumo homs, with which pointed pikes they would pierce through whatloever they encounted, Also at each end of the laid spring-tree there were two blades stood out the one of just and even height with it, the other lower and bearing downward to the ground: the former was deviled to the through whatfoever came near the fide thereof, the other to reach and tear them that were faln to the earth, or came under the chariot. Likewife at both ends of the axeltree with out the nave of the wheel there were two fuch like books fastned and bended divers waiel Their chariots thus armed the King had placed in the front of the battell as we faid before, be canie if they had been fer either in the middle or the reregnard, they should have been driven through their own battaillons. Whi h Eumenes perceiving one that knew well crough them! O ner of that kind of service and how dangerous it was in case a mon rather frighted the hosestim charged them directly by ordinary warlike force he commanded the Candiot archer and dingers, with some other horsemen that lanced dires, to run forth not thick introops, but feattring as far alunder as they could, and at once from all parts to discharge their thou wood them. This forerunning temper (as it were) to madded the horles partly by galling, won ding

with the strange and uncouth noise which they made, that suddenly as if they had been unbridled ad without their geers, they flang out every way, and ran at random: which violence of theirs the light armed fouldiers, the nimble flingers, and (wife running Candiots avoided easily with a nice. And the horsemen withall following the chase, redoubled the fright and hurry amongst the horses, yea, and the dromedary camels too; which likewise were unruly and set a madding and this hurly burly, the manifold cries from the multitude all about, helped well forward. Thus were the chariots chased in the middle of the plain between both armies: and when these vain bugs were once rid out of the way, then the alarm and fignall was given on both parts, and they charged one another in battell-wife. But as foolish an occurrent as that was, it caused anon a discomfiture and overthrow indeed. For the auxiliaries and aids behind which were placed next unto them, terrified with the fear and affright of the chariots, fled, and left all naked and and disfurnished even to the bard horses, in such sort, that when the rereguard was in difarray, The Roman Cavalry entred upon the foresaid horse, and charged them so hotly, that part of them was not able to endure the first shock and encounter: some were put to flight, others were born down with the poise and weight of their harness and weapons. And prefently thereupon the whole left wing of the battell began to retreat. And after that those fuccours were disbanded and in difarray which were between the Cavalry and the heavy armed footmen called Phalangitz, the diforder and fear went as far as to the midft of the main battel : where fo foon as the ranks and files were broken and shuffled together, by reason of the entercourse of their own fellows among them, they had no nse at all of their long pikes, which the CMacedonians call Sarifa. Then the Roman legions advanced their engins, and lanced their datts against those disordered ranks hudled together. The very Elephants that were placed between nothing troubled and affrighted the Roman souldiers, as who had been used in the African wars, both to avoid the furious rage of those bealts, and also either with their javelins to flankand hurt them overthwart, or elfe if they could come near unto them, to hew them and cut their hamstrings with their swords. By this time now was the front of the main battell defeated and beaten down: and the rereguard behind environed and cut in peeces: when as the Romans withall, might perceive their own fellows flying from the other part, and hear the cryof thosethat were affrighted, even almost as far as to their camp. For Antiochiu keeping the right wing, seeing in the lest point of the Romans no other desence (by reason that they truof fled upon the river) but only four troops of horsemen, and those also by drawing themselves closeto their sellows, to leave the bank-fide void and naked, charged that point with his Auxilianes and lances upon bard horses, and not only made head and pressed them asront, but from the river also set a compass and enolosed them; and slanked that wing so long, untill the horiemen were first discomfitted, and then the footmen next unto them were put to flight, so as they ran amain toward their camp. M. Emplies a Colonell, and sonto M. Lepidus, who a few years after was created the High-Prieft, had the charge of the camp : he with his whole guard came forth, and where as he saw them to flee, there he opposed himself, and first commanded them to stand, and asterwards to return to battell, checking and rebuking them for their beaftly fear, and shamefull running away. Moreover, he proceedeed to minatory words, faying, That in case they would not be ruled by his direction, they should run headlong like blind beetles upon their own michief: and in the end, he gave a ign to his own company, for to lay upon the formost of them that thus fled, and caused the and tinde that followed, with dint of tword and drawing bloud of them, to turn their face again upon the enemies. Thus the greater fear overcame the less for seeing danger before and behind, first they staid their flight, and a sterwards returned to the battell. Æmylius also with his own regiment (which for the guard of the camp had 2000 tall and valiant men in it) withflood the King right flourly as he followed hor in chase upon those that fled. Moreover, Attalus (brother of King Eumenes) in the right point of the battell, who at the first charge had difcomfitted the left wing of the enemies, perceiving that his fellows fled in their left point, and heating a great stir about the camp, came to the rescue in good time with 200 horsemen. Antinhus, when he saw them turn head again whose backs erewhile were toward him, and begin tofight aftesh, and perceived withall a number coming against him, both out of the camp and allo from the bartell, turned his horse head and took himself to flight. By this means the Romans obtained the victory of both the wings, and passed directly to the rishing of the camp over thedead bodies, which in the main battell most of all were massacred and lay by heaps : where the fitength and flower of the hardiest men ranged close together and the weight besides of their heavy amor, would not give them leave to flie away. The horsemen of Eumenes were the first of all others that pursued the enemies: after them, the rest of the Cavalry followed the chase all overthe fields, and ever as they overtook any of the hindmost, killed them outright. But that which troubled and plagued them in their flight more than all besides, was their chariots, elephants and camels, intermingled among them as they fled; for a fmuch as being once disbanded and put out of their ranks, they tumbled one upon another like blind men, and were bruifed and mined under the beafts feet which came running upon them. Great execution also there was committed in the camp, yea, and more in manner than had been in the battell: for the first that fled, and those that fought in the vanguard, took their way most of them to the camp, and monaflured confidence of this multitude, the garrison within fought more valiantly, and held our longer in the defence of the hold. The Romans being thus staid in the gates, and keps one of the rampier which they thought verily to have forced and won at their first assume, when hy were once at legst broken through and got in, made the more blondy staighter amongs than, for very anger and despitable that they had kept them for the stong. It is said, that there were stime that day about firty thousand footmen and 4000 horiemen, T400 takes pissioners, together with sifteen klephants with their governors. A number of the Romans were but and wounded, but there died not in the field above 300 sootmen, and 24 horiemen: and of the regiment of king Earness to past five and twenty. And for that day verily the conquerours after they had institute only the tents and pavilions of their enemies, returned to their own camp with great plens of pillage: but the next motrow they fellto spoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their pillage: but the next motrow they fellto spoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their pillage: but the next motrow they fellto spoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their pillage: but the next motrow they fellto spoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their pillage. Sypilm sor to surrender and deliver up their Cities.

Antischus, who fled accompanied with some sew, having gathered unto him many more in the way, who rallied themselves unto him, arrived at Sardis about midnight with a small power armed men; and hearing that his som Selencus and some other of his friends were gone before to Apamea, himself also at the south watch departed thence with his wise and daughter toward Apamea; after he had committed the charge of guarding the City Sardis unto Zeno, and appoint Itmon governour of Lydia. At the same time there came an herald from Antiochus unto the Consul, who by the medicion of Scipio, made request and obtained thus much, That the King might fend his Orators and Embassadors unto him. And after few daies Zensis (who had been governour of Lydia) togethell with Antipater (Antiochus his nephew, or brothers fon) arrived. Who first dealt with King Es menes and communed with him, whom (by reason of old jars and quarrels) they supposed very to be the greatest enemy unto peace, and that he would never abide to hear thereof: but him there found more reasonable and enclining to peaceable terms, than either the King their Mafters or themselves hoped and looked for. So by the means of Scipio and him together, they had aces unto the Conful; who at their earnest petition granted them a day of audience in a frommalfembly, there to declare their Commission and what they had in charge, "Then (quoth Zaufit) " we are not so much to speak and deliver ought of our own selves, as to ask and be advised of you "(Romans) what course to take, and by what means of satisfaction we might explate and suisse "the trespass of the King our Master, and withall obtain grace and pardon at your hands who my "the victors? Africanus, were called forth to a parley with King Ansiechus, is touch ing the thiargment and delivery of young Scipio the ion of Africanus, and by that means were both of them arrested and taken prisoners : also that when these chief commanders were under arreft, the Kings army incontinently advanced against the Roman camp, the same was impriled and forced and the woole power of the Romans utterly defeated. By occasion whereof, it went I current alfo, that the Ætolians began to look aloft, refuled to obey, and shook off their alleageants. alfo that their Princes and chief States were gone into Macedony, Dardany and Thrace, to levy and wage suxiliary forces : moreover, that A. Terensins Varro, and Marcus Claudius Lepius were fent unto out of Etolia, from A. Cornelius the Propretor, for to report thele news at Rome. Last of all, to make up the tale, he addeth and faith that the Etolian Embassadors among other things being examined in the Senat about this matter, and demanded of whom they heard and understood that the Roman Generals were taken presoners in Afia by King Antiochus, and the whole army overthrown? answered directly, that they had advertisement thereof by their own Embeffedors, who had been with the Contul. tain truth, nor yet omit it as a meer table or loud lie. The Ætolian E. balladors were permitted to come into the Senat house; and being induced fin regard of their own caute and pretent condition) to confeste a truth, and as humble suppliants to crave pardon and forgiveness either for their fault, or misprifion and error, began with abed. roll of their tayours and good turns done unto the people of Rome, yea and in mariner to upraid the Romans with the valour which they she wed in the war against Philip, But with their anogant and in olent language they offended the ears of the Senators : and by ripping up old mains done and past (time out of mind and utterly forgoiten) they b ndled their own caute to, in brought it to this paffe, that the LL. of the Senat began to call to mind much more harm and milchief contrived and practifed by that nation, then kindnesses and courtesses received atthir L bands : intomuch as the Ætolians having need of their mercy, incurred their beavy displessing, and provoked them to anger and hatred. Being asked this queltion by one of the Schators Whether they would refer and submit themselves to the centure and judgment of the people of Rome? and likewife of snorber, If they could be content to hold them for their friends or enemies whom the Romans fo accounted; they antwered not a word and thereupon immediatly were committed out of the Court and pretently all the Senat began to cry out with one voice, that the Euclius were all fill for Kings Antiockin depending wholly and only upon that hope, and therefore they ought to war against them as undoubted enemies, and to take down and tame the so proud and fellonious hearts of their own. Over and betides all this, another thing there was that incited and kindled the stomacks of the LL against them, because at the very same instant whenthey M seemed to require peace at the Romans hands, they warred against Dolopia and Athamania, So there paised a decree of the Sena, (and the same was moved by M. Acilius, who had vacquished and fundued Antiochus and the Etolians) That they shall void that very day out of the Cityof Rome ; and within fifteen daies next enfoing, out of all Italy. An. Terentim Varro was lent to lake conduct them on the way and this warning they took with them, that if ever after therecans any Embassadors from the Atolians, without the warrant, license, and permission of the chief General who governed the province or not accomp nied with a Roman Legat, they should be reptedall of them for no better then enemies. In this maner were the Actolians dismissed & lent away

After this the Confuls proposed unto the Senat, as touching the government of the province. N And thought good it was that they themselves should cast lots for Atolia & A sa. Unto him whole let it the als be to govern Afia, was appointed that army which L. Scipis had. And tortofamille if fully u and make up the decaied bands, he was allowed to have four thousand foot men offemans with two hundred horimen of allies that were Latins, eight thousand foot and fourthouland men of arms, and with their forces he was to make war against Antiochus. The other Confel had a signed unto him that army which was Etolia : and liberty he had for supply of that broken army to levy the same number of Citizens and allies that his companion in government had entelled. To the fame Conful was granted a commission likewise to ser in order, furnish, and take with him those ships which the former year were prepared and rigged, and not only to make w. with the Etolians, but alfo to fail over into the Ifle Cephalenia. And withall, the faid Confal o had in charge to return home to Rome for the election of Magistrats, if he might so do conteniently with the good of the Common-west. For belides the annual Magiltrats (who were to be choice one under another) it was agreed upon, that Cenfors also should be created. But in case his affairs detained him, that he might not return in perion, then he wasto give advertilement, and fignifie fo much to the Senat, that he could not possibly be present at the time of the aforefaid Election. So Acotta tell by lot to M. Pulvini, and Afa to Cn. Manlini. Thenthe Pretors fell to draw lots for their provinces. Sp. Poframens Albiniu had the juridian over

A citizens and forreiners both: M. Sempronius Tuditanus governed Sicily: and Q. Fabius Pictor the Quirinall Flamin, Sardinis: Q. Fabius Labou was admirall of the navy at fea: and L. Plautius Hypfens was allotted to the rule of high Spain, and L. Babus Dress of the lower. For Sicily one legion was appointed, together with that fleet which was already in that province, Alio there w. sorder given that the new Pretor should impose two tenths of corn upon the Sicilians, and lend the one into Afia, and the other into Afialia. The like imposition was laid and cacked upon the Sardinians, and the faid corn to be conveighed into the same armies that the Sicilian corn was. A supply was greated unto L. Babius for Spain of a thousand Rom. footmen and fifty bouse beddes is besides fix thousand Latin foot, and two hundred horimen. Unto Plantins Hypfens for the higher Spain were allowed as thousand Roman sootmen: with two thousand Latine allies, and two hundred horie. Besides these supplements, both she provinces of Spain were allowed each of the more legion. The Magistrats and governours of the former year continued still in place of command for one other yeer, to wit, C. Latins with his army, and P. Isnins also the Propretor in Hetswis with those forces which were in the province M. Tuccins likewise in the Brutians country and Apalia.

But before the Pretors went into their provinces, there hapned a variance between P. Lieinins, the Arch-Pontifie or chief Prelat, and Q Fabins Pictor the Quirinall Flamin, like unto that which sometime fell out between L. Merellus and Posthumins Albinus. For at what time as Posthumius the Conful was upon his departure and journey to his seet in Sicily, together with C. Luttarius his colleague, Metellus the Archbilhop for the time being, kept him back uponoccasion of certain facrifices to be celebrated : femblably, when as Fabius the Pretor would Chavegone into Sardania, P. Licinius the high Priest deteined him. Much strife and hard hold there was hereabout, as well in the Senat house, as before the people. Inhibitions passed to and fro. Cautions and pledges were diffrained fines they impoled one upon anothers head the Tribunes were called unto on both fides for to interpole their authority, and they appealed both unto the people. In fine, religion, and the regard of holy rites took place, and carried it clear, and the Flamin was enjoined to obey the chief prieft : and by order and expresse commandment from the people, all fines were taken off and forgiven. And when the Pretor for very anger and ipite that he was debarred from his province, would have furrendred and refigned up his government. the LL, of the Senat impeached and terrified him by their absolute authority, and orderned that he should minister justice, and exercise civil jurisdiction between aliens. After that the musters D were ended within few dayes (for many fouldiers were not to be levied and enrolled) both Confals and Pretors took their journey into the provinces. After this, there arose a bruit concerning the occurrents and affairs in Afia, blown and spread abroad I wot not how, nor from what author it proceeded : but after few daies there came certain messengers with letters from the Generais of the Roman army, lent of purpole to the City, which cauled not to great joy prefently enjuing upon the fresh fear aforesaid (for why, they were no more afraid of Etolia by them already conquered) as dashed quite the fame and opinion that went on Antiochus, whom in the beginning of this war they supposed would have been a dangerous enemy unto them, as well in regard of his own puillance, as for that he had the direction and conduct of Annibal in the war how beit. they thought good to alter nothing, either as touching the fending of the Conful into Affa, or diminishing his forces, for fear they should have war with the French.

Not long after M. Aurelius Cotta, a lieutenant of Scipio, came to Rome with the Embaffadors of King Antiochus, and likewise King Emmenes and the Rhodians. Cotta reported and declared fishin the Senat, and afterwards in a full affembly of the people (by order and commandment from the LL. of the Councell) what affairs had passed in Spain. Whereupon ordeined it was, that there should be holden a solemn procession for 3 daies together : and order was given, that 40 head of greater cattel should be killed for sacrifice. This done, the Senat assembled for to give audience to King Eumenes; first above all other metter: who briefly in few words having rendred "thanks to the LL, of the Senat, for that they had delivered him and his brother from fiege, and protected his realm against the wrongs and outrages offred by Antiochus: also having testified his joy by way of gratulation for their prosperous and fortunat affairs atchieved both by land and " fea : namely, in that they had discomfitted and put to flight K. Antiochus, & driven him out of his "camp, that he could not keep the field; and withall differzed and dispossessed him first of Europe and afterwards of all that part of Afia which lieth on this fide the mountain Taurus the conclu-"ded and knit up all with this, That as touching his own demerits and employments about their "affairs, he had rather they took knowledge by their own generals, captains and lieutenants. "than from his mouth. They all approved well of this speech of his, and willed him to speak boldly without bathful modelty in that case, What he thought in equity and reason the Senat and people of Rome was to yeeld unto him by way of jultly recompense: assuring him that the Senat would do it more willingly and liberally (if poffsibly they could) according to the worth of his defert. The King answered thus again, that in cale any other had made him that offer, and given him the "choice of his own rewards, he would gladly have used the counsell of that honorable court "of the Roman Senat (to he might have the means and liberty to aske their advice) to this end that "he would not be thought, either to exceed measure in covetous defire, or passe the bounds of modelty in craving a recompense. But now considering they are themselves to give that reward, "much more reason it is that their magnificence and bounty to him & his brethren should be re-

Werred to their own arbitrement and differetion. The I.L. of the Senat were nothing moved at this H language of his, but urged him ftill to tpeak himfelf in his own caufe. And after a certain timethe they had frived a-vie, the LL in contesie and kindness, the King in modelty and shamefallness yeelding one unto the other reciprocally, in fuch amiable and mutual manner as hardly can be expressed, Enmeas, departed out of the temple. The Senas persisted nevertheless in their resolution faying, it was very abfurd and undecent that the King should be ignorant upon what hopes he was come, and what he purposed to make fuit and petition for: and himself must needs of lothers know best what was meetest and most expedent for his own Kingdom: yea, and was far bester acquainted with the effate and affairs of Affa then the Senat was. But an honeurable deed it is and mag-Unificent, to let free and deliver Ciries out of thraldome and fervitude. True and I my felf am of the same opinion, provided alwaies, that they had attempted nought by way of hostilitic against " you, but in case they had taken part and fided with Antiochus; how much more it indethit with a wildom, nay, with equity and reason, to be respective of your allies who have so well deserved "atyour hands, then to regard your enemies. This Oration of the King much pleased the LL of the Senat, and foon it was teen by their countenance that they would deal bount couffic and liberally with him, yes, and gratifie him in what they might. Then andience was given to a brief embaliage of the smyrneans, who by occasion that some of the Rhodians were ablent, came be-D tweenand delivered their melfage. Highly were these smyrneans commended, in that they choice ruter to endure all extremities, then to yeeld themselves unto King Antiochus. Then the Rhodians entred in place : and the chief man of their embaffie, after he had declared the first occasion and beginning of the amity which they had with the people of Rome, and shewed withall the good delens and lervices which the Rhodians had performed in the wars first against Philip and then against Antiochus, went on and spake as followeth. "Right honourable, there is nothing more difficult and troublesome unto us in all the businesse that we have in hand then this one thing, "that there is some variance and matter to be debated between us and Eumenes, the only K. of all "others, with whom especially every one of us in privat, and (that which toucheth us more) our "City inpublick, doth entertain the bond of friendship and mutual hospitality. Howbeit no re-"pagnancy is in our affections (my LL.) but even the course of this world and nature it self(the "mightielt thing of all) which disjoyneth us and caufeth difference . this maketh us (being men "Ireeborn) to defend and maintain the freedom allo of others : this is it, that moveth KK, to be "defirous to have all in fervitude and subjection under them, and at their command. But howfoe-" ver it is, our modelly and the reverent regard we have of the King person hurteth us more, then "either the debating of our cause with him is otherwise difficult unto as, or the deciding thereof "like to be intricat and toublesome unto you. For in case it were so, th t you could not honour "and reward a King, your allie and friend, for his good fervice done in this war (for recompense "whereof you fit in consultation) by no other means, unlesse you deliver free Cities into his thands, to ferve in bondage; then were it hard for you to refolve; for fear left either ye should fiend away a prince (your friend and confederat) without guerdon and honour ; or feem to change that laudable enterprise of yours which you have begun, to stain and blemish your glory now. "(which you have acquired by the war against Philip) with reducing so many Cities and states "into fervitude. But your happy fortune easeth you right well of this difficulty and necessity, "that you need not fear either to empair your credit and favour with your friends or to endamage "your reputation and honour among men. For (the gods be thanked therefore) you have atchie-"veda victory, no leffe rich then glorious, and fufficient (If I may fo say) to discharge all your "debts, and fet you clear with all the world. And I wot onot well, whether those things which we hardly come by be not with more difficulty holden & "kept afterwards, then they were purchased. You undertook to deliver & rid out of the servinde " and oppression of Kings, and to maintain in liberty, a most ancient and noble state, renowned? of for their worthy and famous acts, and right commendable for their fingular learning and know. se ledge in all feiences. For your honour it is, having once received all this nation in your fafeeard " and protection, to defend and preserve the same for ever. And think not, that those Cities only " are more Greek which are built and feated upon the ancient foil of Greece, then their colonies which have been drawn from them, & in times palt went from thence into Afia: for the change es of air and place bath wrought no alteration, either in the nature and complexion, or the manen " and fashions of the people. As for us, endevoured we have do better and better, and each Cir " hath entered into an honelt contention and religious emulation to out-go and furmount their " forefathers and first founders in all good arts and commendable vertues. This Oration feemed to fit well the greatness and majefly of the Romans. When the Rhodisas haddone, the Embassadors of Antiochus were called in. Who after the usual and stale more of those that crave pardon, consessed the King was in fault, and humbly belought the LL, of the Senat to have more regard of their own accustomed gracious clemency, then remember the Kings trespasse, who had paied sufficiently for it already . and finally that they would ratific and con- 0 firm oytheir suthority, the peace granted by L. Seigle the Lord Generall, according to those conditions, which by him were capitulated and fet down. So both the Senat thought good to admit of that peace, and also within few daies after the people gave their affent and o trabilihed the same. And this accord was folemnly confirmed in the Capitol, with the Kings Procurator or agent, to wit, Antiquier, the chief of the emballage, who also was Antiochulis brothers ion. This done, the other enzhallages of Afia had audience, and were all disparened with his one answer, that the Senat would tend ten deputies or commissioners, according to the an-

A cient cultome of their anceltors, to hear, decide, and compose all their affairs of Affa. But the finall conclusion of all should be this, That what sever pertained to the dominion of Antiechus on this fide the mountain Tannes, thould be affigned to King Eumenes, excepting the countries of Incia and Caria, fo far as the river Maander, all which must lie to the fignory of the Rhodians. Astouching the other Cities of Affa, which had been tributaries to Attalia, those also were to pay tribute to Enmenes : but such as were sometimes homagers to Antiochus, those should be enfranciled and remain free. The ten commissioners whom they appointed were these, to wit, Q. Minutius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Minutius Thermus, App. Claudius Nero, Cu, Cornelins Merula, M. Iunius Bruins, L. Aurunculeius, L. Emplius Paulus, P. Cornelias Leminlus. and P. Elias Tubero. But they had direction from the Senat, as touching the principal points: Imprimis, That all Lycaonia and Phrigis, both the more and the lefs, that Myfis, with the Kings chafes and forrelts, that the Cities of Lydia and Ionia, except those that were free at the day of the battell fought with Antiochus, and expressly by name Magnesia near Sipplus, together with Caria, which is called Hydrela, and all the territorie of Hydrela lying toward Phrygia; moteover Telmeffus and the forts of the Telmellians, referving only that territory which belonged to Prolomens the Telmessian ; that all these countries, I fay, and Cities above writen, should be given and granted to King Eumenes, Item. That the Rhodian should be enfeoffed in Lycia, without the foresaid Telmessas, the forts and territory, appertaining sometime to Ptolomens Telmesius: which parcels, I say, were reserved as well from Eumenes, as the Rhodians. Item, to the Rhodians was granted that part of Caria, which Clieth beyond the river Maander, neer to the ille Rhodes, together with the towns, villages, fortreffes, and lands bounding upon Pifidia: except those towns which were free the day before the battell with King Antiochus in Afia. The Rhodians, when they had given thanks to the Senat for their granities, were in hand with them for the City Sole in Cilicia : they alledged that they likewife as well as themselves, were descended from Argo: by occasion of which confraternity and neer alliance, they loved together as brethren by nature : in regard whereof, they made petition that over and belides other donations, they would do them this extraordinary favour, as to exempt that City also from the servitude and subjection of K. Antiochus. Then were the Embassadors of King Ansiochus called for, and treated withall about this matter, but to no effect. For Antipater flood floutly upon this point, pleaded hard, that the accord was past already, and might not be revoked or altered : and that against the tenour of the articles and covenants therein comprised, it wis not the City Sols, but also Gilicia that the Rhodians demanded; and never would they rest till they were gotten over the mountain Taurus. Then were the Rhodians called back again into the Sense, unto whom the LL. of the Senat, after they had made rel tion how earnest the Kings Embssisdor was with them upon the point, added thus much moreover and faid, That if the Rhodians deemed in very deed that the matter concerned the honour of their City and State, the Senat would work all possible means to cause the Kings Embassadors to relent, how stiff and oblitinate loever they flood. For this courtefie, the Rhodians thanked them much more heartily then for all therest before, and said withall, that they would yeald and give place to the arrogant spirit of Amiechni, rather then feem to give any caufe or occasion of troubling the peace. And to as touch ing the City Soli, there was no alteration made.

Whiles thele matters were thus debated and passed, the Embassadors of the Massilians brought intelligence, that L. Babisse the Pretor, being in his journey towards his province of Spain, was entrapped and enclosed by the Ligarians, and many of his train killed outright in the place that himself mortally wounded fied without his lictors and fergeants into Massilia, and within three dyesleft this life. The Senat upon the advertisment ordeined P. Innius Brutus the Pro-pretor in Hetraria to go in perfor into the farther Spain, and govern the fame as his own province : but full to leave Herraria and the army there to one of the Lieutenants whom he pleased to make choile of. This decree of the Senat, together with letters from Sparins Posthamius the Pretor of the City was fent into Herraria: and to P. Iunius departed as Pro-pretor into Spain. In which province L. Emplins Panins (who afterwards wan a right glorious victory of King Perfons) having the former year fought unfortunatly, now a little before the arrival of his successor, gave battelliothe Luftanians with an army rallied and affembled in halt, in which the enemies were put to the worse and driven to fife. One thousand eight hundred of them well armed were left dead in the field, 3300 taken priloners, and their camp forced and tanfacked. The bruit that went of this victory let all matters in Spain in greater quietnels.

Thelame year upon the third day before the Calends of January, L. Valerius Flacens, M. Artilius Serranus, and L. V alerius Tappe, the three Triumvirs, by order from the Senat, planted a *29. Decem-Lating Colony at Bolonia; and three thouland people were thither fent to dwel. Every gentleman by cilling that ferved on norleback had 70 acres of ground fet out muto him, and the rest of the coloners fifty speece. The land divided thus authong them had been conquered from the Boisos in Ganl: and those Gauls first had disposeded the Tuic and of the same.

This year there were many men of mark and name that fued to be Cenfors : and this compethion as if it had not been of fulficient importance it felt to move matter of debate, was the occlien of a contention and variance much greater. The competitors were thefe, T. Quintins Fluminius, P. Cornel. Scipio, the fon of Cuens: L. Valerius Flaceus, M. Porcius Cato, M. Claudius

Marcellus,

Marcellus, and M. Acilius Glabrio, even he who had vanquifhed Antiochus and the Etoliusut H Thermopple. To this man last rehersed the peoples favour and affection most enclined by reason of many congisties and largeffes which he had given amongst them in publick, by means wherein many a man was obliged and bound unto him. The reft, being fo many and nobly delcended with. all, took it to the hearth and could not endure that fuch a perion as he newly rifen and come up, and agentleman of the first bead, should be preferred before them, whereupon P. Semprenius Gracebus, and C. Semprenius Rutilius, two Tribunes of the commonalty, commenfed actions. gainft him to answer at a day, laying to his charge that there remaineth a surplusage of the Kings mony and other pillage gotten in the camp of Antiochus, over and above all that he either carried and she wed in triumph, or brought in accompt into the City chamber. Many and fundry depofitions there were to prove this inditement, as well of lieutenants as of colonels. But M. Catalin bove all other witnesses was most noted: whosegreat authority acquired in the whole counsed his life (which he had passed hithertoin all upright conversation and constant gravity) was much empaired and discredited now, with his white robethat he bare on his back. He being produced as a witness, deposed and gave evidence, that he had seen certain plate as well gold as filver, a mong the rest of the pillage found in the Kings camp, which he never could set eyeoning the triumph abovefaid. In the end, Glabrie, because he would bring some displeasure particularly. and most of all upon Cato, said, he would give over his suit for the Centorship, since that there was another competitor as newly come up as himfelf, (whereat the Nobles indeed took indignation inwardly, although they faid nothing) who purfued the canfe to against him, even withincredible and inestimable per jury. Well, a fine was fet upon his head of a thousand affes. And twile k was the matter traverled, whether the mulc thould be taken off or paid. But when the thirday was come, and the party in trouble (Acilius) had quite furcreated to fue for the dignity, the people would not give their voyces as touching the paiment of the fine aforelaid, and the Tribunt allo themselves let fall their action. So T. Quintins Flamininus, and M. Clandins Marcellu wete

About the same time the Senat sate within the City in the temple of Apollo, in regard of L. A. mylius Regillus, who had vanquished the Admiral of King Antiochus in battellatica; where he had audience given, and when he had declared what exploits he had done, namely, against how puillant Armados of the enemieshehad fought, and how many thips of theirs he had either funk or taken; The LL. of the Councell with one generall confent and accord, granted unto himan. L wall trinmph. And he triumphed upon the Calends of February. In which triumph there wae born in shew fifty crowns save one, of beaten gold : but nothing that store of coin as such a royall triumph required only there were carried in pomp 34700 Attick tetradrachms, [132300 ciftophors. After this (by decree of the Senat) there were processions celebrated in confideration that

Not long after L. Scipio came also into the City, who because he would not be inferiour to his brother in the honourable addition of his name, caused himself to be surnamed Affation. He discoursed before the Senat, and in the publick andience of the people, as touching his wonthy acts. Divers there were who construed the thing thus and said, That the war was greater in mmethen difficult unto bim in the mannaging a for with fighting one only memorable battel the materway M atchieved and ended, but the glory indeed of that victory was begun unto him and preparel for his hand at Thermopyle. But if a man should judghereof aright, and according to truth, the battell of Thermopple may rather be accompted an exploit against the Etolians then King Aniochus For what great forces I pray you had Antiochiu there in the field of his own? But in the last battell smitten in Asia, the whole power and puissance that he had in all Asia, stoodthere to he feen, yea, and all the sids and fuccours which he could levy out of the nations as far as to the utmost parts of the Esst. Great cause therefore they had both to render much praise and thunkfgiving to the immortall gods, in as ample maner as possibly they could devise (for vouchfafing unto them fo brave a victory as it was, and the same with such case and expedition) and also to grant N a triumph to the General. He triumphed upon the last of February, even in the very day that maketh the leap year. This triumph of his was much greater then that other other of his brothers in regard of the magnificent pomp and shew represented to the eye: but if one call to mind the substance of the things themselves, and compare the dangers, the conflicts and difficulties of the one war with the other; there is no more equality between them, then if a man (hould in comparison of captain with captain, set Antischus to match with Annibal. He shewed in trumph two hundred thirty four field enfigns and standards : he carried before him the portraids of two bundred thirty four towns and Cities : a hundred thirty four teeth of ivory : two hundredthirty four crowns of gold: 237300 pounds weight of filver: 234000 Artick tetradrachms: 331070 cistophores: 1,0000 Philip-peeces of gold: of filver plate, and that was all graven and chiled, a 0 thouland four hundred twenty four pound weight : of golden plate as much as weighed 1204 pound. Moreover there were led before his chariot 32 great commanders; either governorsof provinces under the King, or attendant in his court, Every fouldier ferving on foot, had given mto him ' 25 deniers every centurion had double to much; and the gentlemen or knights triple. Mter the triumph done, the fouldiers had their pay double in mony, yea, and the portion of conlike wife was doubled. He had moreover given them already a double proportion in Afa, prefently upon the end of the battell. A year it was almost after his Confulship expired ere he triumphed

And much about one and the lame time, both Ca Manline and the Confidented into Alia and O. Fabius Labes the Pretor repaired to the fleet. Moreover the Conful had work enough and wanted not matter of war within France. The leas were quiet after that Antiochus was defeated and subdued : Fabius therefore studied which way to take, and how to employ himself and his torces at fea, because he would not be thought and reputed idle in his province : so he resolved at length to put over with his fleet into Crete. Now they of Cydon warred at that time against the Gortynians and the Goofians: and the voice went that there was a great number of Romans and Italians, captives, living in flavery and bandage in every quarter of that Iland. He loofed therfore from Ephefiu and let fail for Candy, and so soon as he was arrived and let aland, he fent his meflengers about to the Cities, willing them to abandon their armor and in create from war, and to learth and leek up throughout all the Cities and territories those captives and prisoners aforelaids to bring them to him : nd moreover, to fend their Embasiadors or agents, with whom he would treat concerning the affairs that in common touched as well the Candiots as the Romans. The llanders made imali regard of these messages : and unlesse it were the Gortynians, there was not one that delivered the captives Valerius Antias hath recorded, That out of the whole Iland there were rendred to the number of four thouland; because the inhabitarits were frighted with threats of war. And that this was the caule why Fahins, although he performed no other exploit. Obteined of the Senat a navall triumph. From Crete, Fabius returned to Ephefus; from whence he let forth three thips to the coast of Thracia, and commanded that the garrisons of Antiochus should quit Anni and Marona, to the end, that thole Cities like wile might be fet free and enfra chiled.

Scipio Africanus was indilled as fome far, by Quintus Petilius Acteus a Tribune of the Commons : as others, by Nævius, for that he had defranded the City Chamber of some part of the Pillage which he got from Antiochus. When the day was come that he should make his answer, he was called up to the publick pulpit and place of audience, and with a loud voice said unto the people: My masters you that are Citizens of Rome, this very day have I won Carthage: and with that be ascended up into the Capitall, and the people accompanied him thither : and from thence because he would avoid these hard and insuring courses of the Tribunes, and be no more tormented with them he retired himself to Literaum, as it were into voluntary exilerand whether be ended his daies there or at Rome sit it not well known; for his tomb and monument was to be feen in both places, L. Scipio Aliaticus (the brother of Africanus) was accused of the same crime of embezeling the publick treasure and robbing the common weal, and thereof condemned: but as he was led to prifon, and should have been laid up in bonds and irons, Tib. Uring the time of the wars in Afia, the affairs also in Atolia were in smal rell and quietnels: which troubles arole first from the Athamanians, who after that Aminander was dispossessed of his Kingdom, were held in obedience by garrisons under th captains of King Philip; and they bare themselves so proud, intolent, and outragious in their government, that the Atham mians found a great miffe of Aminander, and were defirous of him again. Now remained he at that time as a banished person in Atolia; and upon letters received from his own nation (conteining the state wherein Athamaniasthen stood) he conceived some hope to recover his crown again, whereupon he tent the meflengers back to Argithea (the chief City of Athamazia) unto the principal men of the countrey, with this credence, That if he might beat fured of the affection and love of the people, he would procure the aid of the Atolians and come into Athamana, accompanied with the elect personages (and those are the councel of that mil on) and Nicander the Pretor. When he understood and perceived that they were prest and ready to do him . Il tervice, he advertised them oftentimes upon what day he would enter with his me my into Athamania. At the first there were but four persons that conspired against the Macedonian garrison and these took every one six more unto them for to be assistant in the execution of their complot. But afterwards trufting but little in this imal number of their adherents and complices (who indeed were fitter to keep couniell and conceal a matter fecretly, then to perform any action valiantly) they adjoyned unto them the like number unto the other : fo as now they were two and fifty in all; and they divided them elves into four companies. One crew of them wentto Heraclea, another to Terraphylia, where the Kings treature was usually kept; a third took their way to Thendoria; and the fourth to Argithea. But they all agreed upon this confesio hold themselves quiet and peaceable at their first coming, and to converte in the market placeof their Cities as if they were come about some particular negotiation of their own a and upon a contain day appointed to fet to it at once, and to raife the whole multitude for to expell the Macedonia garrisons out of their fortresses. Now when the day was come, and Aminander sendy upon the frontiers with his forces of a thousand Ætolians, the garrilons of the Macedonian, were at the instant chaled out of those four Cities aforesaid, like as it was complotted before hand; and letters were dispatched from all parts into other Cities, advising them to deliver and free them elves from I the tyranny of Philip, and reftore Aminander into his lawfull kingdome and throne of his latter. Thus the Macedonians were expelled in every quarter a only the town Theiam made refillance and held our tome few daies against the fiege by occasion that Zeno (captain of the garrison there) had intercepted the letters, and they that fided with Philip were possessed of the castle. But in the end furrendred it was like wife unto Aminander, and all Athamania reduced unto his obedience excepting only the fort of Atheranm, fitte t upon the marches of Macedony.

Philip advertised of the revolt of Athamania, accompanied with a power of fix thousand lighting men, rehe modelf in his journy, and with exceeding expedition, marched as far as Gomphi, Where he before the eater part of his forces, (for they had not been able to endure fo long journey) andere were w thousand came to Athenaum, the only place held by his garrison to hisuse, M And fromto him igater he had founded the next neighbours, and foon found that there was no thing but had end among them, he retired to Gomphi, and joined withall his forces togethereturned into Athamania. Then he fent Zeno before with a thouland footmen, and gave him in charge to leize upon Atlopia. a place that directly for his purpote commandeth Argithea: and seeing that his men were possessed thereof, himself fat him down, and pitched his tents about a certain temple dedicated to the name of Impiter. There he was forced by reason of the souland stormy weather to stay one whole day, and the morrow after he went forward with his armyto Argstben. As they marched, behold they discovered the Athamanians, running from diversions to the hill tops, which flood over the way along. They had no fooner espied them, but the formolt enligns made stay, and all that regiment of the vanguard was surprised with fear and hight, N Every man began for his part to cast many doubts, and think with himself what should become of them, in case their companies were entred once into the vallies, so checked by those rocksbovefaid. This tumult and trouble caused the King perforce to call back those in the vanguin, and to retire the same way that he came, notwithstanding he was very desirous (if they would have feconded him) to have made quick speed, and gotten through those freights. The Athenmists at first followed after them aloof quietly enough : but when they had once joined with the Atolians, leaving them behind to come upon the tail of the enemy, they spread themselves all about and flanked them on the fides : fome of them also got afore their head by the next waies which they were acquainted with, and befet the passages; infomuch, as the Macedonians were to greatly troubled, that forced they were (more like men that fled in dilarray, then marched in good or der) to leave much of the increase of the state of der) to leave much of their armor, and many of their men behind, to passe over the river; and there the chale ended. From thence the Macedonians returned fafely to Gomphi, and lo forth into Macedony.

The Athamanians and the Ætolians affembled from all parts to Ethopia for to furprife and defeat Zeno and that regiment of a thousand Macedonians which was with him. But the Macedon mians repoling no great trust in that place, retired from Ethopia, to an hill much higher and Afteeper on all fides, and therefore leffe acceptable. The Arhamanians having found our diverse palliges unto it, enforced them to forgo that hold alfo, And when they were differred among the blind rocks, and unto them unknown, and could not readily find the way out, tome of them were raken prisoners & others flain. Many for fear tumbled down headlong from the pitch of the cliffs, and brake their necks, and very few cleaped with Zeno to the King. The next day after they obtained truce, until they had committed their dead to earth.

Aminander having thus repossessed his realm, fent Embassadors to Rome unto the Senat a likewife unto the Sespices in Afia (who after the great battell with Antiqohus, fojourned in Ephelus) He craved peace and pardon. he excused himself in that he had recovered his fathers Kingdome by the means and help of the Actohans, and withall laid great fault and blame upon King Philip. B A for the Ætolians, they departed out of Athamania, and made an expedition against the Amphilochians, and by content of the greater part (reduced the whole nation under their pullance and subjection. Having thus regained Amphilochia (for in times past it appertained to their siegnoty) upon the same hope they passed over in Aperantia, which yeelded also for a great part thereof, and came under their obedience. As for the Dotopians, they never belonged to the Etolians, but unto Philip. And at the first they affembled together in arms, but understanding one that the Amphiloch anstook part with the Etolians, that Philip was fled out of Athamania, and that his garifon was put to the tword, they revolted likewife from Philip, and turned to the Actolians. Who making now full account that they were fore enough on all fides from the Macedonians, by resion of fo many nations which environed them about, they took knowledge (by he common Chair) of the defeat of introchur by the Romans in Afia, and not long after their own Embaffadorsteturned to Rome without hope of peace, relating withail that Parvis the Conful had paffed the feas already with narmy. Upon thefe news, they were much troubled and afraid; and in this perplexity, they induced and procured first the Ruodian and then the Arnenian Em'affages, to the end that by the credit and coun enance of thefe two States, their praires lately rejected, might have mo ecalie accelle to the Senat : and with them they lent to Rome once again the principall perlonages of their nation, to try their last hope of obtaining peace; and never forcast to prevent war, before the enemy was come welneer within their fight. Now had M. Fulvius transported his forces to Apollomia and deviled with the princes and flates of the Epirots, where to begin war. The Epirots advited bim to affail Ambracia, which as then was united to the Actolians. And D why it either the Etolians should come to the defence of the place, they had a goodly large and open plane all about to bid them battel; or if they refuted the field, and would not fight, they should find no great difficulty to affault and force the town. For not only there was at hand ftore enough oftimber and other matter to raile mounts, mantelets, and other fabricks; but Arethon a river nivigable, very commodious to transport all necessaries unto them, runneth under the wals of the City; and befides, the fummer was a fit featon for war-fervice. With thefe restons they perfivaded the Contul to conduct his army through Epires. But when the Contul is Ambraca, he found it was no case peece of work to beliege and assault the This Ambracia is finat under the ftony and craggy hill; which the inhabitants call Per e City it fel looketh unto the Welt, what way as the wall reacheth toward the fields as the fore p and catle thereof transleth upon the hill, and regardeth the East. The river 2 of doarnania, dischargeth it felf into an arme of the fea, which beareth the name e City neer adjoyning, and is called Ambracia. This town, befides that it is well guarded with the river of one fide, and defended with hils on the other, is fortified also with a strong wall, in circuit somwhat more then three miles about. Fulvius encamped strongly on the fields fide, in two holds of a prety diffance afunder, and raifed one sconce upon an high ground, opposit against the fortress of the town. All these places he determined to enclose within the compais of a trench and rampier, to the end, that they who were that up within the town, might have no egress, and that from without there should be no ingress, for any aid and succour whatsoever. The Erol ans were assembled already at Stratus by an edict from the Pictor Ninander incontinently upon the rumour that ran Fine fiege of Ambracia, intending fully at first to match from thence withall their forces. But afterwards, when they preceived that a greater part of the City was streightly beleaguered already, and blocked with trench and rampter; and withall, that the Epirots were encamped upon aplain on the other fide of the river, they were of advice to divide their forces in two parts. Enpolemus accompanied with a regiment of a thouland men lightly appointed, pasted through the funfications of the enemies, before they were joined and united together and entred Ambravia Number with the rest of the forces purposed at the first by night to assail the camp of the Bpirots, confidering that the Romans could not eatily fuceour them, by reason of the river running between, But after wards upon oefter advise, supposing this to be a dangerous enterprise (for fear left the Ro-G nam thould be cover their indreh, and so intercept them that they might not retire again in lafery) be altered his mind, and thirded to the spoiling and walking of Acarnavia. Now when the Conful had made an end of all his fabricks devised for to invest and enclose the City, and finishing his engins where with he meant to in akethe wall, he approached neer and gave affault in five places at once, a Three batteries he planted in equali diftance afunder, and where the caffelt parlage and accels was from the plain, full upon that place of the City which they call Pyrrhaum; one over against the temple of Afenlapidus; and another opposit to the Castle. With rand the though the wals; with long poles and hooks he tetche off and placked down the battlemens of the wals. The oppidans at the first were afraid to fee their tirange engine, and H quaked to hear fo terrible noise of their wals battered ; but after wards, feeing that the wals flood upright beyond their expectation, they plucked up their hearts again, and with twipes weight either great counterpoiles and weights of lead, or huge ftones, then with a twing they let them fall ag in upon the ran s of the enemies, or elie tumbled mighty big logs of timber aleft, and lo either brake them aperces, or bare them down. And as for their hooks aforefaid, they caught hold of them with iron flouks like anchors, and so drew then over the wals to the other side with witness and brake both them & their poles, Moreover, they tallied out in the night upon the watch that at attended their engins, iffuedforth of themselves in the day time, assailed the corpidegeard, and put them great fear. As things frood in thele terms before Ambracia, the Atcliansby this time were recurred to Stratus from their rodes which they made into Acarna; ta. And then Nist cander the Pretor conceiving tome hope to levy the flege by tome audacious, and hardy advenuer devited that one Nicodamus (hould put himself within the town of Ambracia wi h five hundred Atolians; and appointed one certain night, and an hour also of the same night, when both the from out of the rown should assail the fabricks and engins of the enemy planted against Pyrtham and also himself charge upon the camp of the Romans at the fame time, and put them in fright supposing by this twofold alarm (especially in the night which maketh every thing more learfull) there might be some notable act and memorable exploit done. And Necedamons verily for his part in the dead time of the night, having passed unfeen and not descried by tome of the fentioels, and by resolut force broken through the rest of the watches, passed over an arm of the river and recovered the City, and in tome meature by this means heartned the belieged inhabitants to advenue K anything, and put them in better hope to accomplish al. And when the night appointed was come. all on a inddain he let upon the engins, as it was before accorded between them. The advenure of this enterprise was much more then the effect, because there were no forces wishout to joyn with him; were it that the Pretor of the Atolians was afraid to be to vold or that he thought it was a better peece of lervice to aid the Amphilochians newly recovered, whom Perjoue King Philip his ton, fent from his father to reconquer Dolopia and Amphelochia affailed witngreat torce and violence. The Romans had planted their ordnance and artillery, as is abovefuld in the epico against Pyrrheam, which the Ecolians charged all at one time, but nor with like preparations megans, nor with the fame violence. For fome came with burning and flaming free rands, their catried tow and hards with pitch, and faggots of dry flicks, and other like insiter cafe to kl kindled, in such fort as all their companies shone again with a light fire. Many of the warders the killed at the fielt onfet, but when the alarm and rumult was heard within the camp, and the fign given by the Conful, they took arms, and ran apace out of all the gates for to releue and defend them. In one quarter the Ætolians did their deed, and fought with fire and tword : butintheo ther two places after they had given the attempt, rather then began any skirmith, they retited and went their waies. The hear of the fight inclined wholly to one quarter, wherethe two cap in Eupolemus and Micodamus, encouraged their men as they fought from two divers parts, adenterreined them with an afford hope, that Nicas her according to agreement would be thread charge upon the back of the themics. This for a good while mainteined the ceurage of the founders - but the territory than the part of their countrymen, and that they kept on youth with the second ceing with all how the number of the enemies energaded, and themewere disappointed and destitute, they slaked their fight, and were not to eager upon the enemy, and in the end gave over; and b ving much ado to retire in fafety, were challed into the City, af other had burnt tome of the Roman engins, and flain a few more of their enemies then there died of themselves. And lurely it the service had been followed in execution according as it was complotted and agreed, those deviled engins no doubt might have been deftroyed, if not wholly, ju in one part at least wite, and that with great murder and flaughter of the enemies. The Ambutians, together with those Ætolians which were within the City, not only gave over that nights enterprise, but ever after shewed more coldnels to h zard themselves again, as if they had N been betrayed by their own fellows. Not a man would fally forth upon the ward and watchol the enemies, but they all from their walls and turrets stood upon their guard only, and withit vantage of the place defended themselves in lafety.

Perfens advertised that the Atolians approached Amphilochia, quit the siege of the City which he was about to affault: and after he had only harried and walted the territory about it, retired from those quarters and returned into Macedony. The Etolians likewite were enforced to depart from thence, by reason that their sea coalis were spoiled and overrun : for Pleagues the King of the Illyrians, was entred into this river of Corinth with a fleet of 60 barks, and with the fleet of the Achan ships that lay in the tode of Patre invested the maritim tract of Esolia, Against whom were fent a thouland Ætolians, who waited upon the fleet at every turn as they deabled 0 any reaches, and with the vantage of the short waies and next passages by the land, were ready to welcome them on the banks and make head against them.

The Romans lying still in fiege before Ambracia, by b ttering and shaking the wals in many places, had difinantled a great part of the City, and laid it open : howbeit, they could not cold with it. For at every breach where the wall was broken down, they were ready to make a tell countermure, and the fouldiers francing upon the very mins, ferved in fread of a bulwark. The Conful feeing he could not prevail by open force, determined to undermine and makes keret

H way in the ground into the City; but first he covered the place where they wrought with mantlets. For a good while the pioners were not perceived by the enemies, not with fire nding they wrought both night and day, but only digging under the earth, but also calling up the mould as they were. But an huge heap of earth bearing up aloft from the reft, was different dand gave them within the town to understand; what the enemies were about and fearing left they had wronght fo faralready as under their walk, and that they were at the point to make a way into the town, they within began likewise to finike another trench just against the place covered with mantlets aforefaid: and when they had digged to that depth as the bottom might be of the enemies mine; they made no words within, but in great filence laid their ear too in divers places close to the earth, harkning if haply they might hear any notic of the pioners : and when they once had got B an ear of them, they countermined directly against them. And long they were not about it ? for anonthey came as far as to the void hollow ground, whereas the foundation of the wall frood upon states and props, which the enemies had set to bear it up. Now when their works were met together, and that there was a continued passage out of this trench into the Mine, the pioners fift fell to it and suffled with their spades shovels, and mattocks, and such other tools that they had nied to work withall: but foon after, armed fouldiers entred and encountred within the vault, and closely skirmithed under ground. But within a while that manner of dealing grew more cold and slack by realon that they flopped up the Mine between when they lift, one while with facks and haircloath, other whiles with doors and fuch trash, as they could come by in haste Effood next hand. One new invention above the rest was devited against those within the Mine; C and the same but a slight matter, and made without any great trouble, and this it was, The towns mentook a great tun or dryfat with a hole boared in the bottom, of that capacity, as might receive a pretty pipe like a faucet within it; and withall they made a pipe indeed of ironto fit it, and anironiid likewise to cover the other end or mouth thereof, but the same had many holes in divers places of it. Now this vessell they stuffed full of down and lost feathers, and then let it with the head forward against the very Mine, From the lid or cover aforefaid there stood proking our long tharp pikes, which the Macedonians call Spriffs, for to keep off the enemies. Within the feathers they put a cole or (parkloffite, and then with a pair of finiths bellows (the noise whereof west into the pape aforefaid) they blowed the tole and fer it on a smothering fire within the feat thers. By which access there at die not only a mighty deal of friends, but also it carried with it a D finking favour, by the reason of the feathers burning within; and so filled all the Mine underseath, that frace durit any man abide within for fear of being choaked.

During these affairs about Ambracia, Phaness and Demoscles two Embassadors sent from elie fixolians by a generall decree of the whole nation, came with a full and plenary commission unto the Comini. For their Prator (seeing of the one side Ambracia besieged, and on the other side the fee coast endamaged with the enemies thips, and in a third quarter the Amphilochians and all Delapsa piteously waited by the Macedonians; and that the Atolians were not able to oppose themicives and make head at once against three wars in divers parts) had affemily ageneral Di-et for toconfult with the chief of the Acolians what was to be done in this care in the chief of the Acolians what was to be done in this care. ons junied in this one point, "To feek for peace (if it were possible) under equations if not, yet in as tollerable terms as they might. But they were welcomed with outcries, and well shent sontheir labourin that they had not dispatched and made an end, and so were sent away, and commanded to bring back with them one peace or other. Asthey went again toward Ambracia, they were forelayed and insprized in an ambuth laid for them near the high way fide by the Acarnanian (with whom at that time they warred and were had to Tyrrheum and there imprisoned And by this occasion the peace was delayed.

Whiles the Embassadors of Athens and Rhodes (who were come already to intreat for them) remained with the Conful, Aminander also (the King of the Athamans) presented himself under Ambrathia, or fale conduct in the Roman camp, and took more care for the City of Ambracia (where he had I Sojourned the greatest part of his exile than in the behalf of the Actolians. By them, the Col, was certified of the hard hap of the Etolian Embassadors; and then he gave commandment, that they should be brought from Tyrrheum. When they were come, they began to treat of peace, Aminen der in the mean while laboured what he could in that enterprise which he especially had undertaken namely, to induce the Ambracians to submit unto the Romans : but when he law hedd but small good, for all his parling with the principal persons of the City from their wallstat length by the Cof, his permiffi in he entred into the town; where, partly by good counfell, and partly by prayer and entreaty, he periwaded them in the end, to put themselves into the Romanshands, Now as touching the Etolians, they found much favour by the means of C. Valerius the lon of that Lavinus, who first contracted amity with that nation; and was besides half brother unto the K Co by the same mother. And the Ambracians after capitulation made, that the Etolians who came to aid them might go forth without harm, fet open their gates. Then atticked it was with the Etolians: Imprimie. To pay 500 Euboik talents of filver; two hundred presently and the other 300 at fix paiments yearly by even portions. Item, To render all Roman captives and figure traytors and runagates that they had into the hands of the Romans. Item; To challenge juridis ction over no City, which fince the time that T. Quintins paffed over into Greece; was either forced by the Romans or entred voluntarily into amity and fociety with them: provided alwaies that the Isle Cephalenia be not comprised within this capitulation. These articles albeit they were fornewhat easier than they looked for, yet the & olians requested that they might acquaint their Council withall: and permitted they were so to do Some small variance and debate distracted and In held them a while as touching those Cities, which having been in times past within their seigning and jurisdiction they hardly could abide to be dismembred (as it were from their body Burinte end there was not one but agreed to accept of the peace. The Ambracians gave unto the Collor a prefent a coroner of beaten gold, weighing 1 50 pound. Their statues of brass and marble their painted tables (wherewith Ambracia was better fored and adorned; than all the other Cities of that region, because it was the royall feat of King Pyrrhus where he kept his court and refine) were all taken, down, and carried away : nought else was touched nor any hurt done belies,

The Confuldiflodged then and removed from Ambracia into the higher and more inland perces of Atolia, and en amped before the City called Argos Amphilochium; two and twenty miles distant from Ambracia: and thither at length repaired the Etolian Embassadors unto him, M who marvelled much at them why they staid o long. When he understood by them that thege netall council of the Atolians had approved of peace, he willed them togo directly to Romeunto the Senat: and permitted also the Athenians and Rhodians (their mediators and advocats to go with them and as orators to fpeak in their behalf & moreover he granted, that his half brother C.P. lerrus should accompany them: which order when he had taken himself crossed overthews

When they were arrived at Rome, they found both the ears and hearts of the chief Sentors wholly post fied beforehand, with many complaints and imputations that Philip hadenformed lagainst them : for he by means of his Embassidor and letters (complaining that the Acollisis had unjuftly taken from him the Dolapians, the Amphilochians, and Athamania; and that his guilfons, yea, and last of all his on Perfeus, were driven out of Amphilochias had wholly avented the Senat from giving any ear at all to their requests and prayers: how beit she Rhodians & Athenians had audience given them with patien e and filence. The Athenian Embaffador Lein (bytepon) "moved and perswaded the Senat with his eloquent tongue; and by a familiar parable and smill-"tude, he compared the people of Erolia to the nature of the fea : For like as it, being of thell calm is troubled and made rough by the winds: even to (faith he) the people of that national "the while they entertained riendship with the Romans, and performed their faithfull promite "unto them fo long were in their right kind, and continued peaceable and quiet; but after that "Those and Dicearchus began to blow from out of Afra, as after that; Menetas and Damerina blufted and puffed from the parts of Europe, then angle a ftorm and tempelt; with the guilt " whereof driven they were to Antiochya, and caff(as a man would fax Jupona rock, Weltheld "tolians after they had been much tolled a long time from post to millanin fine effected that the "articles of peace enfuing, were freely agreed upon, Imprimis, Thenasion of a Etolio fiellmintain faithfully and truly the Empire and Seignory of the people of dome dem They find fatto pais through their country and confines no army that shall be conducted against their allies and friends; nor affift them with any aid or maintenance, what loever, Lean, They thal reput the ste-

Not only in the same summer, but also much about those very daies wherein these affairs were managed by M. Falcius in Estalia, Cn. Manlius the other Conful maintained war in * Gallogracia, *Otherwise whereof at this present I will begin to write. This Conful in the beginning of the spring came to named Galatia Ephilis; where after he had received the army of L. Scipio and taken a review and furvey thereof he made an Oration to his fouldiers; wherein, first he praised their valour and vertue, in that with one battell they had finished the war against Aniochus: then he exhorted them to enter D into a new war with the Gauls who had succoured King Antiochus with aid; and were beside of nature so uptamed, that unless their puissance were abared and their courage taken down, to litthe or no purpose it was that Antiochus was removed beyond the mountains of Taurus, Last of all, fome discourse he made of his own person, which was nothing prolix and long, implying neither vain untruths nor excessive reports. The fouldiers gave audience to the Consul with great joy and agental applaule, making this account, that fince King Antiochus was vanquished, the Gauls alone (who were one part of his forces) would be of no puiffance to withfland them. But the Conful supposed that it was much out of his way, that Eumenes should be absent (for then he was at Rome) who knew the countries, was acquainted with the nature of the people, and whom it imported and concerned very much, that the power of the Gauls should be enseebled and abated. g And therefore he sent for Attalus his brother, from Pergamus, and exhorted him to enter into action with him and take arms. And when Attalus had made promile to aid him both in his perfon and with all the power that he could make he fent him into his country to levy fouldiers. After lome few daies, when the Conful was departed from Ephelus, Attalus (accompanied with a reginest of a thousand soot and two hundred horse) met him at Magnessa; and had given order to his brothes Ashenam, to follow after with the rest of the forces; having committed the guard and government of Pergamms and the kingdom to those, whom he knew to be fast and faithfull to his brother and himself. The Conful, after he had praised and commended the young gentlemin marched forward with his whole power as far as * Maander, and there encamped, because it * Madre, wis not possible to pais the tiver at any foord, and therefore boats and barges were to be got toscher force ferry and transport the army. When they were fet over the river, they went to Hiera time, where there was a magnificene and stately Temple of Apollo, and an Oracle in it. And by reporting Priests and Prophets' there deliver the responds and answers of the Oracle in verses, and hole not indely composed without thithm 8: meeter, From hence they removed, and at two daies and arrived at the river Harpafures thisher were embassadors come from the Alabandians, requefibethe Colleither by verme of his anthority, or by force of arms to compel one of their fortrefto whithilately had revolted from them and rebelled, to return again to their former obedience. And hither Athenaus allow, brother to Eumenes and Attalus, was come together with Leufus the Condition, and Corregue the Macedonian, bringing with them. 1000 foot, and 300 horie, of divers phionemingled together. Whiles the Cof, lay encamped about Antiochia, Selencus the fon of Antiochus, preiented himfeli unto him with cornior his army, according to the covenant contracted with Scipio. Some final variance and difference there was as touching the aid demanded of Autiochus: for Selences pleaded that Antiochus had capitulated only to find corn for the Roman fouldiers. But this debate was foon at an end by reason of the tiff resolution of the Cos. who sent a Colonel to warn and charge the fouldiers to accept no corn before the aid-fouldiers of Antiochus were received From t thence he marched to "Gordin tichos (a City to called) & 10 forward the third day to Tale, The City is feated upon the frontires of the Pindians, in that coast which boundeth upon the Pamphy. lian sea. This quarter was able to yield lufty men for war, when it had not been any way endamaged, but remained entire and whole. For proof whereof, even then also there is used out of the City a cornet of horimen, who charged upon the Romans as they marched, and at the first onlet tronbled them not a little. But afterward, feeing themselves neither for number, noryer for prowes comparable unto them, they were driven back into the town, & craved pardon for their trefpair. ready to surrender their City into the Cos, his hands. The Cos, imposed upon them a paiment of 25 talents of filver, and 10000 medimns of wheat, and upon that composition their surrender was accepted. Three daies after the Romans came to Chaus the river, & from thence to the City Eriza, R which at the first assault they won. After this the army marched as far as to a Castle called That *Hills. Nigro. buffon francing over the river * Indus. to called of acertain Indian, whom an Elephant threw and cast into it, Now they were not far from Cibyra, & yet no embassage appeared from the tyran of that country and state, Mosgetes, a disloyal and treacherous man in all his dealings, and befides ertream hard and unreasonable, Whereupon the Cos, sent out before, C. Helvius, with 4000 foot and 500 horse to sound his disposition and mind. As these companies entred into his frontiers, there encountred them his Embassadors, giving them to understand that the tyrant their Masterwa ready to do whatfoever they would command: only his request was unto Holvin to pass peaceably through his country, and to restrain his fouldiers from wasting & spoiling the territories, & 1 stalents they brought with them for to make a crown of gold. Helvisse promifed to faveligh lands for being poiled and wasted, but he willed the embassadors to go to the Cos. Now what they had related the same unto him, he made them answer in these terms, We cannot gather by any fign(qd,he)that the tyrant beareth good will and affection to us Romans : & again if he be find an one as the world taketh him for we are to think rather of his chastisement, than of admitting him into our amity. The embassiadors fore troubled at this word, requested him for that present no more, but to take the crown of gold, and to permit that the tyrant himself might have much into his presence for to parl with him and clear himself. The morrow after, by permission of the Cof came the tyrant into the camp, bearing no port of a Prince. For a privat person and menuman of small wealth would have gone in better apparel, and carried a greater train about him thanks neither went he so meanly but he spake as lowly, hacking and hewing his words, as if he had not w been able to speak them out He complained of his own bareness and want & likewise of the poverty of the Cities under his seignory (for besides Cybira he held in possession Sylium, & that which is called Alimne) Yet he promised to see what he could do if haply by undoing himself & spoiling his subjects hemight make up five and twenty talents, Mary he mistrusted greatly that he should never effect to much, Are you thereabout? (qd, the Cof.) Now verily I can no longer endute dis mockery. Was it not enough that in your abience you bashed not to delude and disappoint the your Embaffaders, but you must persist still in the same impudency now that you be here you'ld in person? And would you make us believe indeed that the disbursing of 25 talents willbegg you and your whole kingdom? Come on fir, I fay; Bring me hither within these three dairs, and lay me down in ready money 500 talents, or look for no other favour, but your territory to be N wasted, and your City besieged. Greatly affrighted was he at these minatory words, howbeine continued fill obstinatly, counterfeiting & pretending his neediness and poverty, and aftermuch base bucking, and rising by little and little, one while hasting and wrangling, another while praying and entreating (and that with whining and putting finger in the eye) he was fetcht overallegel and came off to pay 100 talents of filver, and to deliver 10000 medimns of corn befides, And ill this was exacted of him to be performed in fix daies. From Cibyra the Cof. conducted the amy through the country of the Sindenfians, and after he had passed over the river Calauria, bether pitched down his tents. The morrow after they marched by the lake or mear Caralini, and it them down and rested upon the river Man der, As they advanced from thence toward Lagar the next City the inhabitants fled for fear: wherupon the town void of people, but replenified with 0 abundance of all things was ransacked and rifled. This done, they arrived at the head or spring 6 the river Lycus and the next day marched toward the river Cobularus, The Termissians at the sine time having forced and won the City of the Lyrians, were now upon the point to affinitive Caftle. They who were within befieged feeing no other hope of fuccour fent their Embilidors to the Conful. befeeching his help, and making pitifull moan, how they with their wires and children were shut up within the fortress, and looked every hour for death, either by faminor the

A sword. This fell out as the Cos, wished, namely, to have so good an occasion presented unto him, of turning his way into Pamphylia. At his first coming he delivered the Lyrians from the siege. To Termessim he granted peace, upon composition that he should receive hit 30 talents. In like fort he dealt by the Aipendians and other States of Pamphylia. In his return from thence, the first day he encamped fast by a river called Tauran, and the next day following, near a town which they call Xyline-Come. From when e he marched and held on his journey continually, untill he came to the City Cormaja. The next City unto it was Da fa, which he found abandoned by the Inhabitants for feat, howbeit, full of all kind of goods. As he marched fill along the marfhes there met him Emhaffadors from Lyfana, who came to render their City into his hards. After this he entred into the remitory of Sagalafin, a fertile & plenteons quarter, for all forts of corn & fruits. The Pifidians in-Bhabitthole parts, who are the best warriors in all that country. In regard whereof as allo for that their territory is fruitfull and well peopled and their City flrongly fituat (as few like timo it Jthey were grown to be hardy and con agious. I he Cof feeing no embaffage prefented into him in the entrance of the frontiers, lent out torragers to fetch in booties. When they perceived once their goods harried and arried away before their faces, their flomacks came down, and then they fent their embassadors and upon composition to pay 50 talents, 20000 medimns of wheat, and as many or bar ey they obtained pea e. From thefice he passed to the sountains of Obrima, untill he came to a village which they name Aporidos Come, and there he encamped. Thither repaired the next day sel uous from Apamea. And the same day, after he had sent away unto Apamea his sick folkand other byggage and pelf that he had (good for nothing) he took guides of Selenens for the Cway, and entred into the plains of Metropolis, and the next morrow marched as far as Dinie in Phrie.a. A fer this he entred into Synad where he found all the towns about abandoned for fear and left defert. With the booty and pillage whereof his alony was to heavily charged, that hardly he could march five miles a day; and so he came at length to Bendos, named, The old From thence he paffed to Anabura, and the next day to the fource of Alander, and the third day pitched down his tents near Abaffus. There he lay encamped many daies together, because he was now arrived into the country of the Toliflobogians.

The Gaus in times past being a mighty people in number, were induced to take a voyage, either forwant of land to inhabit, or for hope of booty and prizes: and supposing withall, that they coold not pals through any nation whatfoever, comparable to themselves in seats of arms, entred D under the conduct of Brennus into the country of the Dardanians. Where, they began to mutibe among themselves: by occasion whereof it happied, that so the number of twenty chousand of them, following two of their Princes Lomnorius and Lutarius, departed from Brennus, and took their way into Thracias where parely by warring with them that made relifance, and parely by impring tribute upon them that craved peace, they came at length as far as to Bizantium: and after they had held tributary a good time the coaft of *Proponiis. they possessed themselves also of the *Mar di Mari goodtowns and Cities of that quarter, After this, they had a mind and defire to invade Afta ; for more they heard lay being to near, how fertile and plenteous the foll of that country was. And after they had surprized and won Lysimachia by a wile, and by sorce of arms conquered all Chersonnein, they descended to Hellespore. Where seeing flow they were divided from A fea but only by the Estraights and that it was but a small cut thirtier their defire was much more inflamed to passover. And for this purpose they dispatched certain curriers to Amipaier the governour of that coasts to demand passage. But by reason that they effected not this so soon as they hoped, there arose another new sediction between the Princes themselves, Whereupon Lomnorius accompanied with the greaterpart revised to Byzantium from whence he came. But Latarius took from the Macedonions (who under colour of an embassage were sent from Aniparer in espialt) two covered ships, and three brigandines. By means of these vessels, within sew daies he had set overall his army, transporting them one after another day and night continually. Not long after Lomnovius also pailed over into Alfa from Byzantiam, by the aid of Nicomedes Kings of Bithynia. After this, the Gauls joyned again together in one, and fuccoured Nicomedes in his wars against Zybea, who held apart of Bithynia: and by their help and affiliance especially, Zybaa was vanquished, and all Bithy-Mabreame fubject to Nicomodes. Then they departed out of Ethynia into Asia. Now of twenty monland there were not above ten thomand armed. Yet fo great a terrour they firuck into all naions on this fide the mountain Tanny, that both they to whom they approached not near, and allothey whom they came unto as well the farthest as the nearest, submitted themselves, and rangedunder their obedience. In the end, being three nations of them, to wis, the Tolifobogians, the Iromians, and the Tectolages, they divided Afa likewife into three parts, and parted them to equally among themselves, that each nation of them possessed a severall track which paied them tribute. The coast of Hells spontus was given to the Trocmians : the Tolistobogians had for their flure reals and Ionia: and unto the Techolages were allotted the inland parts of the main continent of Afin. And in one word they demanded tribute of all Afia on this fide Taurus. But they planned and feated themselves about the river Hatys. The bruit of their name was so fearfull and terribles and especially after their issue was multiplied and increased in great number that the KKallo of Syria in the end refused not to be their homagers and give them tribute. The first of all the inhabitants in A Gathar denied them homage, was King Artalus the father of Eumenes; and forume beyond the expectation of all men; favoured his hardy and couragious enterprise : for he vanquified them in battell. Howbeir, he danted not their hearts fo much; but fill they upheld and maintained their foveraign leignory, in such fort, as their puissance continued untill the wall between A stuckus and the Romans, Yea, and after that Amischus was vanquished and chied out of part of his Realm; they conceived great hope to hold their own still; by reason they were for emore from the lea, and therefore thought that the Roman army would never piece for a to them. The Conful now, for as much as he was to war with this nation, so terrible to all their neighbours in those quarters, assembled his souldiers to a publike audience, and in this manner made speech upto them.

"I am not ignorant, my fouldiers, that of all the people which inhabit Afia, the Gauls are most "renowned for valiance in war. And why? this fierce and cruell nation having run over the world in a manner, and warred with all countries, chose them a place of abode, and to settle themselves et in the midit of a generation, of all other most mild and tractable. Big and tall they are officient "and personage: their hair they wear long in golden crisped and shining locks: they carry buckless ec of huge bigness, and handle swords of exceeding length. Besides, when they enter into battell they use to sing to hoop, and dance, and with clattering their targets and weapons together, after the guite of their country they wake an horrible notice. And all this is done of purpore by them to cerrifie their enemies. But such devices as these be, let the Greeks, the Phrygians, and Carians " be afraid of who are not used and accustomed to hear and see such things: as for the Romans acquainted, with the Gauls sudden and tumultuous wars, they can skill well enough of their their toyes and vanities also. Once indeed, and but once, at the first encounter they discomfited the Romans at the river Allia: but fince that time our Anceltors for the space of two hundred " years have made havock of them, killed, put to flight, and driven them like sheep beforethem; er and ottner. I dare well fay, have they triumphed of the Gauls, than of all the world befides. Thus much we know of them by experience, that if a man be able to stand out their first shock and wiolence (which upon a furious heat of their own by nature, and in blind choles and anger they fpend all at once) all the parts of their body run to sweat and become faint: their weapomare ready to fall out of their hands: their bodies are so tender, their courages so feeble (after their cholarick anger is once allaied and passed) that the very heat of the sun the dust and the drough sis able without drawing sword, to overthrow them and lay them along. Proof and trial we have "had of them not only legions to legions, but man to man. T. Manlius and M. Valerius have "Thewed plainly how far Roman vertue and prowefs surpasseth the surious rage of Gauls, Why et even Marcus Mantius, one man alone, repulsed and beat down the Gauls as they climbed up [by numbers to the Capitoll cliff. And those ancestors of ours beforenamed, had then to del with natural Gauss indeed, born and bred in their own country: whereas these here, by this "time now are a bastard fort of them and clean degenerate, mingled they are with others, and in "truth as they be called, fo are they Gallo-greeks. And it fareth with them as with plants, fruits; and living beafts in which we see that the feed is not of that vertue, & so effectual to keep and et retain full the own kind and nature, as the property of the foil and the air where they are non-" rished is to change the same. Thus the Macedonians who inhabit Alexandria in Approvio "dwell in Selencia and Ballylonia, and other Colonies disperied over the earth, are grownout of their own kind, and in manners become Syrians, Parthians, and Ægyptians. Maffilia leated aer mong the Ganis, hath drawn fomewhat of the nature of the nations adjoyning and bordering w inon them. And what have the Tarentins left them of that fevere, rough, and harddiffine For, what soever is ingendred and bred in the own proper place, is evermone kindly, and retaineth its own nature better; but look what is transplanted into anotherfoll, doth foon degenerate, and grow into a baffard kind: for nature transformeth her felf, and char-"geth into that wherewith the is nourified. Be fure therefore, that like as ye have defeated these "Phrygians (for no beter they be) overcharged and loaden with French arms in the battellaer gainst Antiochus, even so being now conquerours, ye shall subdue and hew them in piecesome "already vanquished. And I fear me more that ye shall win too small glory of them, then I doubt "by fighting to little with them that ye shall have their hands too full of war against them, "Why even King Attalus many a time and often hath discomfitted and put them to flight, Neither N would I have you to think, that lavage beafts only newly taken, and keeping at the full their " fell and wild nature, after a time that they have been fed by mans hand, grown to be tame and gentle; but that the fierceness and cruelty of min is likewise of the same nature to be duked and "made tractable, Are ye perswaded that these Gauls resemble their fathers and grandines in con-"ditions? Their forefathers long fince left their native country for want of ground and land to "poffels; and being driven to pals through the most rough and difficult country of Illyrichmen "first came into Paonia & afterwards travelled all over Thracia, fighting ever as they went with most fierce and cruell nations untill at length they seized upon these parts and setled there. Al " ter(I say) they had been hardned and made more fell by so many travels and dangerous adver-"tures, they were received in the end within such aland. as through abundance of all good 0 "things might feed and frank them up: All that the firceness and favage nature of theirs which "they had when they came first thither, is (no doubt) mollified by the goodness of the mollifie " tile foil, by the sweetness & pleasure of a most temperat air, and last of all by the gentle and decommir nature of the inhabitants their neighbors, And even you also (in good faith) aretolook "unto it; (martiall men although you be, and the very off-spring of Mars himself) ye are (lay) to "take heed and beware of these delights of Asia, and betimes to get you forth from them. So

A "forceable are these forrain pleasures and delicat enticements, to quench and corrupt the rigor of (vont pirits; to powerfull is the commerte and converting with thrangers; to potent is the constagion(asit were) of their manners and discipline of neighbour inhabitants. Yet this one good a turn ye shall have, that as against you they have not that courage which in times past they had; co among the Greeks here, they are of as great hame as ever they were in ancient time. So that amongst your allies, you shall win as great honour by your victory, as if you should have comove-" red the Gauls, when they were at the height of their valour and prowels. After the aftembly difmifled, and Embaffadors fent to Epoffogy aims (the only Prince in those parts who perinted in amito with Enmenes; and had refuted to aid Antiochus against the Romans) the Cos. marched forward. The first day he came to the river Alander, and the morrow to a certain village which they B call Tifcon. I hither repaired unto him the Embaffadors of the Oroadians, craving to be accepted as friends; but they were enjoyned to pay two hundred talents: nd when they requested leave to make relation and report hereof at home, they were permitted. From thence the Cof. led his army to Phrendum; and after that he encamped at Alyaitos. Thither returned they who had been fent to Epoff gnatus together with the Embassadors of Prince Compulsus, requesting the Romans not to war upon the Tecrolages; for that both himself ind Epoffognatus also, would go in person to them and periwaded the nation to do what loever they should be commanded. The Prince obtrained his request; and to from thence the army began to march through the land which they call Axylor: and well it might be focalled, for it hath no wood at all in it, nor beareth fo much * Woodless as thorns, or any thing elle to burn and maintain fire: cow-dung is all their burning, for want of Cother fewell. Whiles the Roman lay in camp before Cuballum, (a fortress of G llogracia) they diso ered the Cavalry of the enemies coming toward them with a great hurrey and tumult. and they charged fo fiercely and fuddenly upon the corps de guard of the Romans, that they not only troubled and disordered them, but also killed some of them. The alarm being given within the camp the Roman horsemen at once issued forth of all the gates, discomfitted the Gauls, and flew certain of them in the chase. The Consul perceiving now that he was come into his enemies country mar hed not from thenceforth without fending out his espials before and kept his army together in battell array with great heed and carefulnets. Thus he held on his journey continually until he came to the river Sangarins, where he purposed to make a bridge, because there was not pallage over at any foord. This Sangarius arrileth out of the mountain Adoreus, and running D through Phrigia it joyneth with the river Thymbris near unto Bithynia, and to growing bigger by receiving a double current, keepeth his course through Bithynia, and dischargeth himself into Proportie : a river not fo famous and noble for the greatness thereof, as because it yieldeth fish abundantly to all the nations bordering and dwelling thereupon. When the bridge was finished and the army pasted over, as they marched along the bank side, the walli or Priests of Cybele (the great mother of the gods) were come from Poffinus, and with ftreamers infules and other ornaments met them: and in their fana tieall verses (as men distracted of their wits) seemed to prophefic and foretell, that the godders wouch fafed the Romans a fair way to war and victory, yea, and the conquest and seignory of that country. Hereat the Consul said, That he accepted their wordsfor a presage of good fortune, and thereupon in that very place he pitched his Ients. The E next day he went as far as Gordum: a town verily it is none of the greateft, but more frequented and reforced unto for traffique and merchandife, then usually such dry towns are that stand far within the land. Three feas there be triangle-wife, of equal distance all from it. On the coast toward Sinope, it hath Hellefont and the shores of the other tract, whereas the Cicilians inhabit by the fea-fide. Moreover, it bordereth upon the confines of many great nations, who for their mutuall need and commodity, have commerce of negotiation, and meet together in that one place... This cown at that time they found altogether dispeopled, by reason that the inhabitants were fled for fear; but well flored, and full of wares and goods of all forts. Whiles the Romans lav there encamped, there came Embassadors from Eposlognatus, reporting unto them, that he had made a journey to the Princes of the Gauls, but could obtain no reason at their hands: allo. that they were dislodged out of the champain country. had quit their villages and lands ingreat numbers, and together with their wives and children drave before them and carried with them what loever they could and were retired to to the mount Olympus, from whence they purposed to defend themiel es by force of arms and the firong fituation of the place. The Embaliadours likewife of the Oroundians, gave mose certain intelligence to wit, That the whole people in generall of the To istobograms had seized the hill Olympus; that the Tectolages severally by themselves had taken another mountain called Magana; that the Trocmians, had committed their wives and children to the guard of the Tectofages, minding with a main army to aid the Tolifohogians. Now arthur time the Pfinces of those three States were Orgingo Combalomarus, and Gaulotas, or And the principally reason and means that these had to enterprise war, G was this, That being possessed of the highest hills of that country, and having brought thither provision of all things to serve them for a long space, they supposed to weary and wear out their enemies in process of time. For this account they made, that they would never venture to march against them; through so hard, so difficult; and disadvant secous places; and if they affiled to do they might be empeached; repulled back and beatendown with a imall comhany: again, if they would fit fill in leaguer at the foot of those frozen mount ins and do nothing, they were neverable to endure the cold and the fearcity which they should find there.

And not withstanding the very altitude and height of the places defended them. yet over and be. H fides they cast a tren.h, and made other defences round about the tops of the mountains which they held. Also for provinion of darts and other shot, it was the least of all their care, supposing that the rough places would furnish them with sufficient store of stones to sing. The Containing casting in his mind that he should not deal with these enemies close at hand-fight, but ataroff when he was to affail their holds, had made provision aforehand of great flore of darts, light relitary javelins, arrows, bullets of lead, and imail ftones that might be levelled and ient out offings Thus being well appointed and furnished with such kind of shot, he led his army toward the mountain Olympus, and about five miles off he encamped. The next day he together with Attalus advanced forward with 500 men of arms to view the nature and tranding of the mountain together with the fituation of the Gauls camp. But the enemies horsemen being double in number to them, issued out of their camp, and put them to flight, flew a few of them in the rout, and hun many. The third day he fet forward with all his forces to discover the places, and by reason that there came not one of them out of their defences and fortifications, he rode round about the moun. tain in fafety at his pleasure, and perceived that on the South-fide, there were certain little hils. all of of clean earth without stones, and the same rising up with an easte ascent to a certain place but to the North were high rocks and the same in manner sleep upright. And whereas all the reli were inacceffible, three on y waies and advenues he found, the one directly toward the midt of the mountain (where those little mounts of earth stood) the other two were difficult the one lying Southeast, and the other Northwest. After he had considered and viewed these places that day, he pitched his camp at the very root and foot of the hill. The morrow after he factified and K finding by the first beat's which he killed that the gods were pacified and favourable unto him he divided his army into three battaillons, and so advanced against the enemy, and himself in person with the greatest part of his forces, mounted up the hill, whereas it yielded the earlest af ent. He commanded his brother L. Marlius, from the Southwest to get up the hill as the place would permit with fafety, giving him in charge that if he met with any dangerous places fleep and hard of accent, that he should not wrestle with the difficulties of the ground, nor strive against those things, which to for e and overcome were unpossible; but rather to traverie the ground, and retire toward him, and to to joyn with his battaillon. As for C. Helvius he willed him with a third part of the forces to wheel about by little and little, and fetch a compais at the hill foot and the from the Northwest to mount up Likewise the aids of Accelus, he divided into three equal pans, [and took order that the young Prince himself in person should keep with him. The Cavalry and the Elephants he left in the next downs beneath the hills, and charged the Captains thereofto have a carefull eye and good regard to mark what was done in every place, yea, and to make halte to refeue and fuccour wherefoes er need should be. The Gauls making full reckoning that on two fides they were fure enough, and the place that way to be inaccessible; becau e they would thop the other advenue by for e of arms on the South fide, fent forth about four thousand armedmen to seize upon a certain hiel within a mile of their camp, which hill commanded the way, suppofing there, as from a fi one and fortrels to debar them of passage. Which when the Roman perceived they put themsel exinteradiness to fight. A pretty space before the ensigns, mathetithe skirmishers, together with the Candiot archers and slingers from Analas; likewise the Triballi- M ans of Thrace. The engigns of the tootmen tollowed foftly after (as well as they might) against the hill, bearing their targets before them fo, as they feemed to cover themselves only to avoid the shot and meant not to enter into any fight hand to hand. The fight at first was equally performed with shot a good distance off: for as the Gauls got the advantage of the ground, so the Roman had the odds for variety and store of datts. But as the skirmish continued and encreased, there was no more equality icen. For the shields of the Gauls being made long, and not broad enough for their bodies, and wi hall flat and plain without, hardly covered and defended them: and by this time all their shot was spent : & weapon had they nonebut their very swords, whereofther was no use at all considering the enemy came not to close fight. The only help they had was with stones, and those too big for their handling, and not case to weild by reason they were not pro- N vided before, but such as in that haste came next to their hand without any choice. Moreover, being not used and exercised to flinging, they had neither the artificiall fleight, nor you find firength to help themselves withall: but contrariwise, from all parts were pelted with bullets of lead and galled with arrows & daits at unawares, which they could neither ward nor moid and for that with anger & fear together their wits & understandings were blinded, they wish not what to do feeing themselves surprised and overtakening kinds of fight whereunto they were least of all fitted. For as in close conflict hand to hand, where blows are dealt, where raps are given and taken enterchangeably, choler kindleth courage: even fo, when men are wounded aloof with light dams &from whence they know not they wet not upon whom to run &at whom to make in that blind fit of theirs but they tu n upon their own fellows without all reason as a venture like wild beals o galled with arrows flicking in their fides. Now, they receive not a wound but it is feen by realist that they fight naked, and their bodies are fai efficie and white, as being never bare but in bandle by which means greater store of bloud gusht out of the wounds in their sleshy hodies, thege-Thes appear greater and their white-kin much more flained with block bloud. But they pals not fo much for broad & wide Hafhes (for otherwhiles when the skin is cut away & the wound ruhet broad than deep, they take more paids therein, & thinkshey fight wish greater honor. Mary it is

A happen at any time, that an arrow head or a bullet tlicking within the flesh all hidden, put them to pain and corment, notwithstanding the hurt be fmail in appearance, yet when they feek to pluck out an arrow, and the head will not follow, then they take on and are trark mad, for shame that so small a prick should plague them so, and be ready to kill them, insomuch as they cast themseives on the ground, and lie wallowing along every where. Others there be of them that ran full upon their enemy, and those were sticked with arrows and dates from all parts & when they came near to hand, were by the skirmishers killed and cut in pieces with their swords. These souldiers use to cover themselves with a shield of three soot long, carrying in their right hand certain spears to use aloof, and wear by their fide a Spanish sword. Now in case they come to hand fight they shift their freat out of their right hand into the left, and take them to their fwords. By this time there were B but few of the Gauls left alive; who perceiving that the light armed skirmishers of the enemies were too good for them & seeing withall the ensigns of the legions to approach near unto them. took them to their heels on all hands, and began to flie amain toward the camp; which now was full of fear and trouble, as where women and children and a multitude of feeble folk (not fit to bear arms) were crowded and thronged together. The Romans following the train of their victory, leized the hils abandoned by the enemies that were fled. About the same time L. Manlimand C. Helvius, having mounted io far as they could find way, traverfing the fides of the hills when they were come to an end, where they could see neither way nor path, they turned to that quanter of the hill which only afforded a way, and both of them began to follow the Confuls battaillon, a pretty distance as under, as if they had agreed beforehand so to do : and that which at first Chad been simply the best thing to be done, they were of necessity forced at last to put in executi on For in such difficulties and places of disadvantage, succours behind in a rereward, have oftentimes served in right good stead: that if those in the vanguard should chance to be beaten back; they in the second place might receive and protect them, and also begin freshly a new fight. A ter that the formost engns of the legions were come to those hills; which the light armed before had seized, the Consul commanded the souldiers to rest them awhile and breath themselves, and shewed them withall where the bodies of the Gauls lay dead along all over the mountains. And if (qd,he) the light armed skirmishers have made such a riddance of them, what is to be looked for at the hands of the legionary fouldiers, atmed all over in compleat harness? What will they do that carry the hearts of most noble warriors? Surely they must needs win the camp, into which D the enemy is chaled and driven by the light armed fouldiers. Howbeit he commanded the light armed to go afore, who all the while that the legions rested themselves, spent not the time in vainbut emploied it in gathering together the darts and javeling that lay about the hills, to the end that they might have inflicient shot. Now the Romansmarched forward and approached the camp. The Gauls likewise for their parts searing lest their desences would not be able to desend them, flood armed before their trench and rampier. But afterwards being overcharged with all fores of dates, they were driven in the turning of an hand within their hold, (for the more they were in number; and the thicker they stood, the less lighted any dart in vain) only they lest strong guards about the gates and entrance into the camp. Moreover, among the multitude which was driven into the hold, there was discharged at random a mighty number of darts : and that many of them were hurt thereby, appeared by their cry mingled with the thrikes of women and children. Now against them that warded the gates, and took up the avenues with their guards the legionary fouldiers in the forefront let flie their javelins. And albeit these were not wounded in their bodies, yet by reason that their shields & bucklers were pierced through, they were most of them entangled one within another, and stuck fast Long they could not abide the violence of the Romans, infomuch as before that the victors could enter into the camp, the Gauls fled forth at all the gates wide open, and ran they wist not whither like blind men, as well through places which had no way, as those that were paffable. No rocks so steep with downfals, no cliffs so rough with crags, could fand in their way: and nothing feared they affront; their enemies only at their heels affighted them. And therefore most of them either fell headlong down a mighty height and brake their necks, or elie for very feebleness lost their breath, were windless, and ready to die. The Col. after he had taken their camp, would not fuffer it to be ranfacked, but commanded the fouldiessevery one to follow the chase hard; and whiles the enemies were thus affraid, to affright them throughly. Then came the other regiment with L. Marling, but the Corful would not suffer them to enter the camp, but sent them forthwith to pursue the enemies. Himself also in personanon afterfollowed; when he had delivered the charge of keeping the prifoners, unto the military Tribunes of the army: for this reckoning and refolution he made, that the war was at a finall end, if in this unultuous fright of theirs he might either kill or take prisoners a number of them. The Conful was no fooner departed, but C. Helvius came with his third regiment, but he could not hold his fouldiers from the pillage of the camp, infomuch as the booty and prizes were most unjuffly dealt among them who were at no end of the skirmith. The Cavalry flood all this while fill and wift not of the fight, or that their fellows had gotten the victory : but afterwards they also elpying the Gauls dispersed about the root of the mountains, made after them as well as their hories would mount against the hils: some they slew, and others they took prisoners. The just number of those that were slain cannot easily be counted, because they sled far and near among the cranks and windings of the mountains, where they were killed in blind corners, Many of them befides, having engaged themselves to the crags and rocks that had no way forspeciall modesty and rare sobriery. There remained yet entire and whole the war with the Tectofages, against whom the Conful made an expedition, & upon the third day arrived at Ancyra, a noble City in those parts, from whence the enemies were little more than ten miles distant. During the time that he lay theremcamped there hapned a memorable act, performed by a captive Lady. Among many more prilo. ners there fortuned to be kept in ward, the wife of Octiagon, a woman of iurpaffing beauty, The Centurion who had her perion in fafe custody, was lecherous and coverous withall, as many of v thele touldiers are Her he follicited and tempted first to commit folly: but seeing her altogether unwilling, and that the abhorred to profittute her felf unto him, he did violence uponthat body of hers, which fortune had made bond and thrall unto him. But afterwards to mollifie and al fwage the indignity of this villany, he put the woman in good hope, and promifed that the should return home again to her friends: mary, he would not do all for pure love alone and freely without ranfom, for he bargained to have a certain fum of gold besides. And to the end forsooththat no person belonging to him might take knowledge thereof, he permitted her to send one of the prisoners whom she would her self-as messenger to her friends and kinsfolk, and appointed a place near unto a river, whither the next night following should repair two and no more (offer faid captive Ladies friends, with the gold above (aid) for to receive her at his hands, It fell on to L that among the rest of the captives committed to his guard, there was a bondslave of heromi this messenger at the shutting in of the evening the Centurion conducted without the comide guard. The morrow night after came accordingly to the place appointed both the two iriends foretaid of the gentlewoman, and also the Centurion himself with his prisoner, where they sheard the gold, amounting to the full sum of one Artick talent (according as it was agreed between them Jand with that the woman spake unto them in her language and commanded them todaw their fwords, and kill outright the Centurion as he was weighing the gold. Which done the caused his head to be stricken off, and wrapped it her self within her garment, and so canted it home to her husband Ortiagon, who from Olympus had fled and escaped to his own home. But before that the clipped and embraced her husband, the threw down the Centurion his head at M his feet. And when he wondred what mans head it was and what act this might he for pellinga womans deed, the confessed to her husband the injury that her body had suffered and likewik the revenge for the abuse of her chastity by force and violence: and (as it is reported) she maintained the honour of this matronlike act ever after even to her dying day, in all fanctimony of life and modest carriage of herself like a chaste dame.

Whiles the camp lay at Ancyra, the Orators of the Techolages shewed themselves not the Conful, requesting him not to dislodge and remove from thence before he had parled with their Lords and Princes: faying withall, that they would accept any conditions of peace whatever, rather than war. The time was fet down, even the next morrow, and a place likewise appointed, as just in the mid way (as it could be guested) between the camp and Anorra, The Cof, thinker cane N me the hour affigued, accompanied with a gu rd of five hundred horfe: but perceiving no Gallat all there, he returned into the camp. And thither repaired the same Orators unto him the second time, excusing the default, and saying that their Princes could not come in person by occasion of some scruple of conscience that arose the while; howbeit, the chief personages beside of the whole nation should appear by whom all matters might be composed as well as with themselves. The Conful made answer, that he likewise would send Attalm in his stead. So they came to this emparling from both parts. Att also had three hundred men of arms about him for his guard: and certain conditions of peace were drawn and propounded: but forasmuch as they might not gow to any finall conclusion in the absence of their chief Commanders, accorded it was that the day following the Conful and their Princes aforesaid should meet in that place together, Nowth 0 drift of the Gauls in making these delaies and trisling off the time, was this, that first they might gain some convenient space to transport over the river Halys all that ever they had which they would not hazard with their own persons, together with their wives and children) and allerwards to lay a train of an ambush for the Conful himself, who took small regard, and was not provided for to prevent their villany intended under the colour of that conference, For that pupole they choic a thousand horsemen out of all their cavalry, of especiall valour and approved hardi-

A nels, for the execution of this treacherons delign. And furely this their fraud had taken effect, if fortune had not defended and maintained the law of nations, which to break and violate they had complotted. Certain fouldiers of the Romans fent out to purvey forrage and fewel, were directed to those very quarters whereas the parly abovesaid should be kept. The Colonels thought it the mer place for them, because they were to have the Consuls guard also opposed for their defence against the enemy : howbeit, they fer another corps de guard of their own, confisting of coo hortmen nearer to the camp. Now by reason that Attalm affured the Conful so certainly, that their Princes would come, and that the matter might be toon knit up and dispatched, he departed out of the camp with the same guard of horsemen as before, and when he had marched almost five miles forward, and was not far short of the place appointed, he discovered all of a sudden the n Gauls riding in full gallop against them in most furious manner as enemies; wherupon he staid the march and made a stand: commanding the horsemen to make ready their weapons and resolve to fight The first charge and shock he received right valiantly; and stepped not back one foot : but afterwards as the multitude pressed still upon him, he began to give ground and retreat, but so as he brike not the ranks of his troops. But in the end, when they found more danger in longer stay, than commodity and help in keeping their arraies, they all at once turned their horic heads and fled. When they were difarrated once, the Gauls purited hard and killed them: and no doubt a great part of them had died for it, but that the forragers guard of 600 horie aforesaid came in to refcue them. For they hearing afar off the fearful cry of their fellows, made ready their armor and hores, and being fresh & in heart, entred upon the fight that was given over by their wearied and Cdikomfited companions: whereupon fortune quickly changed, and the fear turned from the lolers to the winners; for at the first encounter the Gauls were put to flight: and withall, the faid forragets and feweliers came running out of the fields, and from all parts made head and affronted the Gauls; infomm has they could neither flie readily not escape surely, because the Romans with their fresh horses followed them in chase, and they themselves were already tired: few therefore wentaway with life, and not one was taken priloner, for the greater part by ods paid dearly by the loss of their lives for violating of this their parly under the colour of truth and fidelity. The Romans whiles their stomacks were inflamed with anger, the very next day came against them with the pullance of all their forces. But the Cof, employed two whole daies himfelf in viewing and discovering the situation and nature of the hill because he would not be ignorant of anything re-Dquift, Upon the third day, after he had first taken the anspices and presages of the birds, and afterwards killed a facrifice, he led forth his army divided into 4 battaillons. Two of them were to mount up the midft of the hill & the other two he fet in the fides to flank the wings of the Gauls, and to march up against them. The Tectolages and Trocmions, who were the wholeflower and fireigh of the enemies, made their main battel in the midft, confifting of 50000 men; and because therewas no use of horse among those rough & uneven rocks, the cavalry alight on foot to the number of 10000, and those they put in the right wing. The Cappadocians with Ariarates, & the auxiliary Morzians, who arole to the number almost of 4000 men, held the left. The Cof. (like as before in the mount Olympus) marshalled his light armed for skirmish in the forestront of the vangard, to gave order to have ready at hand as great flore of darts & other shot of all forts as he had E before When they approached one another, all things answered both of the one fide & the other, like as in the former conflict laving that the courage of the victors increased in regard of their fortunat fuccels & the hearts of the enemies were much abated and danted. For albeit themselves had not yet been foiled & vaquished, yet they took the overthrow & loss of their countrimen for their own And therefore as the beginning of the battell was surable, so the issue was likewise. For the Ganls battell was overspread & covered again as it were with a cloud of light shot. And not one of them durit run forth out of his range for fear he should discover his whole body & lay it open to take all that came : and keeping still together as they did, the thicker they stood, the fairer mark they were for the enemies to level at & the more wounds they received. The Cof perceiving they were already of themselves troubled, and supposing that if he set forward & presented unto them the entigns of the legions, they would immediatly all of them flie, received the light armed loose though the reft of the auxiliary fouldiers within his own ranks and files, and then advanced his legions. The Gauls affrighted with the fresh temembrance of the late defeat and overthrow of the Tolinobogians, cartying also about themselves the darts sticking in their bodies, weary besides with long flanding afoot, and overcharged likewife with many a wound, could not abide fo much as the ones and thous of the Roman legions. Then began they to take their heels and flie toward their camp, but few of them recovered it, and got within the rampier and other defences. The gracer number, fled here and there on both hands,, and dispersed themselves into all parts ash took them in the head, and as every man in this confused fright caught a way by himfelf. The Conglerors followed them Will even hard to the very camp, and all the way charged upon their Gbacks and beat them down. Which done, they Raid and fluckfill in the camp for defire of pilage and these was not one that followed one foot after. The Gauls in the wings flood to it longer, by realon that it, was later stethey were fer upon but able they were not to abide the first charge and hos of the Roman states. The Conful, who could not possibly pluck those our of the camp that were once entreday, for sreediness of spoiling and rifling the tents, sent our those immediatly that were in the wings to follow the enemies in chale still forward. These purioed them a certain space: howbeit in this flight, (for in truth it was no fight stall) there were not above eight thoufand that left their carcafies bushed them; all the rest recovered the other fide of the fiver Hair. It Many of the Romans remained that night within the enemies camp: the rest the Consul brough back again to his own. The next day he took account and survey of the prisoners which was fo great as a man would conceive that a nation of all others most greedy of pilling and spoiling might possibly rake and heap together for so many years, as they held all those parts with in the mountain Tansma by force of arms. The Gauls thus scattered inflight, rallied themselves to one place, as being many of them burt or disarmed, and stripped clean out of all they had sent their Embassadors unto the Consul to treat for peace. The Consul willed them to give attendance upon him at Ephejus: himself made hatte to remove out of those cold quarters, by reason that the mountain Tansma was so near (for now it was the midst of Antumn) and led back his victorious army to pass the winter near the seafide.

Whiles the affairs thus passed in Asia, all was quiet in the rest of the Provinces, At Romethe Censors T. Quintim Flaminims and M. Claudiu Marcellus made a new choice of Senators: and P. Seipto Africanus was chosen the President of the Senat now the third times four only were let out and discarded is but not one of them had born office of State, and had the honour to stin the Curule chair. The Censors shewed themselves likewise passing mild in the review of the Caraly and order of Knighthood. They put out to framing the foundations and ground works upon the Aquimelium in the Capitall: and likewise they bargained for to pave the street with hard sine or pebble from the gate Capenato the Temple of Mart. The Campans demanded of the Senat, in what place they should be affested and entoiled: and thereupon a decree passed for their enrollment at Rome. The rivers were out, and great deluges happed that year. The Tyber overshowed its banks twelve times, and drowned Mars field and all the low parts of the City.

After that Cn. Manlins the Conful had brought the Gauls war to an end in Afia, theother Coniul M. Fulvius having utterly jubdued the Ætolians passed over into Cophalenia; and sento all the Cities about the Mand certain messengers, to found them whether they would rather ried chemielves unto the Romans or hazard the fortune of war? And fo forcible was fear among them allathan there was not one person refused to surrender. And being enjoyned (according to the alllity of the people who were but bare) to give hollages, the Neffores, Craniens, Peleuhans, and Se means delivered twenty apiece. This pear e no tooner shone upon the Cephalenians beyond their expectation, but tuddenly one City of the Sameans revoited, and upon what cause it is me known : themselves alledged and taid. That for a for a stheir City was leated in a commoding place they leared greatly to be dispossessed and turned out of it by the Romans, But whether the only imagined this and pur themselves in fright, and so changed their quiet and repose for an and foolith fear: or whether there had been question hereof among the Romans, and upon made canvaffing in mens mouth the rumour of luch a matter, ran unto them, it is not certainly known, Only thus much, after they had given their holtages, they flut their City gates upon a fidden; and defift they would not from their enterprise, for all the entreaty and prayers that their ont hostages made, whom the Consul had sent (on purpose) even under their walls, to more their countrimen and parents to pity and compassion. When as therefore they would make no anfwer tending unto peace, the Conjul began to affault the City: and all the ordnance of anilary and engins of battery were under his hand, which had been brought from the fiege of Ambracia, M And look what works and fabricks were needfull befides to be made, the fouldiers with great dil gence and forwardness performed. So in two places at once they planted rams against the City and battered the walls. The Samzans on the other fide for their part omitted and neglected nothing, that might either annoy the enemy or impeach the works. But two things there were principally wherewith they made relitance and withstood their violence: the one was,a countrmure within the City, which they ever railed new inflead of the old & ful as flrong as it was that was demolished and broken down: the other was their often sudden sallies, one while pool the fortifications and fabricks, otherwhiles upon the corps de guard of the enemies ; and for the most part in these skirmishes they had the better hand. But one mean there was devised, and the same of small shew to speak of, to restrain and keep them in from fallying forth. The Ro-N mans fent to * Ageum, * Para, and * Dima, for an hundred flingers. These nations from their childhood aied to exercise themselves (after the manner of the country) to discharge out of slings into the open fea certain roundstones, which commonly the shore is overspread with among the fands: by reason of which exercise, they have more skillboth to fling fambe from them, and also to firike more furely and give a smarter rap and firoke than those of the Baltat Islands: for their sling is not made with one only cord as the Balearians are, and those of other nations; but it hart three leather thongs hardned and made ftiff, with many futures and feames) lest if the leathering were fort and gentle, the bullet and stone within should wag to and sto and roll out in the delivery and hurling of it: but being fetled and counterpoiled (asit were) it went merrily away, and tent and driven out of the noofe of a flone-bow. And fo well probled they were in this feat; that they could a great way off levell a bulket through garlands, tings, and broops of small compass, and miss not: nay, they would be sure to hit, not only the head of emenemy, but any part of the face that they aimed at, point blank, and never fail. Thek fligs (I fay) made the Summans to pluck in their heads, that they durit not fally out neither looten non to boldiy as they did. Informuch as from the walls, they requested the Acharans for while to go afide and repose themselves, and see them how they skirmished with the copie quant

A of the Romans. Four mousths/space the Same ans endured the siego. Now when of that small number which they had, some or other daily drope away; and were either killed outright or wounded; and they that remained, were bookeyred in body, and danted in courage; the Romans one night passed over the wall, by the fortree; which they call the safe for the City where it boundeth upon the Sealyeth toward the Weit) and entred to far as the market place. After that the Sameans perceived that one part of the City was taken by the ententies, they fied with their wives and children into a greater fortress, and the next day yeelfed: the Town was ransacked, and they themselves were all fold in open market; to who would give most.

The Conful having fer the state of Gephalema in good order, and put a garrison within Samea. paffed into Peloponn-fus, having been called and fent for to come thither a long time, principally B by the figians and Lacedamonians. Time out of mind, and from the first beginning of the Diets of Achas, the whole nation used to assemble and meet at Sgium ordinarily, were it for to grace and honour the City, or because the place was commodious therefore, This ancient custome Phie lopamen that year began first to infringe, and went about to make a law and ordinance. That in all the Cities of Achas, their Councels and Diets shall be holden in course and order at their times. And against the coming of the Consul, when the Demiurges of the free Cities and states fummoned the Diet to be kept at Agium, Philopannen (Pretor for that time) came with a counme-fummons and proclaimed it to be held at Arger. And when it was evident to be feen, that they all in manner minded thither to refort; the Conful alfo (albeit in affection he favoured the Egians) came to Argos: where, after much debate, seeing the matter growing the other way, he defilted from his defign and gave over the cause. After this, the Laced amonians averted him from thence, and drew him away to the deciding of their controverties and diffentions. Certain banished persons they were who most of all disquieted and troubled that state: and many of them had their abiding place in the Cattles coafting along the frontiers of the Laconian tetritory toward the Sea, which was taken wholly from the City. The Lacedamonians much discontented and offended hereat, entred one night a certain borough called * Las, surprised it unawares to the in- * Pathi, hibitants, and kept it to their use; to the end, that if need were at any time to fend Embassadors to Rome or elfe whither, they might have some free access unto the Sea : and withal, be served of a mant-Town for vent, and a place of receit for all forrain merchandile from strangers to their necessary uses. The Townsmen within, as also the exiles aforesaid (there dwelling) were terrified at the first with this suddain and unexpected occurrence: but afterward (before day-light) when they had once railied themselves together, with small ado and skirmish chased forth the Lacedermonians: howbeit, the fear ipred over all the Sea coaft, so that in one general accord, the Castles and Villages every one, yea, and the exiled persons (as many as there inhabited) dispatched their Embassadors to the Acharans. Philopamen their Pretor (who ever from the beginning friended the cause of the banished, and had alwaies advised and counselled the Achaans to abate and take down the puissance and reputation of the Lacedamonians) granted them at their suit and seeking, a Diet. In which (upon a motion by him made) there passed a decree in this form: That whereas T. Quintlus and the Romans, had committed and delivered to the safeguard and protection of the Achaens, the fortreffes, burroughs, and villages, fituate along the Sea- coast of the Laconians, and (by vertue of a covenant and accord) the Lacedamonians had nothing to do therein, but ought to forbear them; and yet not with standing, the Town Las was by them forced. and a great maffacre there committed: therefore unless the principals and acceffaries both of that ourrage, were yeelded to the Achizans, they deemed the covenant and accord in that behalf provided, to be broken. Hereupon incontinently were Embassadors addressed to Lacedamon, to challenge and demand the parties abovefaid: but the Lacedzmonians took this for so proud a commandment, and thought it such an indignity, that without all doubt, if they had been in as good estate then, as sometimes they were, they would immediatly have taken arms. But nothing trombled and disquieted their spirits so much as this, for sear lest if once they received the yoke of hibjection upon their necks, in yeelding obedience to their first demand, Philopamen would effect and put in execution that which he long intended and went about; even to deliver the City Lacedamon into the hands of the banished aforesaid. Enraged therefore with choler and anger, they fell upon thirty of that faction who were complotted in counsel with Philopamen and the triles, and flew them out-right; and withal made a decree, To renounce and reject all fociety with the Achaems; and forthwith to fend their Emballadors to Cephalenia, with commission, to deliver Lacedamon nunto M. Fulvina and the Romans; and to beleech him to take the pains to comeinto Pelopounesus, thereto receive the City Lacedamon under the obeisance and protection of the people of Rome. When the Embastadors had made relation hereof to the Achaens, pretemly war was proclaimed against the Lacedzmonians by common consent of all the states of that sembly and general councel: but the winter impeached them for entring into any action and prefent execution. Howbeit they made small rodes into their frontiers, and wasted the same not only by Land, but also by Sea, after the manner of robbery and piracy, rather than of warlike howilling. These troubles drew the Cos, into Pelopomesas, and by his commandment a Diet was published to be holden at Elia: and thirther were the Lacedamonians sent forto argue and debate their cause. Where there was not only much reasoning and dispute, but also wrangling and alterthon. The Conful who in other points bare himself dicely enough, and answered in doubtful terms, as one willing to entertain both parts, determined and ended the controverse in one only word, warning them both to put up their fwords, and lay arms afide, until they had feat their En. H basiladors to the Senate of Rome. So there were embassages addressed both from the one and the other to Rome. In likewife the hanished Lacedamonians joined their cause and embassly with the Achans, Diophane and Lycertas, both Megapolitans, were the chief in the embassage of the Acha ans, who as they jarred and disagreed in the managing of State-affairs, so they accorded nothing varied in the speeches that they delivered Diophanes referred the decision of all matters unto the Senat as who were best able to compose all controversies between the Achaans and Lacedamonians. But aycortas, infiructed by Philopamen, required that the Achaens might do and execute what loever they had ordained, according to the covenant, and the conditions therein comprised and that they would maintain their full liberty without abridging and empairing the fame according as they had received it at their hands. The nation of the Achans in those daies was in great I credit and reputation at Rome, howbeit the Senate thought it not good to make any change and alteration in the State of the Lacedamonians. In conclusion, they returned such an intricate and doubtful answer; that both the Achaans might confirme it, as if they had permission and free liber. ty to do what they would with Lacedamon, and the Lacedamonians again took it as though they had not so large a scope and absolute power allowed them, as to do their pleasure in every thing But this authority and liberty whatfoever it was, more or lefs, the Achaans thretched beyondall measure and compass, and used it too proudly and infolently. Philopamen continued fill implace of foveraign government, and levied a power to be ready in the beginning of the fpring, and fo encamped upon the frontiers of the Lacedamonians. This done, he fent his Embaffadors to demand the delivery of them into his hands, who were the authors of the revolt; proming withil, & that if they would so do, their City should remain in peace without any molestation, and they said fer and fustain, no harm, before they had answered for themselves in open audience. All the reft for fear kept, filence and faid not a word, only they whom he had challenged by name, made offer of themselves to go, under safe conduct received from the Embassadors, and faithful promiethat no violence should be done upon their persons, until they had pleaded their answer. Accompanied they were with divers noble personages of great mark and name, both as advocats unto them in their particular quarrels, and alto in regard of the Common-weal, as far as their private caule any way touched and concerned it. Never had the Achaans before time brought the Lacedamo nian exiles with them into the confins of Lacedemon, because they supposed that nothing might so much alienate and effrange the hearts of the whole City as that. But then the whole head and I were, of the yanguard, were no other but those banished persons. And as the Lacedamoniana boyefaid were coming, who should meet and affront them arranged in order of battel at the un gate of the camp, but they? At the first they welcomed them with childing and railing, after that they fell to bitter words and braus, and their bloud was up on both fides, intomuch astholeof the banished crew who were of hottest spirit and sharpest metal, made no more ado but ran upon: the Lacedamonians: whereupon they called the Gods to witness, and cried to the Emballadors for protection; who together with the Pretor himself came between, voided the press, and lakeguarded the persons of the Lacedamonians, empeaching and staying some of their hands who were already about to bind them and make them fure. But the tumult fill encreased, and the multitude was all up on a hurrey. The Achaens ran first to see only what the matter was and to M belookers on. But afterwards, when the exiles began with a loud voice to cry out, and report what wrongs and injuries they had fulfained, befeeching them of their help, and avouthing with all right confidently, that if they let flip this opportunity, they should never have the like agus, alledging moreover, That the league first made in the Capitol, after remued at Olympia, and lattof all confirmed by a facred oath in the Caffle of Athens, had been broken and disamiled by them, and therefore the guilty and culpable parties were to be punished accordingly before they ented into any bond of new accord. At these words the multitude was incensed, and by occasion of one mans voyce, who cried to firike and knock them down, fell to flinging flones at them. Andby this means seventeen of them, who during the garboil chanced to be tied in bonds, were slowed to death. The rest, to the number of six and thirty, were the next morrow apprehended, whom N the Pretor had shielded and protected from violence, not for any defire he had to savetheir lives, but because he would not have them miscarry and perish before they were heard. These were presented and exposed as a prey to the unruly and angry multitude: and when they had made some imall speech unto them, from which they turned away their ears, they were all condemned and delivered over to be led to execution. When the Lacedemonians were once put in this fear, then they were commanded, Imprimis, To demolish and break down their walls. Item, That all forrain auxiliary fouldiers, who were waged and served for pay under the tyrants, should avoid out of the Laconian countrey. Item. That all the flaves whom those tyrants had fet free (and of finth there was a great number) should depart before a certain day; and that it might be lawful for the Achaens to attach the bodies, to fell and carry away as many as staied and remained behind 0 Item, That they should abolish the laws, ordinances and customs of Lycnigus, and frame them felves to live after the fashions and manners of the Achaens, for so they should be incorporate into one civil body, and better accord and fort together in all things. They condescended to none of all these conditions more willingly and sooner, than to the rasing of their walls; and nothing troubed them somuch and vexed their heart, as the restoring of the banished persons, Howbett there passed an act at Tegea for their restitution in a general Councel of all the Achamsthere beld.

In which affembly, upon a report and mention made, that the mercenary strangers above specified, and the new unrolled Lacedamonians called Aferipti (for fo they termed them, who by the typings were enfranchised and endued with freedom) had abandoned the City, and were departed fundry water into the countrey, it was thought good before the army was diffolved and caffed, that the Pretor should go with a company lightly armed and appointed to lay hold upon all that fort of people, and make tale of them, as of a prize and hooty gained from the enemies. Many of them were apprehended and fold. And with the money raifed of them, that porch or Gallery at Megalopolis, which had been ruinate by the Lacedamonians, was by the permission of the Achaans reedified. Likewise the territory of Belbina, which the Lacedamonian tyrants unjustly held in possession, was laid again to that City, according to an old decree of the Achaens, which was made during the reign of King Philip, fon of Amyuras. The City of the Lacedamonians by this means much enfeebled, continued a long time in subjection and thraldom under the Achaens. But their State received damage by no one thing so much, as by the abolishing of the discipline of Lycurges, to which they had been used and accustomed for the space of 700 years.

Presently after the holding of this Diet, wherein the Acheans and Lacedamonians debated their causes before the Conful, M. Fulvim repaired to Rome (for that the year was almost expired) against the solemn election of new Magistrats; wherein he created for Consuls, M. Valevini Meffala, and C. Livius Salinator, and gave the repulle to M. Emplius Lepidus his enemy, who that year made fuir also to be Conful. This done, there were Pretors also chosen, to wit. O. Martin Philippus, M. Claudius Marcellus, C. Stertinius, C. Catinius, P. Claudius Pulcher, and C. Lu. Manlius Acidinus. When this election was ended, it was thought expedient that M. Fulvius should return into his former Province to the army there : and not only he, but his colleague also Cn. Manling, had their commission revived, and they continued in government another year. The fame year according to the direction of the Decemvirs, there was brought into the Temple of Herentes the statue of the same God: and within the Capitol were set up by Cn. Cornelius fix fleeds in gold drawing a charjot with this inscription. That he being Conful gave that present. Allo F. Clanding and S. Sulpisius Galba, Ediles Curule, hung up twelve brasen shields, made of the fines that sertain corn-hoorders paid, for hoording up and keeping in their grain. Moreover Q. Fulvius Flacous an Ædile of the Commons, esceted two golden images raited of the mony that one gulky person was condemned in florthey commenced their actions severally by themselves.) Asfor A Cecilius his companion, he condemned none. The Roman great games were fet forth al throughout, thrice : and the Plebeian plaies exhibited likewife full and whole, five times.

After this, M. Valerius Meffala and C. Livius Salinator, entred their Confulfhip upon the * 15, day of March, and proposed before the Senat as concerning the affairs of the State, touching their Provinces also, and the armies. As for Etolia and Asia, there was no change at all. The Conful, by a decree of the Senat had the charge, one of Pifa, together with the Ligurians; and the other of Gail: and they were commanded either to agree between themselves, or to cast lots for their Provinces. They were enjoyeed also to levy new armies, and each of them to enrol two legions, and either of them to charge the allies of the Latine Nation with 15000 foot, and 1200 horsemen. Unto Messales lell the government of Liguria: and to Salinathr of Gaul. After this, the Pretors likewise cast lots for their Provinces the jurisdiction within Rome of citizens was allotted to M. Claudius, and of foramers to P. Chaidius. Sivily to Q. Martins, Sardinia to C. Stersinius, high Spain to L. Manlins, and the low to C. Minius. As for thearmies, ordained it was, that the legions under the conduct of C. Lalins should be withdrawn out of Gaul, and made over to M. Tuccini the Propretor for to ferve in the Brutians country. Item, That the forces which were in Sicily thoused be discharged: and that M. Sempronius the Vice-pretor there, should bring from thence the fleet to Rome. Ordained likewife it was, that either of the Provinces of Spain should have one legion, which at that time ferved there; and that both the Pretors should for supply levy of the allies three thouland foot, and two hundred horlemen apiece, and transport the fame over with them. Now before that these new Governors went to their Provinces, by order from the whole colledge and fociety of the Decemvirs, there was published a general procession and supplication to be holden for 3 dayes in all the quarrefours or cross streets of the City : for that in the diy time between the third hour and the fourth, there arose a general darknes which continued almoffell that while. Moreover, a Novenchat facrifice was published to be celebrated for 9 dayes together because on the Aventine hill it had rained stones.

The Campans, when sethe Ceriors by vertue of an act of Senate which passed the former year completed them to be enrolled in Robes (for aforetime they knew not where to be enroled) mide pertition from that they might contract marriages and take Roman citizens to their wires and that whipidever had wedded any of them before, might keep them fill; and what children toever they had born before that day, should be reputed legitimate and their rightfull cheire Both fuits were granted! As concerning thefree burgeffes of Formie, Fundiand Arpinum, Tappo a Troum of the Com preferred a bill, that they might be priviledged to give theffwolces in Rome: for Before thactime, citizens in deed they were of Rome, (and that was all) forlibeny of suffrages they had none. This bill was crossed and nipped by four other Tribuns, be-Panelir was propounded without the warrant and approparion of the Senate. But being afterwilds beiger advited and enformed; that it appertained to the people and not to the Senate to give their voices where it pleased them, they gave over their enterprise, and opposed themselves no more to hinder the proceeding thereof. So it passed; and enacted it was, That the Formians and Fundans should give their voices in the tribe Emplia; it the Arpinats in Cornelias in their tribes then not and never before, were they enrolled by an act of the same Valerius. McLusdin Marcellus the Centor took a survey of the City, and by lot obtained the pre-eminenteering the colleague 7. Quintus. In which there were numbered 258308 polls of Roman citizen, This review being act omplished, the Consuls took their journeys into their teveral province.

During that winter leason whiles these things thus passed at Rome, there resorted Embassages from all States, Civies and Nations which inhabit on this fide Taurus, unto Cn. Manlins fiell Con. inl, and afterwards Pro-contul, whiles he kept his winter in Afia. And as the victory atchieved over Antiochus was more honorable and glorious to the Romans, than that over the Gauls fothe conquest of the Gauls was more joyous and pleasing to the Roman allies, than that other of Antiochus. For the ferr itude in which the King held them was more tolerable, than the cruelty of these lavage and inhumane barbarians, and the doubtinl fear and fright wherein they flooderen day; as not knowing how far forth they would proceed, carried to (as it were) in a tempefitio walt and ipoil them clean. And therefore as nations who by the defeat of Antiochus recovered liberty, and by the subduing of the Gauls enjoyed peace, they presented themselves not only toging thanks and thew their contentment in that behalf, but also brought with them certain corongs of gold every one according to their ability. Likewise there came Embassadors from Amischu, a also from the very Gauss, to have conditions of peace ministred unto them: yea, and from Ariarates King of the Cappadocians, who craved pardon, and offred to buy out his treipals for money in that he had given aid unto Antiochus: and fined he was to pay 200 talents of filver. The Gauls had thi answer returned unto them, That K. Eumenes when he came should tender puto them articles of peace. The embassages of the other states and cities were dismissed with gracious answers, and went away better pleased and contented, than they were at their coming. The Embassadors of Annochus were commanded to bring mony into Pamphylia, and corn likewit according to the covenant made with L. Scipio: for thither the Confin purposed himself to a me with his army. After this, having taken a review and furvey of his forces, he let forward in the beginning of fpring, and within 8 daies arrived at Apamea. There he sojourned in camp for three daies: from thence he removed, and at the third daies end came to Pamphylia, whither he had given order to the Kings Embassadors to convey their mony and corn. There he received 1500 talents of the which were transported unto Apamea. The corn was divided in the army, From t thence he marched to Pergu, which was the only country in those parts held with a garrien, When he approached, the Captain of the garrifon met him on the way requesting to dates space in which time he might know the pleature of K. Antrochus as touching the rendring of that City. The time was granted and within that day the garrison quit the place and departed, I rom Pops he ient his brother L. Manlins with 400 fouldiers to Oroanda, for to demand the relt of the mon which by promite was due : and himself because he was advertised that K. Eumenes and the deptties or commissioners were come from Rome to Eph. Jus, ret red with his army also to Ephipu, and commanded the Embassischer of Antiochiu, to follow him thither. There, by the advice of the ten commissioners, a final league was concluded, and comprised in these or such like terms There shall be amity and friendship bet ween King Amiochus and the people of Rome, under the conditions entaing. Imprimes. The King shall not suffer to pass through any part of his realm, or ther countries that are under his dominion, any army that intendeth to make war against the people of Rome or their affociats, nor aid them with victuals or any other fuccour whatfoever. Item, The Romans and their allies shall do the like by Antiochus, and all those that are under his subjection, Item It shall not be lawful for Antiochus eitherto make war with those that inhabitthe lland or to pais over into Europe. Item, He shall quit all Cities, Lands, Villages, and Fortresses on the fide the mountain T. sers unto the River i anais; and moreover from the foot and valley met the faid hill, unto that ridge thereof which bendeth toward Lycaonia, Item, Out of those Tones, territories and Cattles which he is to void, he shall carry away no armour: and if he have conveyed from thence any aiready, he shall duly restore the same to every place accordingly, him He N shall receive neither fouldier nor any other perion out of the Kingdom of Eumenes. Item It any citizens belonging to those Cities which are dilmen bred and cut off from his realm, these to remain now with him they shall return all to Apameawithin a certain day. Item, As many say pertain to the Kingdom of Antiochus and are now with the Romans or their allies, my depart home or tary still at their pleasure. Item All slaves, whether they be fugitives or taken optive in war; likewife all other persons free of or dition before, and afterwards either taken piloners of revolted, he shall deliver again to the Romans and their allies. Item, He shall make delivery of all his Elephants, and shall provide him elf of no more hereafter. Item, He shall yeeld upall his Gallies of war, with the tackling to them belonging: neither shall he keep above ten small relies, and none of them shall have more than thirty oars to guide and row them; nor so much as 000,00 * Galley with a fingle bank of oars tolerve in any war that himself shall first begin. Item He shall not fail within the promontories of Calycadnum and Sarpedon, unless haply there be some highly bringeth mony, Embal'a jers, or hoftages. Item, It shall not be lawful for King Amiochus toky and wage any fouldiers out of thole nations which are subject to the people of Rome; no. 10110 entertain fo much as voluntaries from thence. Item What houles and edifices belonging to the Rhodians and their allies, are now within the precincts of the realm of Ansiochus, shall ream to the faidRhodians and their affociats, in as flood effate and tenor as they were before the war began. And if any mony or debts be to them due, they may demand and recover the same. Item, If ought have been taken from them, they shall have good law and right to learch, own, demand. and challenge it again. Item, If any of those Cities whi h ought to be rendred, be held by those now whom Antiochus hath committed them, he shall withdraw the garrisons from thence, and take order that they be furrended accordingly. Item, He shall pay within twelve years by even portions, 12000 Artick talents of good and lawful filver: provided, that every talent weigh no less than eighty pound after Roman polie; befides 540000 modil of wheat, Item, He shall pay unto King Eumenes 350 talents within five years; and for corn according to the rate and proportion 127 talents. Item, He shall fend unto the Romans 20 hostages, and change them for o-R thers every three years: provided, that they be not under 18 years of age nor above 45. Item, If any allies of the people of Rome, begin of their own motion to make war upon King Antiochus, it shall be la wful for him to revenge himself, and me forcible means to withstand their violence; vet fo, as he hold no City in right of war, nor receive any into amity : and all controversies which shall arise between them shall be decided by law and justice; or if both parties be so pleased they shall trie the iffue by force of arms. Item, it was comprised also within the covenants of this accord, That he should deliver into the Romans hands, Annibal the Carthaginian, Thoas the Etolian, Massimachus the Acarnanian, Eubulus likewise and Philo the Chalcidians, Finelly, if ought hereafter hapned to be added moreover, or changed otherwise the same in no case to prejudice any thing contained within the covenants aforelaid. To this accord the Conful sware; and c to receive the Kings oath likewise there went unto him Q. Minutius Thermus and L. Manlius, he who fortuned at that time to return from the Oroadians. And the Cof. wrote his letters to Q. Fab. Labeo Admiral of the fleet, presently to come to Patara, and what ships soever of the Kings were there, to hew them in pieces, and make a light fire of them. So he departed from Ephelus, and either brake into fitters or burnt, 50 covered ships belonging to the King. In the same voyage and exploit he surprised and won Telmessus, by reason that the Townsmen were so affrighted at the fiddain coming of the fleet. Thenforthwith he departed out of Licia, and having given order to those that were lest behind at Ephefus to follow after, he crossed the Seas (between the llands) over into Greece. After he had so journed some sew daies at Athens, until the ships from Ephelus were entred into the harbor of Pyraum: from thence he brought back his whole armado n to Italy. Cn. Manlius having received (among other things which were to be yeelded up of Antiochus) the Elephants also, and bestowed them all freely upon Eumenes, gave audience to the controverses of many Cities and States, amongst whom (during these changes and alterations) there arose sundry troubles and much variance. And Ariarates the King, who by the means and mediation of Eumenes (unto whom about that time he had affianced his daughter in marriage) was difcharged and had acquittance for the one moity of the mony imposed upon him entred into amity with the people of Rome. When the differences of the Cities aforefaid were debated and known, the ten Commissioners set down an order between them, respectively to their condition. To as many as had been tributaries to King Antiochus, and yet fided with the people of Rome in affection they granted franchise and immunity: but as many as took part with Antiochus, or were tributaries unto King Attalus, those were commanded to pay their customs and duties to King Eumenes. Moreover, they freed and exempted from all task and tallage (expresly by name) the Colophonians inhabiting Notium, together with the Cymeans ard the Milefians. Unto the Clazonemians (overand befides the same freedom) they gave the Iland Drymusa. To the Milesians also the territory called Sacer: to the Ilians, they annexed Rhateum and Gergithus, not so much for any fresh and lare deserts, as in memorial of their ancient beginning and foundation; which was the cause also that they set Dardanus free. Semblably the Chians, Smyrneans, and Erythræans, for their fingular loyalty and devoir which they shewed in that war they not only indowed with fair lands and territories but also graced with all kind of honor and reputation above the rest. Moreover the Phoceans had both their own lands restored unto them which they enjoyed before the war and also liberty to live under their ancient laws. As for the Rhodians, they had those things now confirmed and established unto them, which by a former decree were granted : and to better their estate, Lycia and Caria were bestowed upon them, as far as the River Maander, all save the City Telm ffus, Unto the dominion of King Eumenes, they laid Cherforefus in Europe; and Lyfithachia, with all the Caffles, Villiges, and Lands thereto belonging, in as large terms and ample minner as Antiochus held the same : also within Asia, the one and the other Phrygia, as well that which confineth upon Helleftont, as the other which they call the Greater. Moreover, they refored unto him Myfin, which King Prusias had taken from him : over and besides, Lycaonia, Mylia, and Lydia; together with these Cities by special name. Tralleis. Ephosus, and Telmossus. As touching Pamp'ylis, some debate there was between the Agents of Eumenes and the Embaffadors for Anti-chus because one part thereof is situat on this side the mount Taurus, and the other lyeth beyond. The decision of this controversy was wholly referred to the arbitrement of the Senat. Marlins having let down these covenants and decrees, departed with the ten Legates and all his amy toward Hell-spout; and when he had caused the Princes of the Gauls thither to repair before him, he de la ed junto them in what terms and under what conditions they should entertain peace with E mone: & therewith he gave them warning to leave their manner of in roding androving in hostile wife by force of arms, and to contain themselves within the precincts and bounds bounds of their own territories. After this, having gathered into one place all the veffels from u the Sea coalts, together with the entire flote of King Eumenes, which by his brother Atheneus was brought from Elea, he transported all his forces into Europe. From whence he marched through Chersonness by short & easy journies, because his army was heavily charged with pizes and booties of all forts; and encamped at Lysimachia, purposing there to reil a while totleend that his travelling beafts of draught and cariage, might be fresh and in good heart to pass through Thracia, which was a voyage and journey commonly feared and abhorted. The fame day that he dislodged from Lyfimachia, he came to the River which they call Melas, and from thence the next day to Crifela. When they were past Crifela, they had for ten miles almost no other way, but through wild woods, narrow fireights, and those rough withal and uneven underfoot. For the difficulty of which passage, the army was divided into two parts. The one helcommanded to march , before the other to come behind in the rereward a great distance after, and in the midst between he beltowed the carriages with bag and baggage, and amongst them were waggons and wains loden with the publick treasure, and other pillage of great price. As he thus marched through the fireight pass, there were about 10000 and not above, railed out offour nations of Asia, to wir, the Aftians, Canians Maduarenes, and Coeletes, who befet the fireights to debarthem of pallage, It was supposed that King Philip of Macedony his hand was herein, and that they entred not into this action without his privity and traudulent practile; who as he knew that the Romans could return no other way but by Thracia, so he was aware and wift well enough what a mass of money they carried with them. The Roman General himself was in the vanguard, careful only and troubled about the difficulty of the way. All this while the Thracians fat Hill and stirred not, until the armed fouldiers were passed by. But when they perceived once, that the vanguard was gotten out of the fireights, and that the rereward was far enough behind, they fell in hand with the packs and coffers of the carriages; and after they had killed the guards fome of them ranfacked and rifled that which was in the waggons, others led away the pack horses and other sumpter beasts with their load and burden on their backs. Hereupon arose a cry and alarm, and was first heard of thosether followed but afterwards of them also in the foreward, & so from both ends they ranto the midll. and at one time in diverte places, skirmished without all order consusedly. The Thracians heavily charged and encumbered with pillage, and most of them without any weapon at all, because they might have the use of their hands more nimble and agile to match & catch unto them their piles. were by this means more exposed to receive hurt, and foon killed. The Romans again were much diffressed and annoied through the difadvantage of the ground and the waies which the barbarous people were well enough acquainted with, and out of them would issue sonho encounter, and other whiles lurk within hollow blind caves, and not be feen. The very packs likewife and the waggons, standing and lying unto wardly in the way, sometime of one, and sometime of other (as it happed) troubled and hindred them much in their fight. So as here in one place lay the theef dead, there in another the true man that purfued him. And according as the plot of ground was good or bad, as well for the one fort as the other, as their hearts and courages and or failed them and as the number was more or less to the skirmish and fight was variable and in one word of both fides many a man fay in the dust and lost his life. By which time the night approached and the Thracians departed out of the conflict, not so much to avoid wounds and lotter u of death, as for that they had sped themselves sufficiently of prizes. The Roman vanguardenam. ped without the forrest in the open ground about the Temple of * Bendis. The rereward remined fill behind in the midft of the woods to guard their carriage, fortified within a double pallifado offiring stakes. The morrow after, when they had well discovered by their espials the way before them, they joined themselves with the vanguard. In this battel (over and befides a great parti their pillage loft, and a number of camp-followers and lackies flain, with some souldiers also, for that there was skirmishing every where throughout the chase) there died Q. Minutius Thermit and a right great loss there was of him for he was a man of much valour and execution. That day the army marched as far as to the River Hebrus. From whence they passed through the confins of the Enians, weer unto the Temple of Apollo, whom the inhabitants name Zerynthius, And there N they met with another fireight passage about a place called Tempyra, as rough and cumberloute under foot as the former. But for afmuch as there were no woods about it, it yeeldednogood plice for ambushes. Howbeit the Thrausians (a people likewise of Thrace) assembled together, hoping also to light upon the like booty. But by reason that the vallies lay naked and open so as if any be et the narrow waies they might be discovered a far off, the Romans were less affinitiand troubled. For, say that they were to fight in some place of disadvantage, yet they might arrange themselves in battel aray in open field, and join in close fight hand to hand. Being thereforeem battelled in Squadrons thick and strong they charged the enemy with a great shout and cry, and at the first shock forced them to retreat and lose ground, and afterwards to turn back and file. And in the rout they were beaten down and killed; for even their ownstreights which they selected for their vantage, empeached and hindred themselves. The Romans having gotten the victory encamped neer a village of the Maronits, called Sare. The next day they marched through the champain open countrey Priaticus, where they fo journed three daies to take in corn, partly from out of the fields of the Maronits, which willingly of themselves they conserred upon them, and partly out of their own ships, which followed after, well surnished with all kind of provision. From this place they made but one daies journey to Apollonia, and so passing through the territory

A of the Abderits, they came to N ples. All this way they journeied peaceably through the Colonies of the Greeks. But the rest behind, if it were not dangerous unto them for any hostility, yet sufrected still it was, all the whiles that they passed night and day through the midst of the Thracians, until at length they came into Macedony. The fame army conducted sometime before by Scipio that very way, found the Thracians more gentle and tractable, for no other cause, but that they had less store of pillage and booty with them to set their teeth on water, and fingers on itching. And yet even then allo (as Glandins writeth) there were fifteen thousand Thracians that encountred Mutines the Numidian, as he marched before the vanguard to discover the coalls; and he faith, that he had in his company four hundred Numidian horiemen, and some few Elephants: also that his son, with an elect wing of a hundred and fifty horse, brake through R the midit of the enemies, who also within a while after, (when his tather Mutines having placed the Elephants in the midft, and the Horsemen in the flanks, joined in battel with his enemies, charged them upon their backs, and put them in great lear) by means of which florm and tempeff (as it were) of the Cavalry, they never came to far, as to deal with the battel of the footmen. Cn. Manlius led his army through Macedony into Theffuly, and marching on by the way of Epirus, arrived at Apollonia, where he abode all winter, For he made not so light a matter of winter failing, that he durst take the Sea, and hazard the passage at that time of the year. Theyest almost expired, M. Valerius the Consul returned out of Liguria to Rome, for the Creation of new Magistrate, having atchieved no such memorable exploit in his Province during the time of his government, as might have yeelded any colourable reason of his long stay, in that he came more tardy (than the usual manner was) to the affembly for an election of Consuls: (for holden it was upon the * 12 calends of March) wherein were created, M. Amylius Lepidus and C. Flaminiut. The next day after these Pretors were elected: namely, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Ser. Sulpitim Galba, Q. Terentins Culleo, L. Terentins M faliota, Q. Fulveus Flaccus, and M. Furius Craffipes, After the election of Magistrats the Consul proposed to the Senat as touching the Province; and governments of the Pretors. And the LL, decreed that two of them fould remain at Rome, to mimiller laws and execute justice: other two should be employed out of Italy, in Swily and Sardin a: two in lealy to wit, at Tarentum and in Gaul. Immediatly before they entred into office they were enjoyned to cast lots: and Ser. Sulpitius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and Q. Terentius of strangers and aliens: L. Terentius took the charge of Sicily, Q. Fulvius of Sardinia, Ap. Claudius was to govern Tarentum, and M. Furius to rule Gallia. It fortuned the same year that L. Minutius My tiles and L. Manlius were delivered to the Carthaginian Embassadors, by the hands of the Frecial heralds at the commandment of M. Claudius Pretor of the City for the time being and transported over to Carthage, for that the voice and speech went, That they had beaten the faid Emballadors. A bruit and rumour there was of a great war begun in Liguria, & which encreased every day more than other. Whereupon the Senat ordained to both the new Confuls the Province of Ligaria that day on which they propounded unto the Senat to consult about the Provinces and the affairs of the Common weal, But Lepidus the Conful opposed himself against this their aft and ordinance alledging, " That it was a shameful indignity, that both the Consuls should be shut up and enclosed within the vallies of Ligaria; whereas for two years already M. Fulvius and Cn. E" Manlius had raigned like Kings, the one in Europe, the other in Afia, in stead of Philip and An-"toolhus, And if (qd, he)it be the pleasure of the Senat that there should be armies maintained in "those parts, more meet. I wot, it were, that Consuls should have the command & conduct there-"of than those privat persons. As for them, they range about those nations, terrifying them with "threats of war against whom there hath been none proclaimed making merchandice and selling "peace among them for turns of mony. Now if it be require and needful to keep two armies for the government and defence of those Provinces, like as M. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius Confuls, succeeded M. Acilius and L. Scipio Confuls: fo C. Livius and M. Valerius the Confuls ought to have entred inplace of Fulvius and Manlius. At least wife now, when the Actolian war is finished and brought to an end, Afia recovered and conquered from Antiochus, and the Gauls vanquished 'subdued, either ought Consuls to be sent unto their armies, or else the legions to be brought back from thence, and at length delivered to the Common-weal. The Senat notwithstanding they gave him the hearing, perialed still in their resolution that both Consuls should be imploied in the Province of Liguria. Yet thought good it was that Manlius and Fulvius should leave their Provinces, withdraw their forces from thence, and return to Rome. An old grudge there was and a cankred enmity between the faid M. Fulvius, and M. Emylius the Conful: and among othermatters of discontentment, Emylins gave out, that by the means of Fulvius, himfelf was Created Conful two years later than otherwise he should have been. And therefore to work him despight and make him odious to the World, he caused the Embassadors of Ambracia (whom he had suborned and set on for to lay matters to his charge) to enter into the Senathouse. These being in place, complained that M. Fulvius had warted upon them at what time as they were in peace, performed all that other Consuls before had imposed upon them and were also

feady in Il duty and allegeance to do the fame unto him. "First our lands and territories say

"they were piteonfly spoiled and wasted: then were we terrified with the sacking of our City,

"and thre uned with the killing of our people, that for very fear we were forced to thut our gates,

"Afterwards we were beleaguered and affaulted, and against us all kinds of hostility practised, by word, by fire, by ruinating and ransacking our City. Our wives, our children, have been led at and haled into captivity and bondage; our goods violently taken from us (and that which: 66 bove all went necreft to our heart) our Temples throughout the whole City despoiled and "robbed of their goodly ornaments: the images of our Gods, and finally our Godsthemlelves "plucked out of their shrines and places, and so carried away; yea, the very walls and pillars let bare and naked, fo as the Ambracians have no Gods remaining amongst them to adore; and in "whom they might make their prayers and supplications. As they poured out their compaints. the Conful of a mind to aggravat and heap more matter upon his adversary, ceased not to propose unto them many interrogatories (as it was complotted between them before) and drew them on to speak many things as if with their good will they would not have uttered them, When the reft of the LL, were moved herewith, then the other Conful C. Flaminius undertook the apologie and defence of M. Fulvius, saying, "That the Ambracians trod in an old beaten way, and did no 1 "otherwise than some before them had done. For even so was M. Marcellus accused by the Syncusians, so was Q. Fulvius charged by the Capuans. And why by the same means suffered they *cont ! Quintum to be charged by King Philip, M. Acilius and L. Scipio by Amiochus (n. Munitus to by the Gauls, and the same Fulvius himself by the Ætolians and people of Cephalenia? That cimbracia was affaulted, battred, and forced in the end; that images and ornaments were c taken from thence; that other acts were done and committed, which usually follow upon the "winning of Towns, think ye my LL, that either I in the behalf of Fulvius will deny, or Fulvius "himself will disavow? who, in regard of these worthy exploits and noble acts, is minded to deof mand at your hands the honor of a Triumph, who purpofeth to carry before his triumphant es chiariot the portraiture of Ambracia as it was taken, the images which they accuse him to have K " caried away and other spoils of that City; yea, and to fet them upon the posts of his house for a "memorial to posterity? No reason there is that the Ambracians should severthemselves from " the Ærelians, and do more than they, for their case and condition is all one. And therefore let "my colleague fliew his rancor and malice, and bewray a feltered enmity in some other cause; or " if he will needs follow and purfue this forward, let him interrain and keep fill his Ambracius "unto the coming of M. Fulvius, And for mine own part, I will fuffer no act to pass either of the "Ambracians or the Ætolians, so long as M. Fulvius is absent. Emylius accused his enemy for having a crafty head of his own, and for his fuble fetches, as being notorious and well known to the men for no better; faying, that full cunningly he would trifle out the time, and make delaies all the year long that he might not come to Rome fo long as his adverfary was Conful. Thus in this de I bate between the two Confuls two dayes were spent and nothing else done. And it appeared tildently, that to long as Flaminius was in place and prefence, nothing could be concluded and determined. Whereupon a time was spied out when Flaminius Chanced to be fick, and by that or casion was away. Then upon a motion made by Emylins there passed an act of the Senat, That the Ambracians should have all their goods restored unto them again; that they shouldening their freedom and franchifes, and live under their own Laws: and finally might take what or floms, toll and imposts they would for portage, as well by Land as Sea: provided alwayes that the Romans, and their allies the Latins, should be exempted and free there from. As for the images and other ornaments which they complained were taken out of their facred Temples, the Senat ordained that when M. Filvius was returned to Rome, the colledge of the Pontifies should M have the hearing and deciding thereof, and look what they awarded and fet down, it should said and be performed accordingly. And the Conful not content with all this, took the vantage when there were but few Senators in the house, and procured an other act of Senat in this form, That they judged Ambracia not to be reputed a City forced by affault. This done, there was by venue of an order from the Decemvirs a folemn supplication holden three dayes for the health of the people, in regard of a grievous pestilence that dispeopled both City and Countrey. Asterthat the Latine feafts and holy-dayes were celebrated. When the Confuls had accomplished thelederotions, and rid their consciences of scruple, and withal made a full and compleat levy to smith legions (for both of them were defirous to have new fouldiers) they departed into their Provinces, and cassed all the old.

After the Confuls were fet forward on their journey the Pro-conful Cn. Manlins returned home to Rome. For whose take the Pretor Servius Sulpitius assembled the Senat in the Temple of Bdloss. Where after relation made of his deeds atchieved, he demanded that in confideration thereof, due honor and thanksgiving should be rendred to the immortal Gods, and withil, that himself might ride triumphant into the City. The most part of the Legats and Commissioners, who had been with him gainfaid and denied the same, and above all the reft L. Furius Purpuis, and L. Emplius Paulus, who stepped forth, and informed against him in these terms: "That they had "been fent in commission to affist Cn. Manlins, for the making of a peace with Antiochus and he " nishing of that accord and those covenants and conditions, which were commensed and begin "between him and L. Scipio. Yet Cn. Manlius, fay they, endevoured all that ever he could to troi-0 "ble that peace yea, and to have surprised and intrapped Antiochus by trains of ambush if hehid "ever come in his way, or within his reach, But the King being a ware of the Conful his fraud and " deceir, albeit there was made great means many a time to have caught him by colour of party "and conference, yet avoided evermore not only to have freech and communication with him, "but also to come within his fight. And when Manlas would needs have passed over Taurus "hard'y and with much ado could be be kept back, not withflanding all the commissioners prayer

"and befought him to flay, and not to hazard himself and incurrene danger of a notable loss and "overthrowsfore-told by the veries and propheties of Sibylla to light upon them that would pais "beyond the bounds limited by the fatal destinies. All this not with than ding he advanced forward "and approached with his army, yea, and encamped neer the very pitch and top of the mountain. "where all the water that falleth from above, runneth contrary wayes into divers Seas. And "when he could find no quarrel there for which he might make war (because the Kings people "and jubjects were fill and quiet) he curried the army about to the Gallogreeks, against which "nation there was no war intended either by warrant and authority from Senat, or by grant and "commission from the people. And what man was ever to hardy and bold, as to war upon his "own head? The wars against Antiochus, Philip, Annibal, and the Carthaginians are most iresh B"ineach mans remembrance: and of all these the Senat was consulted with, and the people gran-"ted their ordinance. Embassadors many a time and often were addressed before: restitution and "amends were by order demanded : and last of all, heralds were fent, solemnly to denounce and "proclaim war. Now tell me, Cn. Manlins, Which of all these things were done; that we may call "this by the name of a publick war allowed by the State of the people of Rome, and not rather a "privat brigandage and robbery of your own? But contented you your felf with this and did you "no more? marched you directly forward, and took you nothing but that which was in your "way; leading your army against those only whom you took to be your enemies? or rather ar dall turnings and windings, nay, at every forked high way leading on both hands, when you " were at a Hand, followed not you like a mercenary and waged Conful unto Attalus (King Eu-C "menes his brother) with the Roman army, what hand soever he turned and marched? There "was not a Crank and nook but you visited.; there was not a corner that you left unsearched, in all " Pifidia Lycannia, and Phrygia. There was not a tyrant, Prince nor Potentat, there was not a Lord of any borough or castle, how far foever out of the way, but you had a saying to them to pill and "poll them, and to pick pence out of their puries. For what buliness had you with the Oroandi-"ans? What had you to do with other nations, as innocent and guiltless as they? Now as con-"cerning the war, (in regard whereof you demand a triumph) in what fort managed you it? " Fought you a battail either in place commodious, or time convenient? Surely, I mult needs fay, es great reason you have and good cause, to require that honor and praise be given to the immor-"mortal Gods: first for that their gracious will and pleasure was that the army should not smart for the temerity and rashness of their chief leader, warring as he did against the law of nations: then, in that they prefented unto us, not men indeed for enemies, but very beafts and no better. "Fore must not think, that it is the name only of the Gallogreeks, which is mingled and com-"pounded; for long time before, both their bodies and minds have been mixed and corrupted, "and the men the miclives bastard and degenerate from their first nature, Had they been the same "Gulswith whom we have tought a thousand times in Italy, and with doubtful iffue, and lost as "much as we won, and every foot received as good as we brought; think ye there would have re-"turned ode messenger from thence, to bring us news, for any good at least-wife that our Gene-"ral there did ? Twice he came to conflict with them; twice he encountred them in place of dif-"advantage; mounting with his army against the hill, and ranged in the botome of the valley, "even under the enemies feet: in such fort, that if they had lanced no darts against us from the "higher ground, but only come upon us with their naked and disarmed bodies, they had been able at to have overcome us and gone over our bellies. And what hapned hereupon? God-amercy the "good fortune of the people of Rome: we may thank (I fay) the great and terrible name of the "Romans. The fresh renown of the late ruins and overthrows of Annibal Philip, and Antiochus, "amazed and aftonished (as one would say) these men with their so corpulent and mighty bo-"dies; with flings and arrow-shot only were they discomfitted and put to flight, so affrighted "were they. There was not a fword once blondied in all this Gauls war: at the first twang of the "bow and finging of the arrow, they fled away, like swarms of bees with ringing of basons. And "yet believe me, even we the same and no other (as if fortune would admonish and shew what p" had become of us if we had affronted an enemy indeed) in our return, when we fortuned to " light upon certain perty robbers and theeves of Thrace, were foundly beaten, killed, and put to "flight, and poiled and well stript of our bag and baggage, Q. Minutius Thermus (by whose death "we have fulfained a far greater loss, than if Cn. Manlins had miscaried, whose rashness was the "canle of all this calamity and misfortune) with many a tall and valiant man befides, loft his life in "this skirmilh. Our hoft, bringing away with them the spoil and pillage of K. Are there the brave and seworthy exploits for which you demand a triumph? But fay, that you had received in Thrace, neither damage nor dishouor; which be the enemies over whom you would needs triumph in Mall the hast? I tro they be those, whom the Senat & people of Rome destined & assigned to be your "enemies: for to was triumph granted to this L. Scipio here in place: fo likewife to that M. After this manner as ye have heard spake Furins and Amylius. And Manlins again, as we find in record, answered thus, or much to this effect, as followeth: "Right honorable & my very 200d ct LL, the Tribuns of the Commons were ever wont afore-time, to repugn and crois them that demanded triumph : and I take my felf much beholden unto them for this favour, that either in their love to my felf, or in regard of my great and notable exploits, they have not only by their filence given their confent for my honor, but also feem ready and prest to propound the fame unto the people, if need had been. But now for footh, whem have I (and God will) for mine adveriaries, but even some of my ten adjacents or suffragans, whom our ancestors thought good to give unto their Generals in the war, as a countel both to affilt and aid them, and allo to counte. nance and grace them in their victory? And I, who have so often in ranged battel fought with an 100000 most fierce and war ike enemies, slain or taken prisoners more than 40000 of them, forced and won two of their camps: and left all places on this fide the ridge of the mountain Taurus more peaceable and quiet than is the Land of Italy, am not only frustrate and put beide my triumph, but also stand here before your honors to defend my felf against the challenge of these mine own Councel and Suffragans, Which accusation of theirs, confitteth (as ye have heard my LL.) of two principal points: for objected they have, first, that I ought not at all tobaremade war with the Gauls; and secondly, that I conducted and managed the same, rashly and without dicretion. The Gauls (lay they) were no enemies of ours; but being quiet in peace, and "ready to do what soever they were charged, were by you abused and wronged. I will not require "(my LL.) that ye should have the same hard conceit of the Gauls which inhabit in Afa attord ing their cruelty and mortal hatred against the Roman name, which ye know generally to be in the people of the Gauls: Do but confider and judge of these Gauls as they be in themselves "fimply without respect of the infamous name and odious opinion that goeth of the wholege " neration: O that King Emmenes were here. That a General who had vanquished his enemies, action pillined the full time of government his Province, and brought his army back, returned into the City as a private person, without the honor of the triumphant chariot and the lawel gastand. The very indignity and shared the example, submounted the malice of his adversaries, in so much as the Senators in a frequentation.

The remembrance and memory of this debate, was afterwards drowned in a greater content on that arose with a far mightier and more noble personage. For as Valerius Antias hath records, the two QQ. Petilis, called P. Scipio Africanus into queffion, and fet him down a day peremporily to make his appearance, and answer for himself. This action divers men construed divelly, according to their leveral disposition and affection. Some blamed not so much the Tribus of the Commons, as the whole City in general, for fuffering such an abuse; discouring in this wik: That the two chiefest States and Common-wealths in the World were become at one time unthankin, a but Rome more ungrareful of the twain. For Carthage being subdued, had banished Annibal like wife vanquished : but Rome a victress was about to expulse Africanus a conqueror. Others again reasoned thus: that in no State there ought to be a citizen so pre-eminent and high above there that he might not be under law, and brought to answer unto interrogatories accordingly. And nothing preferreth isonomy in a City, and maintaineth equal liberty more, than to have the mightiest man to hold up his hand at the bar. For what may be fafely committed to any man (and furely the foveraign rule of the flare least of all other things) if he be not to yeeld an accomp of the managing of his affairs? And verily, he that can not abide to be equal unto others, to proceed against such a one by rigor and force, is no injustice at all, Thus men commonly talked pro contra, until the judicial day came of his personal appearance, and answer to be made. Never was N there man known before that day (no, not Scipio himfelf when he was at the higheft, either Contil or Cenfor) accompanied with a greater train of men of all degrees and qualities, than he that day was conducted unto the common place and court of Pleas as an accused person, there to plead his cause. Being commanded to speak in his own desence, he began his oration without any mention at all of the imputations and matters with which he was charged, and entred into a discourse of the acts by him archieved; and that with fuch a Majeffy and magnificence as it was well known and confessed, that never man was praised either better or more truly than he. For with what courage and mind he atchieved those his brave exploits indeed, with the same spirit he delivered them in words. And no man thought him tedious and was weary to hear his speech, because that he related was for his own defence in this his danger, and not upon vain glory and oftental o on. The Tribuns of the Commons his adversaries, when they had laid open certain in trimes committed of old, as touching his walful excess whiles he winted in Stracyla; scallo be riot and outrage of Pleminius which hapned at Locris they proceeded to charge him by prefitte ons and inspitions, rather than by direct evidences and proofs, for embezling and avening whis proper tile certain treasure gotten from King Antiochus and namely, that his fon being taken pri forer, was rendred unto him without rantom; and that in all other things, Scipio was respected and

A alone had carried the Roman peace and war under hisgirdle. Also that he bare a strong hand overthe Conful, more like, I wot, a Dictatator and absolute commander, then a Lievetenant and assistant unto him, all the while he was in the province. Neither aimed he and shot at any other mark, when he went that journey, but that the fame, which long before was notoriously known to Spain Ganl, Sicily, and Africk might as evidently appear to Greece, to Afrajand all to the King and nations of the East parts, to wit, that he was the only man, he was the chief, the head and piller of the Roman Empire, that under the fliaddow of Soipio his wing, that City which is the lady of the world, was covert and protected; that a beck and nod of his head, was as good as all arrefts of Senat and helts of people. Thus when they could not rouch him in life, nor faflen apon him any note of infamy, they charged him all that ever they could with matter to kindle envy. Thus with orations they ipent the time until night come, and the business was put over to another day : which being come, the Tribunes, only in the times in the morning were let in their newes within the Roftra [or common ple ding place] the detendant was called, who garded with a great company of his friends and followers, patted through the mids of the affembly, approached the Rostra, and flood just under it. Then after an ojez ; and filesce made : " My "Mafters (quoth he Jyou that are Tribunes of the commons, and ye likewife Quirites, my neighwhors and citizens of Rome, upon this very day of the month it was that I fought a pight bartell against Annibal and the Carthaginians, with right fortunat and happy successe; meet there-" fore and good reason since it is, that to day all pleas and actions sucrease; I will go directly "and immediately from hence to the Capitol and pretent my felf before Inp. Opt. Max. before "Inno and Minerva, with all the rest of other gods and goddesles, presidents and patrons of that Cutemple and fortreffe, to perform my humble duty unto them to falute and thank them for that "they have vonch afed me that rejointe effection and powerfull means with il, both on fucha "day as this; and also many times befides, to perform my devoir well and truly unto the Comamon-weal. As many of youth refore (Quiries) as well may, go ye with me, and pray the agods to fend to you like governors to my elf, and no worfe. If I lay (and not elfe) as you ever wince I was feventeen yeers of age, even to there mine old dates, you alwates advanced me to Thomas before the ordinary time of mine age, to I again advanced and prevented the faid honors "with good fervice and poble deeds. This said he departed from the Roffra and afcended up to the Capitol; whereat the wnole audience there afternoled turned at once and followed Scipio; into much as at last the scribes and notaries, ye , and the very sergeants left the Tribunes there a. lone, without any to bear them company but their own bondlervants and the common cryer. who still from the Rofera called and cited the defendant. Scipio not only visited the temples upon the Capitoll hill, but also made a perambulation with the people of Rome throughout the whole city to all the churches and chappels of their gods and goddeffes. This was in manner a more folemn day unto him in regard of the affectionat favour of men, and the estimation of his true grandeur indeed, then on which he rode into the City in triumph over King Syphax and the Carthaginians. But it was the laft fair day th t ever he faw and never shone the sun again pleasantly upon P. Scipio. For after this, forefeeing envy growing toward him, and what a life and how full of debates he fatonld have with thole Tribunes, upon a longer day granted for the proceffe of law against nim, he recired himself apart to Liternum, of set purpose to make default and not ap-E per to plead his cause any more. He caried a greater spirit with him, his heart was too big. & used he had been to an higher degree of port & nonor, then to take knowledg what it was to be accused: he could not skill to vale bonet and stoop so low, and to abase himfelf to the abject condition of those that plead for themselves at the bar. Now when the day was come, and that in his absence his name began to be called, L. Scipio answered for him, and alledged sickness to be the cause why he was away. But the Tribunes his acculers, would not admit of that excuse, replying and saying, "That upon the same pride of heart, in which he avoided once before, his judicialitriall, and "left the Tribunes and the whole aftembly, he now also would not appear to make his answer. "Even so triumphed he then over the people of Rome, when accompanied with those whom he "led after him as priloners (after he had once taken from them their power and liberty to give "their centure and doom of him) he sequestred himself that day, by way of an insurrection from "the Tribunes of the Commons, into the Capitol. Well are ye now served therefore (say they) and "jultly punished for that daies tolly and rathness. For lo how he him elf now abandonerh you, "who was your motive and leader then, to fort ke us. See how every day more then other our "cotrage is fallen and heart abated and dare not we now fend tolk to fetch him (a privat per-"ion and no more) out out of his farm and house in the country, and make him to appear and "plead his answer; unto whom not past 17 yeers ago, at what time as he was General of an ar-"my on land, & Admirall of the Armado by iea, we were fo bold as to fend Tribunes of the Com. & an Ædile, to arrest and bring him away with them to Rome? In the end, the rest of the Tribuns of the Combeing called earneftly unto by L. Scipio for their lawfull tavour, fet down his order & conclusion, that if fickness were alledged for his excuse, and that there were nothing else but it that occasioned his absence, it should be received for good & lawful, and their colleagues should adjourn his trial to'a faither day. It fortuned at that time that Tib. Sempronius Gracchus was one of the Tribunes between whom & P. Scipio there was some quarrel. He forbad expresly that his own rame fhould be lub feribed to the inftrument of the aforetaid decree of his colleagues. And When every man looked to hear tome heavier tentence denounced against Serpre, he awarded

The fentence it telf of Gracebus (enlored "with fuch a speech especially) moved not others only, but also the very accusers themselves; who "made no other rejoinder again but thus, That they would confider better what they might by their place and wh t they ought of duty to do. When the affembly of the people was was broken up, the LL. of the Senat began to fit in councell; where, the whole order of the Sena sors (but principally the ancients and as many as had been Confuls) highly commended in thanked Tib. Gracebus, for that he had preferred the weal-publick, before privat grudges and particular quarrels. But the Perilis were well shent and baued with reproschiul checks and bit. ter rebukes, in that they would reem to rife by the fall of another, and fo grace themselves with L the difgrace of Africanus, and teck to triumph over him and be enriched with his spoils. Wellas. ter that, there was no more words of Serpio Africanue. The rest of his life he passed at Literana and never had mind to come to the City : there ended he his daies in a country village; and (at they fay)he charged his executors upon his death bed, to inter him in that very place. And there his tomo or monument was built, because he would not that so much as his funeral obsequies should be perfermed at Rome, (his native country) to unthankfull as it was. A rare mankewes and worthy to be recommended to the memory of all politerity: howbeit the former panofhis life was more fingular and memorable, as well for the conduct of martiall exploits in within governance of civil affairs in peace, then in his latter daies. For in his youth, he followed the wars continually; whereas in his oldage, as his body decaied and laded, to whatfoeverhedid, if loft much of the wonted beauty and luftre. Besides, there was no matter presented, to employ that wit and spirit of his. What eds was there between his former Consulship and the second, although ye gut his Centorfhip to it in the ballance? What comparison was there, and what fen blable thing in that lieurenancy of his in Affa ? of to little or no emploiment was it by reason of his own ficklinesie; and blemished withall, by the occasion of the misfortune of his son, And afterward, his return home sgain was no leffe unfortunat, for the hard choice whereuntohews driven, forced of necessity to abide the triall of a doubtfull iffue in judgment, to quit withill his parive City for ever. Howbeit he alone were away with the honor above all other, of finishing the punick war, as great and dangerous to the Romans as any that ever they made.

I be eight and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

When Africanns was once dead and his head laid, his adverfaries and enemies were aloft: of whom, M. Porcius Cato was the chief and principall: a man who was wont to bark (asit were) and rail against bim during his life in regard of his greatness. And it is thought, that the Petilis were fet on by him, and procured through his perimation, both in the life of Africanuto have drawn out, and after his death to have preferred a bill in this form and manner following: May "is please you to grant and ordein, that true seach and diligent enquiry be made, what sems of "meny were taken in prize, carried away, and levied away of King Antiock ar and those which " were under his obedience and dominion ; and that of as much therof as came not into the pub-"lick treasury and chamber of the City, Ser. Sulpitims (the Pretor of the City) may propose unto "the Senat, to know their advice and pleasure touching it a that whomsoever of all the Pretors of " for the time now being, it shall please the Senat to appoint, he may fit in commission and inqui " fition there ot. This bill was first croffed by Q and I neim Mammin, who thought it meet and reason that the Senat alone (as at all times heretofore) should make one enquiry of the monits to parloined and enthezled: as is afore said, and not brought into the common cheft of the City. The Betilii charged the Supiot for being over great and mighty and as it were KK in the Senational all before them. L. Furing Purpures (a man that had been Conful, and one of the ten commissioners in Afia, was of opinion, that the forfaid enquelt the ald be granted in more large & supple terms.

A namely, as touching the mony not only taken from Antiochas, but also from other Kings and nations: covertly taxing herein Cn. Mantitu his old effemy. L. Scipio on the other fide flepione forth to diffwade this matter; albeit it was thought he would rather speak in defence of biratelf. then against the thing. He complained much and shewed his grievance, that such a bill as this hould come forth now, and be let on foot after the death of his brother Africanns, the most va-" liant knight and hoblest personage that ever was. As if it were not sufficient, that P. Africanas "wanted the folemn Panegyrick oration at the Roftra after his death, but he mult be accured af-" (o. Why ? the very Carthaginians are contented with the exile of Anitbal, and feek no more "but the people of Rome is not latisfied even with the death of Scipio, unleffe both his dwn good name after he is buried be wounded and mangled, and his brother alto (to fill up the measure of " mens malice and hatred) be killed and facrificed upon his tomb. M. Catofpake in the behalf of the bill, and perfwaded that it might paffe. His oration as touching the treature of King Antioches, it extent to be icen: and by the majesty of his authority, he diverted the two Mainmit Tribunes of the Commons, clean away, from interpoling them elves any more. When they once had renounced and given over their negative, all the tribes in general paffed their voices affirmatively, Vei rogalt is. After this, Ser. Sulpitim propoted unto the Senat, Whom they would appoint for this enquelt according to the act Petilia? and the LL. of the Senat deputed Q. Terentim Calleo. This Pretor was fo great a friend to the house of the Cornelis, that some authors, namely thole, who report how P. Scipio both died and also was carried forth to be enterred at Rome (for that bruit also runneth currant) have written, How he went at his funeralls before the bier and the mourners, with a cap of liberty or his head, like as he had done before in his triumph, and gave tweet wine or mede to all those that attended the convoy, as far as to the gate Casend. This honour he did Scipio at his death, for that among other pulloners in Africk, he was by his means recovered out of the enemies hand. But it should seem rather, that he was such an enemie to that family, that for the cankred rancour and malice which hecartied against that name, he was by the adverte faction of the Scipios, chosen especially of purpose to fit upon & execute that inquifition. But certain it is, before this Pretor (all in his extremities, who either in love & friendfhip, or in hatred and enmity, kept no mean) information was given immediately against L. Scipio. Presentments were made likewise, and the names received of his lieutenants A. Hostilius and L. Holilius both Catos : and of his treaturer befides, C. Faring Aculco. And to the end that it D should appear to the world, that they were all attaint of this crime of purloining and robbing the publick treasure of the common-weal in one complot, there were two secretaries also and one of his fergeants called into question. But these three last mentioned, and L. Hostilus beforensmed, were found unguilty and acquit, before Scipio had his judiciall triall : howbeit Scipio and A. Hofilins his lieutenant, together with C. Farins were condemned. Scipio, for that he (as Valerius Anuas writeth) to make a more easie peace to the contentment of Antiechus, received 6000 pound weight of gold, and 480 pound weight of filver more then he brought into the City chamber. A. Hostilius, for that he likewise deteined eighty pound weight of gold, and 483 pound of filver: and Furing the Queltor for keeping back to his own nie 130 pound of gold, and two hundred of filver. These sums I set down of gold and filver, as I find them gathered and registred by Valeri-E us Antias in his Chronicle. As for the fum of gold and filver, which L. Serpio should embezle, I would rather think that the clerk or fecretary faulted with his pen in writing the copies, then the author lied to loud with his tongue in the first inditing of the Originall. For it is more likely of the twain, that the weight of the filver was more then of gold. As also for the fine wherein he was condemned, should amount but to forty thousand * Sefterces, then arise to two bundred and concerning, income amount of the state of th required in the Senat to give his account but of fuch a fum; and when he had bidden his bro- the forth pare thet L. to fetch him that book of accounts, he took it of him, and there before the Senat, tare and of a Roman rent it with his own hands, with indignation, that having brought into the Treasury two mili-denatius, three tent it with this own using, which the country through the confident boldnesse of halfspence one of Sefferers, he was called to his account for forty thousand. In which confident boldnesse of farthing cue. birit and courage, when the Questors durst not (against the order of law) take forth mony out of the Treasury, he called for the keis, and said he would be so bold as to open the chefts of the Treatury fince he was the cause that they were locked. Many things besides are diversly reported of Scipio, especially as touching the latter end of his life, his trouble and acculation, his death, his innerals, and last of all, of his sepulchre and tomb, which distract me so, that I wot not what report to cleave anto, nor which records to believe. For they accord not as concerning his acculer. Some write it was M. Navins, others again ay that they were the Petilians that called him to his answer. Neither agree they in the time when he was troubled, nor in the yeer, no. northeplace wherein he died, nor yet where he was enterred. Some affirm he ended his daies and was buried at Rome, others at Liternum. And in both places there are monuments and Statres of his to be feen. |For of Liternum there flood a tomb, and over the fame tomb an image of his personage erected, which of late time we our selves saw overthrown in a tempest. At Rome likewife without the gate Capena, there be three statues upon the monument of the Scipios. whereof two are faid to be of Pub, and L. Scipio, and the third of Q. Emmisthe Poet. And this difference among authors is not touching his acts and affairs only, but also about the very Orations (if to be they were the orations indeed of P. Scipio & Tiberius Gracehus, which are commonly to taken and carried about, which difagree so much as they do. For the title of the oration that goeth for P. Scipio, hath the name of M. Navius, a Tribune of the Commons : but through the whole

Oration it felf there is no mention at all of that accusers. He termeth him one while Nobelon [Knave] and another while Nugator [Coufiner.] In like fort the oration of Gracehus makethe mention at all either of the Petilis, the acculers of Africanas, or of the day assigned unto him is his answer. And we must devise to tell the whole tale otherwise, it would have it to agree with the oracion of Gracehus: and follow we must those authors; who write, that when L. Sepieme accused and condemned for taking bribes of King Antiochus, his brother Africanus was Embalis dor in Tufca ny ; and upon the news of his brothers misfortune, left his embaffage and midehift to Rome. Where he took his way directly from the gate to the common place (for that it was told him how his brother was going to prilon) and thrust the sergeant from his body, yet, and when the Tribunes themselves would have relirained him, he used violence against them, and caried himfelf in this action fo, as he shewed more kindness and love to his brother, then mues and civility otherwise. For thus complaineth Gracebus in his oration, that the Tribunes and rity and power was infringed and broken by a privat person. And in the latter end, when he promiled to alsift L. Scipio, he knit up his speech with these words, that it was a thing more tolerable that both the Tribunitian puissance and the Common-weal should seem overcome and surmount. ed by Tribunes themselves, then by a privat man. But he aggravated and enforced this one violence and excessive outrage against him, and made it odious in such fort, that in blaming him for to much overshooting himself and degenerating as it were from his own nature, he reheaded the commendable parts of his moderation and temperat carriage of himself aforetime, and their io good terms and ample maner, that thereby he made him some part of amends for the sharpeprehension he used for the present. For he faid, that in times past he had rebuked and reproved w the people, when they would have made him a perpetual! Conful and Dictator; that he hadforbidden expresly, that any of his Statues in triumphant habit, should be set up and erected in the publick places of affemblies, as in the Comstium and Curia, in the Capitoll and chappell of Inditer Opt. Max. These commendable reports of him, if they were uttered in an oration penned of purpose for his praise, must needs teltific and show a wonderful magnanimity of his, in the modent use of high honours according to a civil port , which an enemy by way of reproach and upbai. ding him, acknowledgeth and confesseth. But all writers accord, that Gracehus, took to wife the yonger of his two daughters (for the elder without all question was affianced and given in marriage by his father to P. Cornelius Nafica. But it is not to certainly agreed upon, whether he was both betrothed and wedded alfounto him, afters her fathers death or no. As alfo, whether it be true (as it is reported) that when L. Scipio was a leading to prilon, Gracehus, seeing noned his own fellow Tribunes to fuccour and refcue him, fware a great oath and protested that hews an enemy still to the Scipioes as much as ever he was, and would not do any thing to curry hront with them, or to come into their grace; yet could be never endure that he should be caried to that prilon, into which he had feen his brother Africanns lead Kings, great generals and committee of enemies, captive. Moreover, that the fame day the Senat fortuned to be at supper together in the Capitol, and arose up all at once, and requested Africanus to affiance his daughter to Grathe, before the supper and banket was ended. Which esponials being performed with all due complements accordingly, during the time of that folemn feaft, Scipio, when he was returned home to his house, said unto his wife Amylia, that he had fianced and bestowed his daughter upon unbus is band. She then falling into a fit of choler like a woman, and chafing that he had not made her atquainted with the matter, and taken her advice touching the maiden, who was as much her this as his, brake out into these words withall, that if he had given her in marriage to Tiberius Grachus, yet good reason it was that the mother should have been at the making of the bargun. Whereupon Scipio took great contentment and joy at this conformity of judgment in the choice, and inferred fireight waies, that he was the man to whom the was espouled. Thus much I though good to relate of this worthy and noble person, albeit there is great variety of opinions, and versity of writings in that behalf.

Atter the Pretor Q. Terentins, had finished the inquisition and whole processe thereof, Hiff. lius and Furius, who were attaint and condemned, that very day put in sufficient sureties to be bound in recognitance to the treasurers of the City, for the paiment of their fines. But Scipiodebating the matter fill, & pleading that all the mony which he had received was in the City chanber, & that he had purloined none of the publick treature, was laid hold on to be had away and conmitted to prilon. P. Scipie Nafica called unto the Tribunes for their help, and made a speechfull of true praites and commendations, not in generall only of the whole name and family of the Cormelii, but in particular also of his own house. And namely he alledged and said, That himself and P. Africanus, together with L. Scipio (who now was going to prison) had to their fathers Conscip and P. Scipio, most noble and famous personages; those who for certain yeers in the land of "Spain, advanced the renoun and glory of the Roman name, maugre the heads of many captains 0 60 & armies, as well of Carthaginians as Spaniards, not only in martial feats of war, but also in this " especially, that they had given testimony and proof unto those nations, of the temperat govern "ment, & faithful dealing of the Romans: and in the end both of them spent their bloud and lost "their lives in the quarrel of the people of Rome. And albeit it had been sufficient for all their police "ritylto maintein only & uphold the glory from them received, yet P. Africanns fo far surpssed the " praise worthy acts of his father, that it was verily believed he was not born of human bloud, but descended from some divine and heavenly race of the gods. As for L. Scipio, who now is in

"trouble, to fay nothing of his worthy acts which he atchieved in Spain and in Africk, when he

A " was lieutenant there to his brother Conful) he was both reputed by the Senat fufficient, with-"out any calting of lots, to undertake the province of Afia and the war against King Antiochus. and allo effeemed by his brother Africanus fo worthy a person, that himself who had been Conful twice, Cenfor once, and had ridden in triumph, thought not fcorn to accompany him unto " Affa in quality of his lieutenant. In which province (to the end that the greatness & resplendence "glory of the lieutenant should not dim the brightness of the Conful, and so drown his vertues and "good parts) it fo fell out, that the very same day, on which L. Scipio vanquished Antiochus uneer Magnesia, P. Scipio lay lick at Elaa, a City diltant certain daies journies. He deteated I fav "an army there, nothing inferior to that of Annibal, with whom his brother had encountred be-"fore in Africk. In which battell among other great commanders and captains under the King. R "Annibal was himself imploied in person, even he who had been the grand. General in the Puso nick war. Which service was so well conducted and managed, that a man possibly could not er find fault fo much as with fortune, or any accident that hapned there. And now when the war " is unblamable, there is picked matter of crimination in the peace : and it (they fay) was bought "and fold for money. In which challenge the ten deputies and affitance in councel, are alto touch-"ed and noted with corruption, by whose advice the said peace was granted and concluded. Well. "of those ten, there were some that Repped forth and accused Cn. Manlins : yet to tar off was " that acculation of theirs from being credited that it did not to much as hinder and delay the ve-"rytime of his triumph, But (believe me)in Scipio his cafe, the very conditions of peace favour "firengly of bribery and indirect dealing, for that they are advantageous, respective & favorable on C "part of Antiochus. For his kingdom is left entire and whole unto him; now that he is vanquish-"ed,he polleffeth as much as before the war began; and Scipio having received from him a mighty " maffe of gold and filver, hath brought nothing into the common treatury, but averted all from "thence, and converted it to his proper use. Why? was there not carried in pomp at the triumph of "L. Seine (in the very fight of all men) as much gold and filver, as in ten triumphs before (and put "them all together) could not be shewed. For wh t should I speak of the confines and frontiers of "his realm? Namely, that Ansiochus beforetime held under his dominion all Afia, and the marches " also of Europe adjoining? & great a part of the world that is, which extendeth from the hill Tan-"rm, and lyeth out to, far as the Ægean tea; how many not Cities only, but spacious countries "and ropulous nations it containers, all men know right well : as also that this countrey, bearing com in lengthth more then 30 dates journey, and in bredth between two leas ten dates journey, "even as far as to the top of the mountain Taurus, is taken from Antiochus, & he driven into the "utmost angle and corner of the globe of the earth? What could be have been differzed of more Gincule his peace had colt him never a penny of mony? When Philip was conquered, he had "Macedony left unto him : when Nabis was subdued, he enjoied still Lacedamon: and no man dever went about to call Quincing in queltion for it. And why? mary he had not to his brother " Scipio Africanus, for whose take the envy and malice of men hath defaced and hurt L. Scipio, " whereas his prothers glory ought to have graced and helped him. Would any man of sence and " reason judg, that to much gold and filver was brought into the house of L. Scipio, as may not "not possibly be raifed, it all the goods he bath were fold to the worth? What should become of " all that gold of the Kings? Where be those great pur chases of lordships and inheritances that " he hath made therewith ? Certainly it cannot be, but in that house that hith not exceeded in " luperfluous expense, there should be seen some heap and mount of this new treasure. But what "care his enemies for this? That which cannot be made of the substance and goods of L. Scinio "they will make good on his body and back; which they mean to terture (belike) and expose to contumely & villany, to the end that a man of the best mark and quality that ever was, should be thut up in a dungeon among robbers by the high-way fide, amongst night theeves and cutpurfes, and there in the hard flocks and balefull darkness render his last breath; and when he is dead, to have his body cast out naked at the prison dore. But be it whensoever it shall, this will the no greater Blot to the boule Cornelia, then a shamefull reproach for ever to the City of Rome. Against all these remonstrances, the Pretor Terentine opposed and read the law Petilia, the decree of the Senat, and the lentence given of L. Scipio, and he for his own part faid, he could not do withall, but if the fum wherein he was condemned, were not brought into the common Treaturehouse, he knew no other remedy, nor what elle to do, but to command him(a condemned person) to be apprehended again, and had away to prison. Then the Tribunes went apart to consultandlay their heads together. And within a while after C. Flaminius pronounced aloud, according to his own advice and the opinion of all his Colleagues (excepting only Gracebus) that the Tribunes would not interpole themicives, but that the Pretor might do and execute his office and his authority to the full. But Tib. Gracebus let down his own decree in this form, That as touch-Fing the fum wherein L. Scipio was condemned, he would not be against it, nor impeach the Pretor, but that he might use his power according to his place, and take it out of his goods, as far as they would extend. But that L. Scipio who hath subdued the mightiest and most puissant monarch in all the world, who hath drawn out and extended the bounds of the Roman empire, as far as the farthell frontiers of the earth; who hath obliged and bound King Eumenes, the Ruodians & fo many Cities and States befides of Affa, and made them beholding to the people of Rome for favours and benefits bestowed upon them; finally, who hath himself laid up fast in prison wany a General captain over the enemies, after he led them in triumph : that he I fay, should lie in prison & irons emong the enemies of the people of Rome be would never fuffer: and therefore he commanded him to be released and fet at large. This decree was heard with fo great appliance, in dilmen were to joinst stole L. Scipio delivered, that hardly a man would have beleaved (unlest that were to joins stole L. Scipio delivered, that hardly a man would have beleaved (unlest that teen it) that there had been such a judgement passed in the time City. Then the Fretonian the Questions or Treasurers, to enter and seize upon all the goods of L. Scipio, in the name and the use of the City: whereof there was not to befoure, to much as any one token or mention of the Kings money, no, nor logreat a sum could be raised, as the fire, came to wherein he was condemned. The friends, kinsfolk, sollowers and wellwillers of L. Scipio, made such a combinion of mony for him, that if he would have accepted of it, he had been a neher man by eds, thereof of the thin the cooled and calamitic fell upon him. But he took never a denier. His nevershimmer look bought again and redeemed as much of his own goods, as served for his necessary mane. I mane and no more. And the envy and hatted of men intended against the Scipio, undedgen the heads of the Pretor and his councell, together with the accusers themselves.

The nine and thirtieth Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

. The Breviary of L. Florus upon the nine and thirtieth Book.

Arcus Emylius the Conful after he had subdued the Ligarians, made the street or highway M from Platiance to Ariminum, untill it met with the way Flaminia. In this book are reconnectibe beginnings of rioto us and deffoliste life brought in by the Afian army. All the Ligurians on this file Apennine are camed and brought under. The Bacchanales (a Greekest feaft and celebrated in the night feafon, the very semenary and nurse-garden of all wickedness, being grown to this enormity that therein was contrived a conspiracy and complet of a mighty multitude were now visited and searched into by the Conful, and put down with the punishment of many persons. L. Quintius Flaminicus, the brother of T, Quintius, was deprived of his Senators aignity by the Cenfors, to mit, L. Valerius Fliccus, and Mar. Porcius Cato, a right excellent man, as well for feats of arms as peace. Thecale L was this, for that whiles he was Conful and governor in Gaul, at the request of one Philippus Pant, a netorious wanten Ganymede whom he loved, he flew a certain Gaul with his own hand: or, at fone have written, because at the entreaty of an harlot, upon whom he was enamoured, he beheaded on of them that were condemued. The investive oration of L. Caro against him is extant. Scipiosiparted this life at Liternum, and (as fortune would have his funeral accompanied with the deather the (ame time of two most renowned and great personages) Annibal poisoned himself. by occasion that Pruliss King of Bithynia (unto whom he was fled for succour after the defeat of King Antiothus) would have recluded him into the bands of the Rome who bad fent of purpose T. Quintius Flamininas to demand him. Likew: le Philopamen the General of the Achaans, an excellent man, wa poilm ed by the Meffenians, who took him prisoner in war . Colonies were fent to Pollentia, Pilaurum Muina M and Parms. Over and besides, this book containeth the prosperous affairs against the Celubriani also the beginning and cause of the Macedonian war, whereof the original spring arose from Philip much discontented, that his Kingdom was empaired by the Romans, in regard that he was justal) them to withdraw his garifon; out of Thrace and other parts.

The nine and thirteth Book of T. Livius.

Uring the time that there affairs passed at Rome (if this were the year wherein they hap ned) both Confuls made war against the Ligurians, a nation born as it were to maintain N the military discipline of the Romans, and to find them occupied in all times of respit and rest from greater wars; neither was there any other province that gave a sharper edge to the valour of the louldiers, For Afia with the beauty of their Cities, the abundance of all commodities as well by sea as land, the effeminat tendernesse of the enemies, and theroisty of the Kings riches, had made their armies more wealthy then valiant : and especially under the government of Cneus Manlins, nucled they were in much loofnesse and neglegence. And thereup on it was, that finding the way in Tbrace a little more rough and difficult then ordinary to travel in, and an enemy better practifed and exercised to deal withall, they received a great foil and lofte among them. Now in Liguria, they met with all things that might route and awake fleepy fouldiers : the countrey rough and full of mountains, that much ado they had themselvesto 0 feiz the same, and as great a labour they found to disseize the enemies, that were before poisted of them : the waies, steep up-hill, narrow, and dangerous for ambushes : the enemy, light, fwift, nimble, and fuddainly fetting upon them, giving no time of reft, no place of repole and lecurity. Drven they were of necessity to assault ftrong and fortifie Castles, with great difficulty and danger both the countrey poor and needy, which cauted the fouldiers to inte and live hardly, and afforded them no opportunity of preys and prizes : and therefore no victuallers, fcultions, fouldiers boyes and lackies, tollowed the camp; neither the labouring beals for ear. riage, tookup a length in their march : nothing there, but armour and men, repoing allhope in

A their arms, and nothing elfe. And never wanted they fome matter of quarrell, and feme occasion or other to make were for by occasion of their barenesse and pennsy, they made rodes into the lands of their neighbours, but so, as they never ventured all at once, nor put the main chance in

C. Flamenius the Conful having fought fundry times with the Friniat Ligurians, and in many battels gotten the better hand over them, even at home in their own country, brought the whole nation by composition under the obedience, and disarmed them; but because in the delivery of their armor, they dealt not foundly and faithfully, and thould have been challifed therefore, they abandoned their villages, & fled to the mountain Angines; whitherthe Conful pursued them hard at heels: howbeit, being disbanded and featuered again, and most of them disarmed, they flad Binto the valley through places where no wayes led, and over broken and cragged freep rocks. whereas the enemies could not possibly follow after, and to passed the other tide of Apennine But as m ny as kept fill within their hold, were befet round about and overthrown. Then were the legions led to the further fide of Apenninus, where the enemies for a im il while, detended themselves by the highe of the place, but mon they yeelded. Then was their armor longht for with more care and deligence then before, and they were disfurnished and stript out of all. After this, was the war diverted and before turned wholly upon the Apuan Liguri ns, who had to overrun the territories of Pifa and Bolonia, hat they coud not be manured and tilled. The Contul having jub fined them also, granted peace unto the borderers : and now that he had brought the province into quietnels and reft; to the end that his fouldiers should not be idle and do nothing, he made a cautey or ftreet-way from Bononia to Aretium.

The other Consul CM. Emplans, let on fire the villages, and wasted the lands of the Ligurians, as well in the campain fields as the valleys, when the inhabitants themselves were retired into the two mointains Baiffa & Susimonium, which they held. Afterwards he affailed them also who had taken the hils aforesaid and first wearied them with light skinnishes; afterwards, he forced them to deicend into the pl. in, and there in a set battell vanquished them: in which conflict he wowed a temple to Diana. Thus having subdued, all on this side Apanins, (to sar as to whom that dwelt beyond the mountain; among whom were the Frisin t Ligurians, (to sar as to whom C. Flaminius went not:) all those, Emplans, subdued despoiled them of their armour, he forced the militime of them to forsake the mountains and come down into the plains. After he had quieted the Ligurians, heled his army into the country of the Gauls, and made an high way from Placeusia to Ariminum, so as it met with the causey Flaminia: and in the last battell, wherein he tought with banners displaied against the Ligurians, he vowed a temple to Queen Inno. And these were the exploits for that yeer, in Ligurian, he vowed a temple to Queen Inno.

M. Furing the Pretor in Gaul, tecking in time of peace for some pretence and colour of wat, had taken from the Cenomans their armour not withflanding they were innocent and did no harm. The Cenomans made complaint bereof at Rome to the Senat, and were put unto the Conful. Empling unto whom the Senat had directed a commission of vier and determiner. After great debate with the Pretor, they overthrew him in the action, and had their armour delivered unto them again; and for the Pretor was commanded to give over his government and depart out of the province.

After this, the Embassadors of the Latin nation, who assembled and resorted in great number out of all p. 11s of Latinum, had audience given them in the Senat, These complained, that the great multimode of their own naturall citizens, were removed and gone to inhabit in Rome, and there were enrolled: whereupon a commission was granted to Q. Terentius Culles the Pretor, to make search for such: and look how many of them those Latine allies could prove to have been emolled (cither themselves or their fathers) in any City or corporation of theirs, either at the sime that C. Clandini and M. Livius were Censors, or after their Censorship, to force those to return thither again, where they had been entred or matriculated. By vertue of this inquisition, to the number of 12 and Latins returned home again into their own country: for now the City of Rome was overcharged and perferred with a multitude of strangers and forreiners.

Before that the Confuls repaired to Rome, M. Fulvius the Proconful returned out of Etolia: who, feer he h d discoursed of his exploits performed in Liolia and Cephalenia, befere the Senit assembled in the temple of Apollo, requested of the LL to judg it meet and requisit, and accordingly to grant and ordein, that praite and thankingiving might be rendred unto the immortall gods, and himself allowed to triumph, for that he had so well and happily managed the affairs of the common-west. Then Stept forth M. Aburius a Tribune of the Commons, and declared openly. The in cale they went ab out to passe any decree in that behalf, before the coming of M. Empline the Conful, he would croffeit: for that the Conful himself was minded to contradict that proceeding, and had given fitteight charge unto him, at what time as he took his journey to the province, that the contails tion of this matter should be referved wholly untill his return home. And Palloins (quoth ne) in Il lofe to much time; and when the Conful himself is present in place to alsily, then might the Senat move what decree it pleased them. Then answered M. Fultims and hild of men were ignorant either of the grudg and quarrell between me and M. Amyleus, or "With what outragions spirit and Kinglike choler and indignation he pursued the said enmity "and variance, yet it were not a rollerable thing and to be endured, that the abience of the Con-"in Thould both impeach the honour die unto the immortall gods, and allo hinder and flay the

" triumph which I have to juftly deferved : that a Generall (1 isy) who had to worthly stehie- H "wed his service, and an army so victorious, should flay and give attendance without the City " gates untill it pleased the Conful to return home: who no doubt of very purpose and on let ruies pole, upon this occasion would make flow half and take his leifure. But now confidening that "the comity and heart-burning that the Conful beareth tome is so notcicus as it is, What indi-"ferency and reasonable dealing may a man look for at his hands? who taking the advantage of "the time when a imali rumber of Senators were: fiembled, canfed an act of the Senat to paffe " by flealth, and entred it in the treasure house, conteining thus much in effect, that Ambracia "fhould not be reputed as a own forced by affault, notwithflanding it were affailed with " mantilets and platforms: where we were driven to erect new fabricks, and plant other exe gins and ordance of war after the former were confumed with fire: where we maintained fight 7 about the wals, as well under the ground as above, for the space of 15 daies together : where "after that the fouldiers had caled and gained the wals, the conflict endured not withflanding a *long time doubtfull, from morning to night; and where were flain above 3000 enemits. Then at all hands they dealt with the Tri- K bune, fome intreated him, other rebuked and blamed him : but the ipeech of Tib. Gracebus(one of his colleagues) moved him most of all others: who shewed, that it was no good precedent and example, that men should maintain and follow their own privat quarrels in time of magistracy and publick government, but a (hamefull matter and a foul indignity it was, and much beleeming the Tribuns of the Commons and their facred laws, that a Tribune should be Proctor to other men and profecute their actions and enmitties." Men onght (qd. he)according to their own differen tion and judgment, either to love or bate the persons, to like or diflike the cause; not to depend " and hing upon the countenance and beek of others, not to be carried to and fro with the wils, " pleafure, and appetites of other men. As for the Tribune of the Commons here, he accordeth and taketh part with a cholerick and telty Conful, and remembreth well what M. Emyless left with L " him in privat charge; but forgetteh altogether that the Tribunfhip was committed noto him by st the people of Rome: committed I fay, and put into his hands for to assist privat persons, and to " maintein their liberties, and not to uphold the Kinglike rule and a roialty of a Conful. Never "feeth he thus much before him, that it will be, written another day in the Annals and yeerly "Chronicles, that of two Commoner Tribuns in the same fellowship and society, one for the love of the Common-weal renounced and gave over his own privat displeasure and enmity to a parrige as it were by way of Commission, to pursue the quar-"ticular person, and the other to-with departed out of the temple : then the Pretor Ser. Sulpitius propounded the bill the fecond time; and so a triumph was granted to M. Fulvius. Who after he had rendred great thanks to the M LL, of the Senat, added moreover and (aid, that the very day wherein he forced the City Ambracia, he had by vow promifed, to the honor of Inpiter Opt, Man, for to exhibit the great and folemn Rom, games, And to that effect the Cities of Greece had contributed towards the charges, a hundred pound weight in gold : his petition was therefore, that the Senat would ordein that out of that mais of money which he was to carry and shew in triumph, and meant to bestow and lay up in the City Treatury, the fortaid fum of gold might be sequestred and reserved apart for the proper use abovenamed. The Senat commanded, that the Colledg of the Prelats and Priests in this case should be consulted with, and their advice demanded, whether they thought it necessary that to much gold should be spent and consumed in the charges of the faid games? The Prelats N made answer again, that it was not materiall to relegion and to the service of the gods, to how great a great a reckning foever the charges of the games should arise. Whereupon the Senat permitted Fulviss to defray what he would himfelf, to as it exceeded not the fum of 80000 [Affes.] He had proposed to triumph in the month of Innuary, but hearing that Æmylins the Contal (who was advertised by letters, that Abures the Tribune of the Comons had renounced and let fall his opposition which he commensed) was coming in proper person to Rome, only for to hinder the triumph, and staid by the way fick; he prevented the day, for fear he should have had more anger and trouble in his triumph, then during his war. So upon the 22 day of December he triumphedover the Atolians and Cephalenia. Before his chariot there were born 100 crowns of gold, weigh ing 12 pound apeece: of fiver 83000 pound weight : of gold 243 pound weight: of Attick Tetts O drachms 118000: of Philip peeces of gold coin 12,22: images of braffe :85: of marble 230. Likewise of armor, as well defensive as offensive, and other spoil of the enemies, an huge deal.befides Catapults, Balifts, and other engins and peeces of battery. Moreover, there went before him 27 captains either Ætolians and Cophalens, or elfe under King antischni, left by him in thole parts. The same day before that he entred into the City, he bestowed in the cirque Flaminiu, many military gifts upon many colonels, captains, horimen and centurions, as well Romans as allies. Generally to all the footmen he gave out of the pillage 25 Denarii apeece: twice as much to the centurions, and threefold to hortemen.

Now approached the time of the folemn affembly for the election of Confuls, and because M. Emplins whose lot it was to be president thereof, could not be present at the day, C. Flamining nim came of purpose to Rome. By whom were created Confuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Martins Phillipus. After that were Pretors elected, to wit, T. Manius, P. Cornelius Sulla, C. Calpurnius Pifo, M. Licinius Lucullus, C. Aurelius Scaurus, and L. Quintius Criffinus. In the end of the faid yeer, after the magistrates were thus created, Cn. Manlius Volfo, the third day before the Nones of March, triumphed over the Gauls who inhabit Afia. The cause why he triumphed fo late, was this, for that he would avoid making his answe (according to the act of Petilius) whiles Q. Terentins Culleo was Pretor, fearing he should burn in the same of the same sentence and judgment whereby L. Scipio had been condemned, or left the flame of another mans judgment, I mean the fentence wherby L. Scipio had been condemned, would have been too hot for him and caught hold of him likewife : confidering that the jury and enqueft were more incenfed and provoked against him then Scipio; for that he succeeding after him, had spoiled and marred with all kind of licentious loofness, the military discipline, which Scapio had observed most precisely and leverely. Neither was he noted and touched in name for thole things only which by bare hearfay were reported to have been done in the province, far remote from the view of men, but alfoolthose particular instances to be seen daily in the demeanor of his fouldiers. For verily the forein excelle and strange superfluities took beginning from the Asian army, who brought all with them into the City. They were the first with in Rome that took up the use of brasen tables of rich counterpoints, carpets, cupboord-cloths, bangings and curteins of fundry kinds of tyffue. Likewife of one footed standing tables, buffers and cupboords, which in those daies were counted magnificent and stately moveables. Then came up the maner of having at bankets finging miniken wenches, and fuch as could play upon the dulcimers or other instruments of musick, with dancers letters and other pattimes, and delightfome pleafures and fits of mirth at the table. Then began the board to be furnished and set out with more exquisit & deinty viands, and of greater expense. Then Cooks, who in old time were reputed the most contemptible flaves, as well for calling as eflimation, as for the use they were put unto, came to be in great request : and that which before time was a mechanicall kind of manual fervice, grew now to be accompted a feience of deep skill and understanding. And yet all these things that then bare so great a snew, were scarce so much as small feeds and flips, to the excessive superfluities that were to ensue.

Well, C. Manlins caried in triumph two hundred crowns of massic beaten gold, weighing twelve pound a peece : of filver 220000 pound weight : of gold 2103 pound weight : of Attick Tetradrachms 127000; of Ciltophors 250000; of Philip golden peeces 16320. Also much armor there was and spoils of Gauls carried in shew upon wagons : and 52 captains of enemies were led before his own chariot. Amongst the fouldiers he gave a donative of 42 denarii apeece, he doubled the same to every centurion. Also to every footman he gave double pay, and to every horiman triple. Many there were of all States and degrees, whom he rewarded with military prefents for especial fervice, and those followed next after the chariot. The fouldiers chanted such forgs and fonnets, as a man might easily fee they were composed to feed the humor of a General defirous of glory, and one that made much of his fouldiers especially; whereby his triumph was more honoted with the affectionat favour of them, then otherwife recommended and celebrated with the hearty love of the people. Howbeit the friends of Manlins lerved him in good flead to win the good will of them also through whose solliciting & earnest endevour, there passed an act of the Senat, that outofthat mony which had been the wed in triumph, there should be repaid unto the people that sublidy which had been levied among them for souldiers pay, and not yet contented back again. Sothe Treasurers of the City made true and faithfull paiment with all diligence of 25 affes and d.

in every thousand [for the loan.]

About the same time two Colonels came out of both provinces of Spain, with letters from C. Catinius and L. Manless the governors there: by which letters intelligence was given, that the Celiberians and Lustans were in arms, wasting and spoiling the lands of the Rom. confederats. The Senat referred the entire confultation of this matter to the new Magistrates. During the time of the Roman games that yeer which P. Cornelius Cethegus, and Anlus Posthamius Albinus reprefented, a certein mail or high pole which stood not fast in the shew place called Circus maximus, fell down upon the image of Polleutia, and overthrew it to the ground. The LL hereupon made fome fcruple in conference, and orderned, that the folemnity of those games should continue one day longer, and caused two images to be set up for that one, and that the new should be all gilt. Likewife the Plebeian plaies were renewed one day more, by the Ædiles, C. Sempronsus Blafus & M. Furius Luscus. The yeer following averted the Confuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus, & M. Marting Philippus from the army, from the regard I fay of wars and government of provinces abroad, G to the punishment of a certain intestine conspiracy at home. The Pretors last costs for their provinces. T. Manins had the juridiction of the citizens, and M. Licinius Lucullus between citizens & trangers. Unto C. Aurelius Scaurus fell the governance of Sardinia, and to P. Cornelius Sulla of Sicily: L. Quintius Crispinus was assigned to the hither Spain, and P Calpurnius Pisoto the tarcher. Both Confuls were en joined to make inquifition into fecret confpiracies within the City.

There was a certain Grecian of base degree and condition, who came first in Hetruria; a mannet endued with any of those arts, whereof the nation (of all others most learned) hash brought many unto us, as wel for the crudition of our minds, as the triming of our bodies but afseri-

ficing priest he was, and a divining wifard withall Neither was it one that made out ward pro-H faision of reaching men, and thereby getting a living openly, and fo by an open shew of religion possessed their heads and minds with fear and horror; but the knowledge he had for footh for certein hidden and fecret facrifices. These mysteries of his at first he taught but unto a few, howbeit afterwards they began to be communicated and divulged as well to men as women : and to this religion were added pleasures and delights of wine and good cheer, to the end that more cuftomers might be allured and enticed for to have a liking thereof. Now when wine had drowned and dulled the understanding : when the night season, when the entermingling of men and women together one with another (and namely, they of yong and tender yeers, with those of elder age) had clean put out and extinguished all respect and regard of shamefast honesty : there began first to be practifed all forts of corruption, for every one had all pleasures ready at commandment, and r his choice of those whereto by nature he was more prone and given to lust after. Neither was there wickedness committed here, of one fort, namely, the abufing of mankind and womenkind one with another without diftinction : but out of this shop and workhouse proceeded falle witpeffes, forging of feals, depositions, and teltimonies; and more then so, wrong and untrue informations. From hence came the divelish cast of polioning, and privy marders of the neerest of kindred in one boufe; and the same so secret, that other whiles the bodies would not be found to be committed to the earth. Many finfull parts were there played by way of fraud, guile, and cuning consenage; but more by apert force. As for violence, it was kept close and hidden, by reason that with the hideous noiles, with the found of tymbrels, tabors and cymbals, there could no voice be heard of such as cried out, when either they were forced to villany and abuse, or beaten to death, K The infection of this catching poilon of Hetruria, fored as far as Rome, like a contagious malady. At the first the spacious capacity of the City, having been used to wink and bear with some enormities, concealed all : at length revealed it was to the Cof. Posthumius, much after this maner.

The Baccha-

P. Ebutins (whole father had ferved in the wars in quality of a gentleman of Rome with a Cinals detected ty horse) left an orphan, after that his guardians were like wife deceased, became ward to his mother Daronie and his father in law (her fecond husband) T. Sempronius Rusilius, under whom he had his bringing up. Now as his mother was wholly devoted and obsequious unto her husband, to his father in law had to handled the matter in his guardianship, that he could make no good accompetences, and therefore his defire was, that either the infant his ward should be made away. or elfe obliged and enthralled unto him. The only way to compatie and bring this about, was the L corruption and abuse of the Bacchanals. The mother therfore upon a time called her fon unto ber, and told him, that the had made a vow for him when he was fick, that to foon as ever he thould recover and be well again, the would prefent him to the priefts of Bacchus to be confecrated and professed in their mysteries; and now, quoth she, seeing that by the goodness of the gods thou art amended, and I thereby obliged by the bond of that yow, I will acquit my felf therof, and perform it accordingly. She bare him in hand therefore, that he mult forten dayes live chaft, and not touch a woman, and at the ten dayes end after he had taken his supper, and was wel washed and parified after the manner, the would bring him into the holy place of those facred mysteries. Now there was a famous strumpet, by condition abondwoman enfranchised, named Hifpala Fessena, too good, I wis, for that occupation which she used while she was a young weach M and bondfervant : but yet still after that the was manumiled and in frank state of a free denizes, the maintained her felf by the lame trade and manner of living. Grown the was into familiar acquaintance with the forefaid yong Ebatim, by reason they were neer neighbours, and dwelt not far alunder : yet to, as the endamaged not the youth one jot either in charging his purie, or touching his credit. For the it was that first was inamored upon him, and him the woed a and for as much as he had but thort allowance every way from his mother and father in law, and by them kept hardly, he was maintained well by the bounteous liberality of this loving harlot. Nay, more than that, in continuance of time the was to deeply ingaged in him, that when her own patron was dead, and her felf at the disposition of none, the sued unto the Tribunes and the Pretor for another tutor, becau fe the meant to make her laft will and teltament, wherein the declared Ebuim her only heir in remained or to allthat the had. There patting thus between them thelegages and pledges of love, and they using to empart the one unto the other the fecrets of their hearts, the yong youth by way of mery and pleasant talk, willed her one day not to marvell or think any thing in it, if for certain nights he lay away and parted beds with ber : for that upon a religious zeal and devotion that he had, he was minded for to be professed and consecrated by the Priess of Bacehus, and all to be affoiled from a vow made in regard of his health. The woman hearing him lay fo, and treubled intipirit, Mary god torfend, (quoth fhe) and I would not that for all the good in the world. And better it were for me and you too to die both at once, then fo to de and with that the threatened, the curled and banded, withing all mitchief and plague to light upon them of that had put such a thing into his head. The youth wondred much to hear her words, and to see her to to fare and take on beyond all reaton and order, befeeching her of alloves to be content, and to forbear those curied speeches, and said it was his own mother, by the consent of his sather in law, who had enjoined him fo to do. And is it that father in law of yours, quoth the, (for peradventure I (hould not do well to blame your mother) that haltneth you by this action of yours to make shipwrack of your honesty and chastity, of your credit and good name, your hope another day, and laftly, to h zard your very life? Hereat the yong man marvelled much more then be-

A fore, and defired earnestly to know the depth of all this matter. Then after line had prayed all gods and goddelles to pardon her, if for tender love and affection that the bare built him the could neither will nor chale but reveal thole fecrets that indeed were to be contealed, fire fer rate on end and faid "That the her felf once entred into that chappel, when as the waited on her stiffrente. "but fince that the was made free and at herown liberty, the never fer foot within the dore. "And upon my knowledge (qd. fhe) it is the very thop and workhoule of all wickedness that "can be devised. And now for certain these two years lift past, there is not one professed and andmitted to those mysteries there, who is above 20 yeers of age. So soon as any one is industed "and brought thither, the or he is delivered to the priefts as a very facrifice to be killed : for they " lead them to a place which refoundeth with yelling and trying, with finging of divers contorts. B " with jungling noise of cymbals, with thumping & beating of tabers, to the end that the voice of "any one that cryeth and complaineth of force and violence done to the abule of his or fler bods " might not be heard. Now I beleech you therefore, and of all loves I pray you, that in any cafe by one means or other you avoid this, how loever ye do : and plunge nor your felf headlong this ther, where firit you fail be fure to endure and toffer, and afterwards to perpetrat and commit all abhominable wickednels not to be named. And never would fire let the youth go from her, untill be had made ber faithfull promite to abliefn and forbeat fuelt mysteries and ecremonies. When he was come home, and that his mother was in hand with himstelling blm what he mittedothisday and that day, and fo forthibe flatly denied and faid plainly, be would do neither the bite nor the other, and at one word, professed and consecrated he would not be, what over chine of Cir. His father in law was present and at one end of this resolute speech of his. His mother straight weies cried out and faid, that he could not find in his heart to lie apart from Hispala one teh daies, and that he was to far bewitched and envenomed with the chairs & poisoned allus ements ando its of that falle ferpent and perilous Hydra, that he had no telpective regard eithet of his mother, or mothers husband, no, nor any reverent fear of the immortall gods. The mother rated him of one fide, the farther baited and courfed him on the other, till in the end they hunted him out of dores with 4 bondflaves befides. The yong man betook blottelf to Ebutta, an autit that he had by his father fide, and she wed her the whole matter, why his mother had thrust him out of her house by the head and shoulders: which done, by her advice and counsell the next day lie de pened and declared the same in great fecret, without the hearing of any estably creature, to the D Conful Polithumius The Conful commanded him to repair again unto him three daies after, and fo for that time ditmiffed him. Then the Conful in the mean while enquired of his wives mother Subitio, a brave and tober matron whether the knew an old wife called Ebatia dwelling it the Avenue? Yes that I do qd fhe, and I know her to be an honest dame, and a woman of the old world, and few her like now adayes. I must needs speak with her (qd, he) and therefore I would have you fend a messenger unto her, for to will her to come hither. Ebutia at the fielt lending cathie uno Sulpiria; and the Conful within a while forted (as it were by chance) into their company, & began to find some talk of her brothers son Ebutius; with that the woman eyes stood full of water, and with tears the began to bewail the case and mithap of the young man; who being sported of all his goods and patrimony (by those who of all others should least have done it) was from at home in her honfe, chaled and driven out of doors by his own mother : for that the honelt good youth (God bleffe us all and be mercifull unto us) was unwilling to be confecrated and admitted tocertain filthy and detellable facrifices (If all be true that its reported thereof.) The Conful had enough now, and was fully perswaded of Ebution, that he had told him no lie. Then he gave Ebutta leave to go her waies home, and requelled his mother in law Sulpitia storelaid, to lend likewile for Hilpala from thence out of the Aventine to come unto her ; a woman (qd.he) affranthiled and well enough known to all the neighbours of that fireet : for that I have iomewh t allo tolay to her, Hifpala was somewhat disquieted at this message, to think that she should be sent for to fo noble and honourable a dame, and knew no cause wherefore. But after that the faw the lifters before the entry of the doore, the troop and train also belonging to the Confel, and withsubse Conful himself in person, she was altonied and (in manner) half dead. The Consul taking with him his wives mother, had the woman into an inward room of the houle, and laid unto bit, that the need not to be affraid, if to be the could find in her heart to tell the truth : and for Mance thereof, the should have the faithfull word and promite either of Sulpitia (diady of fo good credit and reputation) or of himfelf if need were. Only he would have her to utter and declare what was ordinarily done at the grove of Semilla in the Bacchanais, where they uled to facilitie in the night featon. The woman had no fooner heard that word, but the fell into fuch a har, trembling and quaking all over her body, that for a good while the was not able to open her is and speak a word : but after the was come to her felf again out of this trance, and by them beauted and encouraged, the faid, that when the was a very yong wench and a bond maid, the, togener with her militedic, was there profeded and confectated that for certain years of late, and ouncly fince that the was affranchiled and made free, the was not sequented with the place, nor will not what work was there. I contile thanks for this yet (quoti the Conful) that thou deniell to how thou wert there entred into that profession; burtay on and tell out the reft as truly and hithfully. She answered again, that the knew no more then she had already disclosed. The Cos uplyed upon her and said, that in case the weret ken in a trip, & that mother came forthro he. beck reproved her, the should seither find the fame pardoning have the like favour at his hande

as otherwise the might if of her felf the confessed the thing , forstmuch as he who had all from H your own mouth, hath already discovered the whole. The woman knew where he was then, and was periwaded verily (as it was indeed) that Ebutias was a blab of the tongue, and had revealed this fecret : whereupon the fell down at the feet of Sulpitia; and first began in most humble manner to beleech berithat the would not tuffer, that words of courie pasted between her an entranchited woman and her paramour, should turn not only to carnell and importance, but also to a capitoll matter to touch her as much as her life was worth : for what I said (quoth she) was but to fright him, and not torthat I knew any fuch thing. Poft hamins beteat was chafed, and fellinto a fir of choler . What? (quoth he) thou thinkelt belike that theu art jelling and cogging with thy lover Ebusius, and forgettelt how thou art in the house of a right worfhipfull lady, and in communication with a Contel. But Sulpitia on the other fide, willed her to thand up, (affrighted I as the was and withall, both exhorted her to be of good cheer, and also appealed the wrath of ber fon in law. In the end after fhe bad taken a better heart unto her, fhe greatly blamed & found fault with the difloyalty and fallhood of Ebutius for ferving her to, and requiring her uni badly again for to fingular a good turn that the had done him, and then faid, That the flood in great awe of the gods, whose secrets the should reveal and divulge; but in greater fear of men, who no doubt for bewrsying their matters, would be ready to tear her in pieces with their very hands. And therefore the belought Sulpria, and entreated the Conful to take some order for her, and to fend her into some placeout of Isaly, where the might paffe the reft of her dates in fatety yet of her life. But of good cheer woman (quoth the Conful) let me alone for that, I will provide well enough, that thou that live at Rome, and that without all danger. Then declared Hippalathe ori- K girall and first commencements of these facrifices and folemnities. At the beginning (qd, she) it was priviledged place & confecrated for women only & they alone medled with those mysteries; nguber was it the cultome and manner, that a man should enter in among them: and three let holidayes they had in the yeer, during which time, the priefts of Bacchus performed their ceremonics in the day time, and folk were admitted by them, to their religion and profession; and women they were all (and those matrons) who were created prietts for that purpote, in their time & cum one after another. But Paculla Minia (a Campane woman) when the was the pricit, changed all, as being advertised and admounhed by the gods to to doe; for the was the first that faced and admitted men, to wit, her owntons Minius and Herennius the Certinians : the sittred the folemnity from the day to the night; and for three daies in the whole yeer, the ordeined fiveine. L very month, to leave for the attendance and ministery of these mysteries. Since which time that thele tacrifices & ceremonies were thus divulged, & men nd women intermingled together, & the licentious liberty of the night time also to help all forward, there is no act to wicked, no fact to filthy, but there it is committed , and more fintul& unnatural abute there is, of mankind one with another, then there is of women. If any are either unwilling to fuffer this foul filthinels, or bellir themselves more dully in the healthy action and performance of that villany, such presently are to be killed and sacrificed as beatly. And this is supposed amongst them, the principal point and sum of their religion, to hold and believe that nothing is unla wfull what loever. The men shaking and wagging their bodies to and fro after a fanancall falhion, as if they were diffracted & out of their right wits, teem to divine and tell things to come. The women, attired like the she-priess of Bar. M chus, with their heads und and their hair hanging toole about their eats, run down with fisming torches to the river Tyber; where they dip their torches into the water, and take them out again light purning ttill pecame they are made with alphur vive and quick lime; and they fay that certain men are by the gods carried away from among them, no man knoweth whither; fech as they bind falt to a certain engine or frame, and harry them out of fight into certain hidden caves. and those be such, as either would not wear to be of their conspiracy, or be partners with them in al their milebievous designments, or endure against kind to be abused. The number & multitude there affembled, is exceeding great, and grown now be another body of a people . and among them are fome noble perions, as well men as women. But now for these two yeers last past, or N deined it is. That none should be there professed and sacred above twenty yeers olds for such ages they lay for to ferve their turn, as are foonest feduced and drawn to errour, or most subject to be forced to sufter abute and villany. When she had thus finished her information and discovered all, the fell down upon her knes again, and lay at their feet, and repeated her former topplication the fecond time, to wit, That he would fend her away out of the countrey. Then the Confulintreated his mother in law to spare some void corner of her house, whereunto Hispala might retire her felf, and there make her abode. So the allowed her an upper lodging in her houle, and the and the flairs that led towards the fireet were flopped up, and the entrance turned into the house. Then presently were all the movesble goods and houshold stuff of Fessenia removed, and her family lent for thither, and there entertained. Likewife Ebution was commanded to go and lodge of with a tenant or client belonging to the Conful. Thus when both the informers were formcoming and under Postbumus his hand, he declared the whole matter to the Senat. And after be had laid everything auroad in order, namely, what was reported unto him first, and what he had learned afterwards by enquiry, the Lords of the Senat were surprized with exceeding great fear, as well in regard generally of the commonweal, left those conspiracies, nightly meetings and conventicles, might import some secret complot of mischief and danger : as also for doubtin in particular, that tome of their own friends or family should be accessary and culpable.

A The Senat yet were of this mind, that the Contul was highly to be praifed and thanked, for that he had found out and brought to light fuch a matter as this, both with fo fingular care & diligence. and allo without any tumult and uprore. Then they took order and ordained, Imprimis. That the Confuls should have an extraordinary commission to make leach and inquisition into these Bacchanals and night facrifices. Item, That Ebneum and Feffenia the informers thereof should not be prejudiced thereby, nor come to harm for it, yea, and that a recompence and reward should be propounded to others that could give light and reveal the fame. Item, That the Priests belonging to thele religions, be they men or women, should be sought our not only at Rome but in all other markets towns, fairs and places of frequent refort and convented before the Coff. to be and remain at their disposition. Item, That proclamation be made at Rome, and edicts sent through-Bout all Italy, that no perion whatfoever, who had been facred & professed religious by the Priests of Bacchus, refort any more into affembly or conventicle for those facrifices, nor yet do ought pertaining to such divine service. And above all things, that information and presentment be made of all those that had frequented such meetings or conventicles, to commit whoredome or any fuch filthiness and wickedness, And these were the ordinances of the Senat, The Coss, then granted their warrants out to the Ædiles Curule to make diligent learth and enquiry for those Priests of that religion, and upon apprehension to keep them in free ward and large prison forthcoming for to be examined : also to the Ædiles of the Commons to look well, that no service of the gods be celebrated in fecret, Moreover, the Triumvirs capital were straightly charged to set good watch and ward throughout the City, and see to meetings by night, for fear that no scare-fire caught hold Cof any place. To those three Commissaries or Triumvirs were five other Quinquevirs adjoyned asfifants, who every one should watch well and take charge of all the houses of his quarter with in Tyberus. Then the Coff having fet them about these their severall charges mounted up the Rostra orplace of publike audience. And when the people were assembled together, then the Consul afterhe had pronounced the folemn prayer which Magistrats are wont to use as a preamble, before they make speech unto the people began his Oration unto them in this wife. " Never in any The Oration "of your affemblies O Quirites, was this folemn prayer unto the gods either to meet and conve- of the Conful " nient, or fo requisit and needfull as in this, to advertise and put you in mind, that those be the Polinum, for "truegods indeed whom your ancestors ordained, that you should honour, serve, worship, and of the Baccha-"pray unto and not these here who prick & provoke (as it were) with goads of furies, your spirits nals. If you know not all, I doubt I should give "you occasion to be negligent; again if I discover all, I fear me that I shall affright & terrifie you "too much. But what and how much foever I shall say be ye fure it will be far less than the great-"nels and enormity of the thing requireth. Yet endeavour will we so much to deliver, as may suf-"fice to give you a warning and watch-word to take heed. This am I well assured of that you un-"deritand not only by hearing and bare report, but also by the ringing noises and yelling cries in "the night feafon, that the Bacchanals have been a long time kept over all Italy, yea, and in many "places throughout the City of Rome, which resoundeth again therewith. But what manner of E" thing it is, I am verily perswaded there is not one of you that knoweth. Some believe that it is a "certain worthip and lervice of the gods; others suppose it is some soolery and wanton pastime "tolerated and winked at, But be what it will be, they thinkthere are but a few interessed & em-"ployed therein. As touching the number and multitude of them, if I should rell you that they "were many thousands you cannot chuse but suddenly be asraid unless I also presently shew, who "they be and of what quality. Know ye therefore first and formost, that the most part of them are "women(& from thence is fprung the fource of all this mile hief.) Then are there men indeed, but "fuch as for all the world refemble women, fo effeminat they are: fuch I tay as have abandoned themselves as well to be abused as to abuse others: fanatical persons and bereaved of their wits." "by reason of excessive watching past sence & even astonied with bibbing of wine without mea-F "fure, with houting, hollowing & crying all night without intermission. This conventicle of con-"spirators is yet of no great force, how beit it gathereth much drength, in regard that they multi-"ply still, & their number is every day more than other. Your ancestors in times past would in no "wife admit that ye should assemble together at a venture and without important and just occa-"fion unless it were either by rearing a standard or banner upon the fortrels for to levy an army; "or to gather the people together to give their voiced in elections of Magistrats; or that the "Tribunes proclaimed a general congregation of the common people; or some of the Magistrats "fummoned them to an open audience for to hear an Oration: and wherefoever a multitude were "thus met together there they ordained and thought meet to have a lawfull governour and over-"feer of them. But what kind of night conventicles think ye first these might be & namely, where G"men and women are met and thronged together pell mell one with another? Infaith if ye wift "at what age they of the male fex are professed and made novices, ye would not only pity them, "but also be ashamed and dismaied. Think ye my masters Quirits, that young men thus profes-"fed & having taken this oath, are meet to make fourdiers of? and that ye are to put weapons "into the hands of fuch as are taken out of that flinking and deteftable Chappel? For wot ye well this, that all the sinful "parts committed for these late years, were it filthy lust, crafty cozening, or any wickedness what-4 foever, proceeded & prung out of this one ungracious chappel and place of counterfeit holinefs, and no other. Now are they (ingled by themselves apart) afraid of you, when they see you thus all assembled together, but so soonas you are retired either to your houses within the City, or farms in the country & by that means fevered afunder they will surely meet together; devide they will and consult both so save them-" felves, and also to ruinat and destroy you at once. Then take heed to your selves; then shall you (fingled one from another) be in dread and danger of them all in generall, It behoveth therefore k se every one of you to defire and wish that all they who belong any way unto your charge, be wise " and well given. Then, if either fleshly lust or furious rage, have drawn & haled any one of them theadlong into that gulph and link of lin, to hold luch a person to be of their crue, with whom he of hath thus fworn and devoted himfelf to all fin and abominable wickedness, and not reckon him of your own retinue and train any more. Moreover, careless I am not of your own persons in "this behalf, that none of you should be seduced and led away with errour. For nothing is there in the world, that deceiveth more under fair semblance, than false religion. For when the name and Majesty of the gods is precended to cover and colour naughtiness, suddenly there entreth "into our mind a scrupulous awe, which doth captivate and possels our conscience, for fearlest c' in chastifing and punishing human trespasses, we violat and offend some divine right and power L "therewith, But of this scrupulosity discharged ye are, by an infinit number of Pontifical decrees, "acts of the Senat, yea, and answers of divine Sages and Soothfayers. For how many a time and " often in the daies of our fathers and grandfathers, hath commission been granted to the Magi-" firsts, To restrain and forbid expressely all forrain facrifices and strange liturgies? To chase & ba-6, nish all odd hedg-Priests, Wizards, Tellers of Fortune, and Magicians out of the common place. "out of the shew place and theatre, yea, and quite out of the City? To search out all their books 6 of Magick and Prophetics, and to fet a fire on them ? Lattly, to abolish all other order and man-" ner of facrificing but according to the Canon, form, and order of Rome? For they judged (wife "men as they were and deeply ieen in all divine and humane laws) nothing fo forcible to ruinat and overthrow religion, as when divine service is celebrated after some strange and formainfa-M fhion, and not according to the ancient cultome of the place. Thus much I thought good by way cofcaveat to foretell you of to the end that no superflitious opinion should trouble your spirits "when you shall see us to demolish and overthrow the Bacchanals, and scatter these unlawfull " affemblies. For all this will we do with the good leave favour, and grace of the gods. Who be-" ing highly offended to see their divinity and godhead thus polluted with wicked and abomina-" ble filthine's have discovered the same lying hid in darkness, and brought it to light: neither in " their wildom and providence, was it their will and pleasure; that such enormities thus detected " should remain unpunished but be suppressed and extinguished for ever. Now hath the Senat "directed out unto me and my Colleguean extraordinary commission and watrant to make due "inquifition hereinto by vertue whereof, we for our parts will accomplish our charge according. N "Iy with all diligence and expedition. As for the night-watch throughout the City, we have gi-" ven order already to the inferior Magistrats to look unto it. Likewise, meet and reason it is, "that every one of you according to his place and calling, quit himself well in whatsoever shall "beimposed and laid upon him: and especially to endeavour and prevent that no danger or mu-"tiny arise by the malicionines of those that are culpable and offenders. Then the Confuls commanded the acts of the Senat in this behalf to be read openly: they propounded and promised also rewards to all informers, that either convented and brought before them any such persons, or presented their names, if they were absent and out of the way. And look whosoever were thus nominated and fled upon it, they would affign him a certain day to make his appearance: upon which day, it he answered not to his name when he were called he should be condemned not of with anding his absence. And if any of their names were presented, who hapned at the time of the information to be without the land of Italy, the should have a longer term let down to come in and make his answer. After this, they published an Edict, forbidding (left any one should be defirons to fell or buy ought tending to flight and departure) to receive, conceal, aid or maintain by any means those that were about to flie. After the assembly of the people dismissed, great feat there was over all the City: neither was it contained within the walls, liberties, and territory only

A of Rome; but in all parts of feels they began to quake and tremble for fear ; and namely, after than letters came from their friends and acquaintance touching the ordinance of the Senat the folemn affembly of the people, and the Edict of the Confuls aforelaid. The next night following that, day (wherein this matter was thus declared openly in audience before the people) many would eladly have flatted and been gone, but apprehended they were and brought back again by the Triunvirs, who had let a good watch at every gate. Many prefentments were made, and certain perfons thus prefented, as well men as women, killed them elves. It is reported that there were found in this conspiracy of both sexes one with another above seven thousand, I he principal heads were known for certain to be Mand L. Catinian, Romans both and by calling not to good as Senators: "De Plebe" L. Ophermins of Falerii, and Minius Corninus a Campane, These were the ringleaders of the self. R from them arole all mischief and villary what soever the ewere the chief Prietts (for ooth) and the founders of this religion. To apprehend there per ons with all speed, no possible means, were negicated, And when they were brought before the Contuis, they conteffed all and for anylet in them, they might prefently have been condemned. But fuch a number there was of them who fled out of the City, that because the actions and goods of many men hereby were in danger to be loft and periffy, the Prators T. Manius and M. Liemius were confirmined by the Senat roets thiny daies respit and delay for the pleasantil line h time as the Confuls went through with their inquisition. By occasion of the same infrequency (for that they whose names were pretented nesthermade answer nor could be found) the Confuls were enforced to ride their cir. uit about magketrowns and places of refort, and there to hold Affine and Seffions for to make inquition; and C indicially to proceed in fentence against the offenders. As many as they found to be only entred. and to have taken orders, namely, such as according to a certain form of words endired and prompted by the Priett, had made their prayers taying after him (in which was contained a detefiable fact ament and oath that they took to commit all wicked acts and heaftly filthiness, and yet notwithstanding had offered and done no such act either in their own persons, or in others, to which they were obliged by outh) those I say they let fill in prison and durance. But such as were defiled with filthines, of nit, polluted with bloudy murders in has were attaint and flained with bearing falfe witness, with forging and joiling of wills and tettaments, with counterfeiting of feats, and other fuch cozening catts, attolethey executed with loss of ife, and the number of the n that thus were put to death furmounted those other that suffered only imprisonment. But Da wondrous multitude there was of both fores the one and the other, and those as well-women as men. As many of the women as were condemned they committed over to their next kinsfolk. or to those guardians under whose tuition and subjection they were that they might themselves privatly at home punish them accordingly. But if there were none to be found meet to do the execonon, then they suffered publikely abroad in the face of the world. After this a commission was granted to the Confulsator to overthrow and pull down first at Rome, and then throughout Italy, alithep a.e. of thele Bacchanals, un.els in any of them there food fome oid altar or image confe rated. And for the time to come, by an act of the benut a prohibition went out, that there should be no Barch anals any more either in Rom or in Italy Moreover, It any person made some conflience of this religion. and held it for a devout folemn, and necessary institution and proten fled before the Prator of the City that becould not lay away the same without prick, remorie, and clog of configence: then the faid Præ or was to put the cause in question before the Senar. and if the Senat (affembled in no less trequen with an one hundred) would allow and permit the fime, then might the party solemnize that devotion and divine service: provided alwaies Athat there were not above five per ons present thereat, to assist him nor any common silver to be used inthe ministery, nor Offer-master nor Priest. Over and besides, another act of the Senat there was joyned unto this, and the same moved by the Consul Q. Martins, That a tou hing those perions whom the Conful had for the informers and revealers of this matter, the full authority in disposing of them, should be wholly referred to the Senat, so soon as Sp. Posthumius had finihed his inquisition, and was returned to Rome. As for Cerrinius the Campane, they ordained that he should be sent to Ardea there to lie in prilon, and that the Magistrates of Ardea should have a charge given them beforehand to look to their prisoner more straightly, that neither he brake prilon and made an escape, nor yet might have means and opportunity to make himself away. After a certain time Sp. Posthumius came to Rome again, and when he put to question beforethe Senat, concerning the reward of P. Ebutius, and Hiffala Foffenia, for that by their means the Bacchanals were disclosed, there passed an act and decree, That the Treasurers of the City should deliver unto them out of the City Chamber 100000 affes apiece. Also that the Consuls should deal with the Tribunes of the Commons for to prefer a bill unto the people, as soon as Possibly they might that P. Ebutius for ever might be exempt from souldiery, and have his pension and fee as it he had accomplished his term of service by law required, so as he neither were comgelled to go to wartage against his will nor the Centors should assign unto him a publike horse of letvice, Moreover, that Fesseria Hispala might have the liberty and power to make a deed of silion alienation of her goods auto whom the pleased, yea, and spend the same, and do therewith what the thought good hem. That the might be wedded out of her own family into what house he would her felf and make choice of her tutor and patron to her own liking and contentment, all her husband by his will and testament had so ordained and set down. Item, That she might be wedded to one of frank condition or freeborn and that he who had espoused and married her, faould not thereby inflain diferedit, or receive damage. Finally, that not only the Coffand Prators R now in place, but a fo those bereafter to come, should provide and take order that no wrong be done to that woman, but secure her from all harm. This the Senat judged meet and require to be done. All the sethings were like wise propounded unto the Com. and executed according to the ordinan e of the Senat. Finally, as touching both the impunity and also the recompense of other the Innomers, it was referred to the discretion of the Confuls.

Bythistime Q: Martine alio having finished the inquisition in his circuit and quarter, made preparation to go into his Province of Liguria, after he had received for to supply and make up his legions 30 00 foot, and 150 horsemen Romans, before 5000 footmen and 200 horse of Lating, The fame Province with the like number as well of horfeas foot, was decreed like wife unto his companion in government. Those armies they took charge of which the former year C. Fl. mining 1 and M. Emvlou the Coff, had : moreover, by an act of the Senar enjoymed they were to enroll two new legions besides: and withall they levied of the Latine allies 20 000 1000, and 3000 hories 36. ofootmen alfo and 200 horsemen Romans. All their forces (setting ande the legions fit was thought good to be led to umish out the army in Spain, And thenore the Cost, whiles they were themselves in person occupied about the foresaid inquisitions, gave commission to T. Memmiot to take the musters, And when those enquests were performed and done as is beforelaid 2. Marelim cook his journey lists of the twain towards the Appears in Liguria, But whiles in eager puttie of them he engaged himself into the fe set and blind paffes, wherein at all times they had their larking retreats and places of fale receit : within those fireights and passages which the enemies had leized before, he was environed by them in a place of great disadvantage: where he lost 40 0 K fondiers, with three enigns of the fe and legion, and eleven banners of the L tine allies which weite all taken by the enemies. Allo, much armour and many weapons were thrown away inte and these, by reason that they were en umbred therewith as they fled through the woodypaths of the fortest : neither did the Ligurians give over their chase, before that the Romans ended meis flight, The Conful to foon as he was escaped out of the enemies territory fent his army awaying divers parts of the peaceable country to the end, that it might not be feen, how mu h his tot es were empaired, yet could not be for all that supprets and imother the bruit that was blown as broad of his unfortunat journey, nor cancell the remembrance of the overthrow: for ever fire, the forseft out of which the Ligarians hunted him was called, The threights of Martin. A litte before the news of the affairs in Ligaria, the letters out of Spain were read. containing fortow L mixed with joy sto wit, That C. Carinim (who two years before went as Prator into that Province lought a field with the Luftan in the terri ory of All , where 600 enemies fell upon the (word ; and the reft were discomfitted put to flight and dri en out of their camp. A terwards, he conducted his legions to the Mault of the town Afta, which he forced and won, with no greater ado than before he gained their camp. But as he approached near the walls and took no good heed to himself, he was wounded, and of his hurt within few dates died. Upon the reading of thefe letter (importing the death of the Pro-Prator :) the Senat was of advice to dispatch a mellenger (to overtake the Prator C. Calphurn: au) as far as the port of Luna, and give him to underfland from the Senat that their advice was he should make all the haste he could in his journey, to the end, that the Province might not be without a governor there to command. The courtier M which was fent, within four daies arrived at Luna: and but few daies before, Calpharnian was departed and had put himself in his journey.

Moreover, L. M. unlim. Acid mm. (who was gone into his Province at the same time that C. Cotinim went.) struck a battell likewine with the Cekiberians in the hitter Province of Sp in. But shey departed on both sides out of the field with doubtful victory save only that the Cekiberians the next night following, dislodged and removed from thence: whereby the Romans had libery and time both to inter their dead, and to gather up the spoils of their enemies. And withinker daies after, the same Cekiberians having raised a more winsant army, of themselves gave the Romans battell near the City Calagurrie. It is not set down in the history, what should be the saile why they were the weaker, considering their number was re-enforced: but solied they were in Night and had the overthrow. Of the enemies there died upon 12000 and not so sew second seep prisoners: and the Romans likewise were Masters of the camp. And had not M. inlim been empeached and restrained in this train of victory (which he hothy followed) by the coming of Calemparius his successor in government, the Cekiberians had been utterly subdued, The new Prators withdrew both armiesto their wintring harbors.

At the fame time that thefe news came our of Spain, the plaies called Taurilia were enhibited two daies together, in honour of the gods. And after them, M. Fulvius fet out (with great furniture in fumptions maner for the space of ten days) his plaies which he had vowed in the Etolina war. And for to do him honour, and grace this folemaity, many cunning actors and players came out of Greece. This was the fait time that there was represented at Rome the shew och champions of and wrestlers for the best game: then also was exhibited the passime of hunting and baiting Lions and Panthers: and in one word, these sports were celebrated with as great magnificence and variety almost as the modern passimes and games in these daies. After all this, was holden a Novendial seast; during which, there was much facrificing, and all by occasion that for three daies it rained stones in the Picene country: and because it was reported, that the lightning indirest places, and in sindry sorts, had blasted and lightly singed the garments especially of many solk.

A Tothe faid feaft, there was adjoyned a supplication of one day, ordained by a decree of the Pontifices, for that the Chappel of the goddels Ops (standing in the Capitol) was simitten with a thunderbolt. In regard of these prodigies, the Cossiprocured explation by sacrificing greater beasts, and so they purged and hallowed the City. At the same time word was brought out of Embria, that there was an Hermaphrodite or Scrat found almost twelve years old. This was held for a detestable monster; and therefore order was given, that it should be kept out of the territory of Rome, and killed out of hand.

The lame year, certain Gauls from beyond the Alps passed into the territory of Venice, without forraging, spoiling, and using any hostility; and not lar from the place where as now Agustian stands that the latest dupon a plot of ground to build a City in. Certain Roman Embassadors were from this matter beyond the Alps; where they received this intelligence and answer from the inhabitants of the country. That neither those Gauls took that voyage and expedicion by authority and warrant from the whole nation neither knew they what they did in Italy.

Lécipio likewise about the same time, set out his plaies for ten daies together; for which he said, that he had made a vow during the time of the war against Antiochus; & he defraid the charges thereof with the money contributed unto him by divers KK, and States for that purpose, Valenius Antiochus; & he defraid the charlesius Antiochus; & he defraid the charlesius Antiochus; & for to take up certain controverses and differences between the two KK. Antiochus and Eumenes: and then it was said he he had the did contribution was made, and may skilly artificers and plaiers gathered unto him out of all Assiand in the end, after this Emchallesian and the senation thereof by Valerius his saying) he vowed them.

The year being now at an end, Q. Martius in his absence was to leave his Magistray; & Q. Possimius having late upon the inquisition aforeiated, and with all fide ity and carefull diligence that might be brought it to an end, held the solemn aftembly for election of Magistrats: wherein were choicn Coss. An Claudius Pulcher & M. Sempronius Tudata. And the morrow after were elected for Prators, P. Cornelus: Cethequs, A. Possimius Albinus, C. frants Stellage, Attillus Serranus, L. Possimius Tempsanus, & M. Claudius Marcellus. At the years end upon the relation of Sp. Possimius the Cost that in his vistuation about the enquetts aforeiaid. as he rode along the lea cost of the driatick sea, and Buxentum upon the Tuscay. T. Manius the City Prator by vertue of an act of the Senat in that behalf) created three Commissiaries, called Triumvirs, for to enroll and plant new inhabitants there, namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Tucius, and E. Bebius Tamphulus.

The war against King Perfeus and the Macedonians, which now was a breeding, arole not upon that cause & occasion which most men imagine nor yet from Perfeus himself for the first groundwork thereof was laid by Philip, who if he had lived longer, would have been seen in open action. One thing there was above the rest which stung him, at what time as the Romans imposed conditions upon him after he was vanquished, to wit, That the Senat laid a bar for to be revenged of those Macedonians who had revolted from him : which he despaired not but it had been posfible to have obtained at their hands, confidering that Quinting in the capitulations of peace re-E served that point entire and excepted not against it. Now afterwards, when Antiochus was defeated in the battel of Thermopyla, and that both Philip & the Coffentred upon the feverall exploits; Actius went in hand to affault Heraclea, and Philip at the same time the City of Lani. Heraclea was no sooner forced, but Philip had commandment to levy his siege before Lamia, and the town was yielded to the Romans: and this he took to the heart. Howbeit the Col appealed his cholerior the time, in that making hafte in person to Naupactum (unto which town the Ætolians aftertheirrout were retired)he suffered Philipto war upon Athamania and Amina der; to adjoyn also and lay unto his kingdom those Cities which the Ætolians had taken from the Thessalians. Now had Philip chased Aminander out of A hamania, and won certain Cities without any great ado, Demetrias alio (a strong City of great importance, and very commodious for all things) together with the nation of the Magnetes he brought under his obedience. After this he forced certain towns in Asia, which were troubled with the jeditious variance of their principal and great personages by reason that they knew not how to use their new liberty, wherewith they had not been acquainted : he won thole Cities (I say by taking part with those, who in this civill diffention were the weaker and otherwise would have gone to the walls. By these means the wrath of the King against the Romans was well allaied for the present: nevertheless, he ceased not all the time of peace to bethink how he might gather more strength, and be able to war again, whenfoeverany good occasion should be presented unto him. He encreased therefore the revenues of the Crown, not only by raising taxes out of all the fruits of the earth and letting impost and customs upon all merchandise brought into his Realm by sea from forrain parts; but also revived thererts & issues of the old mines which had discontinued, yea, & in many places ordained new. Moreover, to replenish his country, which by many calamities following wa , was dispeopled, he not only took order that his subjects should multiply by forcing them toget, breed, and bring up children, but also translated a great multitude of Thracians into Macedony; and for a good time wherein he was in repose and rest from the war, he bent his whole mind, and employtdall his fludy how to make himfelf great, and augment the puissance of his kingdom. Then old matters and quarrels were renewed, which might whet his stomack, and kindle his anger against the Romans. For the complaints which the Theffalians and the Perrhochians made for that their H Cities were by him possessed likewise those grievances which the Embassadors of King Emmess laid abroad touching the Thracian Towns, which he seized and held by sorce, were beard by the Romans ; so as it evidently appeared, that they neglected them not. But that which moved the Senat moft, was this, That they had intelligence how he intended to be Lord of Any; and Marorea as for the Theilalians, they took lefs regard of them, Moreover, there came the Emballadors of Athamania, who complained not for the loss of some part of their territory, nor that he encroached upon their frontiers, but that all Athamania full and whole, was reduced under the inbjection and jurisdiction of the King. The banished persons also of Maranea, who had been chased out of the City by the Kings garrison (for that they flood in defence and maintenance of liberty) made relation, that not only Maroned was in the hands of Philip, but the City of Enu allo, Like I wife there came Embassadors from Philip, to purge him of all their matters laid to their charge, who averred, That their King and Master had done nothing but by commission and warrant from the Roman General. They pleaded and alledged that the case of the Thessalian Pertherbian, and Magnetian Cities, yea, and the whole nation of Athamania together with Aminander, was all one with the Ætolians: namely, That after Antiochus the King was chaled and expelied the Col, himfelf being emploied and occupied in besieging the City of Etolia, sent Philiptor to recover the States abovenamed, which being vanquished in war, were now subject unto him. Hereupon the Senat, because they would not determine and set down any thing in the absence of the King, sent three Delegates or Commissioners to decide these controverses, to wit, Q. C. acilius Metellus, M. Babius Tamphilus, and T. Sempronius, Upon whose arrivall, there was published a generall Diet of K all those States that were at difference with the King to be holden at Tempe in Theffaly. When they were all fet there in councill, the Roman Legats, as umpiers and judges, the Theffalians, Perrhoebians, and Athamans as plaintiffs and accuters, and Philip as defendant to hear and receive the challenges and accusations against him; the hief Embassadors from the said Cities, pleaded against Philip bitterly or mildly, more or less, according to the several disposition of their natures, and the proportion either of affectionate favour or malicious hatred which they bareto him, Now all the question and debate touching Philippopolis, Tricca, Phaloria, Eurymena, and other towns about them was this Whether those pieces, considering the Ætolians won and held them by force (& well known it was that Philiphad taken them from the Etolians) belonged in tight to the Theff ians or appertained of old time to the Ætolians? for Acilius had granted them un- L to the K, upon these conditions, namely, if they were any of the appurtenances of the Attolians, and if they combined and took part with the Ætolians willingly of their own accord and not by constraint and force of arms. Upon like terms stood the controverse of the Perthabian and Magnefian towns. For the Ætolians had brought a confusion in all their tenures, by reason that they held and possessed those Cities, by taking their vantage upon divers occasions. Besides these subffantiall points properly to be decided, the Theffalians came in with their complaints also: " For "that those towns (in case they were out of hand delivered unto them, yet) he should render them spoiled, naked, and desolat. For overand besides those who miscarried by casualty of war, " Philip had carried away into Macedony 500, even the principall flower of their youth, and abu-"fed them like flaves, in putting them to bale ministeries & servil drudgeries, and look whatioe M "ver by compulsion he redelivered to the Thessalians, he had taken order afore that they should be good for nothing. As for example (fay they) Thebes in Phihia, the only maritime Cityfor " much traffick and merchandise, was in times past gainful and commodious to the Thessalians, " and brought them great revenues and profits, But Philip had turned the staple and all the trade "and negotiation by sea from thence to Demetrias, and having got hulks and hoys, caused them "to baulk and pais by Thebes, and direct their course for Demetrias. Nay, he could not so much as "hold his hands from evillentreating their Embassadors, who by law of nations are inviolable, " For he forelaied them in ambush, as they were in their journey to T.Q inius. By which means " the Theffalians all in generall were so over-awed by him, and put in such fear, that thereisnot " a man amongst them dare open his mouth, either in their own Cities, or in any of the Diets and "Councils of the whole nation. For why? their patrons of whom they hold their liberty are far " off, but an imperious Lord they have that fitteth ever on their skirts, and pricketh them conti-" mually in the fides, and will not suffer them to use and enjoy the benefits granted them by the "people of Rome. For take away from them the liberty of speech once, what freedom have they " left? And even at this present for all the assurance and confidence they have in the priviledge of Embafladors, they rather figh and groan out their words, than speak frankly, and parley with li-"berty. And unless the Romans provide better in some good sort, that both the Greeks remain-"ing in Macedony, may be void of fear, and Philip also curbed and kept short for being so bold, it "will be to no purpofeat all, that either he was vanquished, or they enfranchised, He is therefore " to be held in with a rougher and harder bit in his mouth, like an headstrong and upraly horses that will not be ruled with a gentle fnaffle. In this sharp and eager manner dealt the last, where "as the former had used fair language to appease and mollifie his anger, beseeching his grace to " pardon them incase they spake their minds for their liberty, to lay down the rigor of a Lord and "Master to bear himself like a kind ally and loving triend, & to take example of the Romans and "them to imitate, who chofe rather to gain affociats by love, than configain them by fear, After "audience given to the Thessalians, the Perthabians came in place, and alledged, that Gonnocondre

The nine and shirtiesh Book of T.Livius.

A "lus (a City which Philip named Olympias) belonged in right to Perrhabia; & earnest they were, "that it might be reflored unto them. They demanded alio to have Mallan and Ericinium again, "Then the Athamans put in, and inakefor their liberty, and to have the forts of Athenaum and Poetneum rendred unto them, Philip because he would seem more like a plaintiff than a defen-"dant & to accuse rather than to be accused, began himself also with complaints, He found himdelf grieved, that the Theffalians had won by force of arms the City Menelaus in Delopin part of "the appurtenances belonging to his kingdom, Item, That the same Thessaians and the Perrhabians together had forced Perra in Pieria, As for Xynia (an Etolian town without all question) othey had indeed laid it unto his feignory, but Parachelou, which should be under sichamanias a by no right in the world was annexed to the Theflatians, & comprised within their charter. For R" as touching the matters (quoth he) charged upon me fo odioufly namely of laying await for the a Emballadors, of frequenting those port-towns or abandoning those : the one is a meer mockery "and ridiculous thing: namely, for me to give account what havens, merchants and mariners fail annoor arrive at the other is clean adverse & ontrary to my nature & that which I never could "abide to practice. For thele many years (qd, he) Embaffadors have never ceased and given over, "to inform grievous matters against me to the Roman Generals, and to the Senat at Rome: and "which of them ever to this day hath had so much as a foul word given again unto him from me? "Supposed & objected it is that once they were torlaid by the way as they were going to Quin-"timbut it is not faid withall what hapned unto them. This manner of dealing & acculation fa-"voureth of quarrellers that fain would have somewhat to lay, se it never so falle, when they can Cafind no matter of truth to charge a man withat. These These lians beyond all measure abose the "kindness & indulgence of the people of Rome, & string as men who had endured a long drought, "they drink over-greedily, pouring in sheer liberty & nothing else to it, and know not when to "make an end, and to break their draught: Like, for all the world to bondflaves fuddenly tetat "freedom beyond their hope and expectation whole manner is to break out into broad terms " and licentions language, and cannot contain but revile and rail at their very Masters, And at last, "in a furious fit of choler be burit forth into theie words, That the fun was not fet and gone to "bedforever, but would one day rife again. This minatory speech of his not only the Thessalians took to themieres but the Romans also confirmed as a glance at them. Upon their words arose some brait and murmuring in the assembly but being in the end appealed & stilled, he answered D the agents for the Perthæbians and Atham ans in this wile,"That the case and condition of those "Cities for which they frood, was one and the same namely, that the Cos, Acilius and the Ro-"mans passed them unto him by a deed of gist. as having aforetime belonged to their enemies. "Now if they who have given, will also take away the tame, then (qd, he) I must needs quit my "hold,and lole them : but in fo doing they shall to gratifie their fickle, in onstant and vain allies, "men of no regard, and good for nothing, do mere and manifest wrong to a far better and more "faithfull friend. For nothing is there in the world more thankless and less while accepted than li-"berry, especially with them who know not how to use it, & by abuse thereof will soon spill the "grace of such a benefit. Then the Roman Delegats having heard the reasons and allegations of both parties pronounced sentence, That the Macedonian garrisons should quit the Cities aboveglaid, and the Realm of Macedony beconfined within the ancient bounds and limits. As touching the injuries which they complained to have been reciprocally offered from one to another, there was a form and course of law to be set down which should contain a process and manner, how the matters between the Macedonians and the other nations might be reformed and composed. Hereat the King washighly offended and displeased, but the Delegats went their waies toward The salonica, to visit likewise the Cities of Thrace, and to hear their causes; where the Embassadors of King Eumenes made a speech to this effect.

"If the pleasure of the Romans be, that the two Cities Enus and Maronea shall be free, it is not "forus in modesty to fay any more, but advertise & admonish them to leave the same in reall and "not in verball liberty," and not suffer a gift by them granted to be impeached or intercepted by "another. But if they have less care and consideration of the Cities and States planted in Thrace, yet more meet and reason it is, that those places which sometimes were subject unto Antiochus, "hould fall to Eumener rather than to Philip; by way of recompence for war-service, in regard "as well of the merits of his father Attalus during the war against Philip, as of his own deferts, "who during the war with Antiochus, was personally present in all travels & dangers both by sea "and land. And to this effect, he hath besides an award of the ten Delegats passed already before-"hand, who in the grant and donation of Chersonnesses & Lysimachia, have no doubt given Ma-Transa & Enulikewise to be as dependants of a greater gift, confidering the near vicinity and "neighborhood of those other Cities. For, as concerning Philip, what hath he deserved at the "hands of the people of Kome? What right of feignory can he pretend, why he should plant gar-"filons in these Cities so far remote & distant as they be from the frontires of Macedony? I wish ye would call for the Maronits, and hear what they can say, who are able to enform you more "fully and certainly in all respects of the whole state of these Cities. Then were the Embassadors of the Maronits called in: who affirmed." That the King had a garriton not in one place only of "their City (as he had in other Cities besides) but in many quarters thereof at one time : so as "Maronea was pettered full with Macedonians. And therefore (fay they)the Kings favorits and "fluterers are they that rule all and bear the fway: they and none but they, may be allowed to

" freak both in Senat at the Council-table, and in general affemblies before the people : they so H " away with all honours & dignities, & either are invelled therein themselves, or elle confer them "upon whom they please. The best men, who stand either for defence of freedom, or in mainte-" nance of the laws, either are driven their country and banished, or fit a cold & blow their nails, "for any advancement they come unto; & being subject and thrall to persons of no worth, stand "like cyphers and hold their peace. Somewhat they faid moreover as touching the right of their limits, to wit, That Q. Fabing Labeo, at what time as he was in those parts, confined Philip within the bounds of the old Kings-freet or high way, which directly leadeth to Paroreia in Thrace and in no place declineth toward the lea : but Philip afterwards had made a new causey, and drawn it with a compats about, within which he empaled and took in the Cities & territories also of the Maronits. To these challenges Philip began far otherwise, than he did of late against the Thessali-The Oration ans and Perrhoebians, and in this wife he spake: "I have, quoth he, no matter to debate either of King Philip. "With the Maronits or Eumenes; but now at this present I am to contest even with you my Ma-"flers of Rome) at whose hands I have seen thus long that I can obtain no reason and equity. I " thought it meet and right, that the Macedonian Cities, which had revolted from meduring the "time of truce, should be rendred again unto me: not for any great encrease of seignory that "thereby should have accrued unto my kingdom (for small towns they are god wot, and situatup-" on the utmoss frontiers) but because their precedent and example might have imported much " to retain the rest of the Macedonians in their duty and alleageance. In no wife it would be gran-"ted, During the Ætolian war, I was enjoyned by the Conful Acilius to beliege and assault the "City Lamia: and after I had been toiled out and wearied with maintaining skirmishes, raising K " fabricks, planting ordnance and engins against it, even when I was at the very point to scale "the walls and force the City, the Coi, reclaimed and called me away, yea, and compelled meto celevy the fiege, and withdraw my forces from thence. And for to make me fome part of amends " for this wrong done, permitted I was to win again and conquer certain [mail] piles and forts. " rather than Cities of The flaly, Perrhabia, and Athamania. And even those also, I may say unto "you Q. Cacilius, ye have taken from me within thefe few daies. And now for looth of late, the Embassadors of Emmenes also (and God will) have presumed upon this as a thing granted and "without all question, That more reason it is for Eumenes to have & enjoy that which belonged to Antiochus, than for me, But my judgment is far otherwise. And why? Eumenes could never " have continued in his Reaim, unless the Romans, I will not say, had vanquished K. Antiochus, L "but surely if they had not waged war against him. And therefore is he endebted unto you, and "you no waies beholden unto him. As for my kingdom, so far was it off that any part or quarter " of it should be in hazard and jeopardy; that when Antiochus of his own meer motion offered co to buy my fociety with three thousand talents, and fifty covered ships of war, together with " all those Cities in Greece which I held in possession aforetime; I refused all, and distained his "alliance, yea, and I professed openly, even before that M. Acilius came over with his army into "Greece, that I was his enemy, and together with that Conful, was employed in what part foe-" ver of the war, which he charged and laid upon me. Also when L. Ssipio the Coniul his suc-"ceffor, determined to lead his army by land to Hellespont, I not only gave him leave to pass " peaceably through my Realm, but also caused the high waies to be paved and gravelled, bridges M to be made against his coming, yea, and surnished him with provision of victuals. And this did "I,not in Macedony alone, but also throughout all Thrace, where among other matters, this was not of least importance and consequence, to restrain those barbarous nations there, from "running upon them, and to keep them in peace and quietness. In consideration now of this "kind affection of mine (If I may not call it a good defert) unto you, whether ought ye Romans "in reasonto give me somewhat to that I have, to augment and encrease my dominion by your " largels and munificence or, to take from me (as you do) that which I have either in mine own " right or by gift from you? The Macedonian Cities, which you confess to have been parcels of "my kingdom are not reflored unto me. Eumenes on the other fide, he comes to make spoil of "me, as if I were Antiochus, and (mark I pray you the device of it) he pretendeth a decree of the N "tendelegats to colour his most shameless, impudent & cautelous falshood; even that by which 6 himself may be most resuted and convicted. For in very express and plain terms it is thus writ-"ten, That Chersonnesus & Lysimachia are given to Eumenes, Where I pray you, and in what cor-"ner of the infrument and patent stand Enus, Maronea, and the Cities of Thrace? Shall he ob-"tain that at your hands, and by your means, as given and granted from those ten Delegats, which 4 he never durft so much as once demand and reviewe of them? Tell me fifthe thing be worth so much) in what place ye would range and reckon me? If your purpose be to persecute me as an

"enemy and mortall foe, spare not, but go on fill as ye have begun : but if you respectme as a

"King, as your ally and friend, I befeech you repute me not worthy of fo notorious and mani-

16 If (lay they) the Cities in question were given to Eumenes, by vertue of a decree serdown

"by the ten Delegats, we will not change nor alter any thing therein. But in case Philip acqui-

"red them by Conquest and force of arms. he should have held them as the guerdon of his

"victory. If neither, we are of opinion, That the hearing and decision of this difference shall

"be referred overto the Senar: and to the end, that all may remain entire, the garrifons in

"felt a wrong. This Oration of the King in some measure moved the Commissioners, and there-O

authole Cities shall be Withdrawn and depart. Thefe, I lay, were the causes that grincipally estranged the affection of Philip from the Romans, and wrought discontenument in his heart; infomuch as evidenc it is, that the war was not enterprised by his fon Perfensupon any new quatrels and treth occasion, but upon their motives let unto him by his father to be purfued.

No suspicion was there at Rout of a Macedonian war, La Mant. is the Pro-Conful was resurned out of Spain and when he demanded a triumph of the Senat affembied in the Temple of Bellowit, the same in regard of his noble and worthy exploits might have been obtained, but for example lake it was not granted. For an order it was in Rime, by an lient cultome of their forefathers. that no man might triumph, who brought not his army back with him unless he left unto his tuecessour the Province fully subdued and lettled in peace, Howbeit, Manlins was allowed an indiffer a monthonour, namely, to enter into the City by way of Ovation. In which folemnity he had born before him in apompous pageant two and firty coroners of gold. Moreover, in gold a hundred thirty two pound weight, and in filverfix thouland three hundred. Allo, he pronounced aloud-inthe Senat, that Q. Fabini the Questor was coming, and brought with him ten thouland pound? weight more of filver, and eighty of gold, which he meant likewise to bring into the Chamber of the City.

That year a great commotion and infurrection there was of bondflaves in Apulia, L. Politing minthe Prator had the government of Twentum, and he fat in inquifition upon a damned crew of certain herdenen and gratiers, who had con pired together and used to rob by the high-way. ade, and in the common pattures belonging to the City; which Commission he followed with Coch levefity and rigor that he condemned 7000 of them. Many escaped and fled, but many were excuted and inffered death. As for the Coff tong were they kept in the City of Rome, about the leey of fouldiers, but at length they went into their Provinces.

The same year C. Calphurnius and L. Q intius the Prators in Spain, having in the beginning of the Spring led forth their armies out of their wintring holds, and joyned their forces together in Banria, advanced forward into Carpetain, (where the enemies were encamped) with a resolution entomanage and conduct the war with one joint mind and common councill together. Nor far from the Cities Bippon and Tolerum, there began a skirmish between the fortagers of both parts. this were good forth to make provisions: Seconded they were from the one camp and the other, by means whereof, the whole armies of both fides by little and little, came forth into the field to: whike a full battel, In this complemery-kirmish, the enemies had the vantage, as well of the ground wherein they were embattelled, as of the manner of fight and fervice. By reason whereof, both the Roman armies were discomfited and driven back into their camp; but the enemies preffed not upon them; not withflanding they were put in great fright and much difordered. The Roman Prators doubting left their camp the morrow after should be assailed, sissodged in the night betweeningreat fecret and filence, withour any found of trumpet, and departed, In the morning by breik of day the Spaniards in ordinance of battell approached the trench and rampier : and beingentred within the camp (which they found void and empty beyond their hope and expectation on they rifled and ranfacked all that the Romans left behind them, whiles they made hafte away in the night featon: from whence the enemies returned to their own camp, and there for certain; ig dates abode in flanding leaguer and fittred not. In that battell and in the chafe together, there is wereflain of Romans and allies 5000: and with the spoiles of their bodies, the enemies armed themselves: from thence they marched to the river Tagus. The Roman Prators in the mean feaion employed all that time to levy and affemble new forces out of the Confederat Cities of Spain, and in comforting and encour ging the hearts of their own fouldiers after their fright, upon this ad effective conflict and unlucky foil. Now when they had gathered (as they thought) a sufficient power, and took themselves strong enough, and that the souldiers also defired to be doing with the enemy, for to rate out and cancell the former ignomy and difgrace, they encamped twelve miles from the river Tagus aforefaid: and about the third watch of the night advanced their. flandards, and marching in a four square battell. by day light they were come to the bank of the fiver (now were the enemies lodged upon a little mount beyond the water:) and incontinently in two places (where the river shewed a foord) they waded through with their atms, Calphurnius on the right hand, and Quintius on the left. All this while the enemies continued quiet and movoid not: but in the mean time, while as they wondred at their fudden coming, and devised how to trouble and diforder the fouldiers as they should make haste to pass the river, the Romans had transported over themselves, and their bag and baggage also; yea, and brought all together into one place. And because they perceived by this time the enemy to stir and remove, and had no time to fortifie their camp, they put themselves in battell array. In the midst stood the fifth legion of Calphurnius, and the eighth of Quintius, which was the very flower and firength of the whole army. Now they had a fair open plain all the way between them and the enemies Gump, to as there was no caute to fear any ambush. The Spaniards to foon as they espied two armies of their enemies upon that fide of the bank which was next to them. all at once iffined out of their camp, and ran to battell; to the end that they might surprise and empeach them before they could joyn and range themselves together. The fight was sharp and hor in the beginming: for the Spaniards of the one fide were puffed up with the conceit and pride of their late vistory: and the Romans of the other, were galled and incensed for anger of a dishonour re-(fired, which they were not used unto. The battell in the midst (confishing of two most valiant and hardy legions), tought right couragiontly; which the beenies, leting that they could not o. H therwise forch to retreat and give ground, began to charge upon them with a battaillon in coinfalbion cloie together; and fill they pressed hard upon them in the midl more & more in number, and euer thicker ranged. Calpharnian the Prætor feeing this battell diffrefled and in danger. Sebrwith allipeed L. Quintilim Varus, and L. Juventius Talva, two Lieutenants, to sither of the legions feverally, to encourage and exhort them to flick to it like mes, and so make remonstrance and relation. "That in them alone confided all the hope of conquering and keeping Spain: if " they never to little yielded back & doft their ground, there was not one of the whole atmy that " (hould ever fee lialy again no nor to much as the farther bank of Tague As for himfell he took with him the Cavalry of two Legions, and when he had wheeled a little about and let a compale with them he charged hotly upon the flank of the forelaid ftrong battailion of the commen which t afbiled and urged will the main battell. Quintius alio with his Cavalry flanked the enemies on the other lide ; but the horiemen of Calpharnius fought more fiercely by badd than the other, and the Pizzor him elf in perion was tormost of them all ; for he was the first that drewbloud of an enemy & fo far engaged himself within them that hardly a man could know of which side betought by his ingular valour, the horsemen were mightily animated; and by the valour of the Cavalry on horieback, the infantry also were enkinded to fight on foot, The prin ipali Centurious were abrifhed and ashamed to see the Prztor in person among the pikes and swords of his enemies. and therefore every man for his part did his best, pas forward the port-entigns, willing them to advan E their banners, to the end that the foul diers might follow, bard after. Then began they on allhands to fet up a fresh and justy shour; they took, their bier and, barged upon them, as from g the cantage of an higher ground; by reason whereof they disarrayed them first and like a for ible ftream they bare them down before them, fo as they could not ftand upon their feet and tallain this violence of theirs, but fell oneupon another. As many as fled toward the camp the horiemenpurfued, and so intermingled themselves among the rout of the enemies, that they ented pell mell with them into their hold ; where, they that were left for the guard the reof, renewed the fight, fo that the Roman horiemen were forced so light from their hories: and whiles they maintained the conflict, the fift Legion came to legond them, and confequently more and more furnous as they possibly could ran to them: down went the Spanises and were making in all parts of the camp; and not above 4000 of them all, shed away and aved themselves; of which number, about 3000 (who fill kept their armour) Leized upon a hall near adjoyning: the other L thousand being for the moti part armed by the halfen were feattered all over the fields, The enemies were at hift above 35000, but after this bettellife how few of them were left: and from them were won 133 enfigns, Oi Romans and Allies, there died few above fix hundred : of auxiliary fouldiers from out of the Province, about 150 refive martial. Tribunes were loft, and ertain Roman Gentlemen whole death especially, made it seem a bloudy victory. After which the army abode within the enemies camp, for that themselves had no time to fortifie their own. The fiest morrow C. Calphurnius in an open audience, highly praised the horlemen, and rewarded them with rich harness and trappings, declaring aloud, That by means of their good iervice principally the enemies were discomfited, and their camp forced. As for Quinting the other Prator, he bestowed upon his men of arms. small chains and buttons of gold. The Centurious M likewise of both armies received gitts at their hands,, and namely, those who sought in the main

The Confuls having finished the levy of fouldiers, and accomplished all things requisite took done in Rome; let the army into their Province of Liguria. Sempronius departed from Pist. and made a journey against the Apuan Ligurians; where by wasting their territories and burning their territories and the post of Lura. The enemies took a certain mount (an ancient hold) where their ancestors cometimes had seated themselves; but from thence they were by force dissigned by reafont that the Romans overcame the difficulties of the avenues thereto. Ap. Claudius likewiscior his part, was equall in valour and good fortune to his Collegue, as having fought certain prosper rous battel, with the Ligurian loguames. He force desides, is towns of theirs, and took many thousands of prisoners within them. Of the chief authors of that rebellion, he caused three and forty to lose their heads.

Now approached the time of the solemn assembly for election of Magistrats at Rome: and albeits Sempronius his lot it was to hold the said assembly, yet Cluidius returned first to Rome, because it Sempronius his lot it was to hold the said assembly, yet Cluidius returned first to Rome, because P-Clandius his brother made suit to be Consul. He had for his competitors, L.-Emplius C liba all four of the Nobility. Old suitors they we eastly, and because they had suffered the repulse aforetime, they renewed the suit for this dignity, as being so much the rather due, because it had been once denied them. And this was the cause that these four followed as pressed the harder forto obtain the same, because it was not lawful for any more of them one of the Patritis at once to be created Cost. There were also of the Commoners certain perfors well beloved and of good reputation that stood in election for the place, to wit. L. Pacius Q. Terentius Gusteo and Cn. Bachius Tamphilus: they also had taken repulse beforetime, and were put off still in hope one day yet to obtain that honourable dignity. Cl. indius of them all was only the new Competitors. Now men thought verify without any down to a question, yea, and defined in their conceius, Q. Fabius Labeo, and L. Porcius Licinius to be Consuls. But Clandius the Consul,

A together with his brother bestirred himself; and without his Ushers attending upon him, travelled and laboured hard in all parts of the common place : not with thanding the advertaries, yea, and the most of the Senators cried out upon him, and faid, That he ought to consider and remember rather that he was the Coll of the people of Rome, than brother to P. Clandius; why then fat he not fill in the Tribunal either as president and judge of the court assembled, or else as a beholder and spectator only, without saying any word himself? Howbeir, he could not possibly be reclaimed from this difordinate affection of his which he shewed in labouring for his brother. This election was divers times allotroubled with the great debates and contentions saided by the Tribuns of the Commons : whiles some of them spake against the Col, others again maintained his suit, and took part with him. But in the end, Paling took the foil, and Appins went away with the game, for R his brother, So P. Claudius Pulcher, was created Col, beyond his own hope, and more than others looked for L. Poroiss Litinius held his own, and obtained the second place in his course; for that the Commoners went moderatly to work, & thewed not fo much affection and forcible means as Claudius did. Afterthis, was holden the election of Prators. And chosen there were, C. Decimins Flavus, P. Sempronius Longus, P. Cornelius Cerkegus, Q. Navius Ma: ho, C. Sempronius Blasus, and A. Termins Varro. Thus much concerning the acts atchieved both at home in the City, and abroad in the war, that year wherein App. Clandins and M. Sempronius were Confuls.

In the beginning of the next year, in which P. Claudius and L. Portius bare the Confulfhip, when as Q. Cacilius, M. Babius and T. Sempronius (who had been sent to hear and decide the controversies between therwo Kings, Philip and Eumenes, and the States of Thessa'y) had made re-C port of their embassages; they permitted likewise the Embassadors of the said Princes and Cities, to enter into the Senat. Who related the felf-fame things again, which had been alledged before in the prefence of the forelaid Legats in Greece. After this, the LL, of the Senat addressed another new embassage into Macedony and Greece, whereof App. Claudius was the chief for to visit and see, whether the Cities adjudged and figued to the Rhodians, Thessalians, and Perrhæbians were delivered unto them accordingly. They also had in charge to cause the garrilons to quit & aus and Maronea, and to look that all the lea-coast of Thracia, were treed from the subjection of Philip and the Macedonians. They were enjoyeed moreover to go into Peloponness, from whence the former embassie was departed in more doubtfull terms than if they had never gone thither. For over and besides other things they were sent away without any answer for their dispatch : and aln beitthey requested the Achaans for to assemble their general Diet, they might not obtain it. For which, when as Q. Cacilius found himself discontented and grievously complained, and the Lacedzmonians withall made pitious moan, that the walls of their City were demolished and rased, their common people lead away in captivity into Achaa, and there fold, and the laws of Lyourgus taken from them, under which their City and Common-weal untill that day had been maintained and governed: the Achaens excused themselves most of all for the imputation of refusing to hold a Council; and to that purpose they reheated a Law and Ordinance, whereby they were forbiddenexpressely to call and publish a Diet, unless it were in the case of levying war and contracting of peace, upon occasion that any embassadors came directly unto them from the Senat of Rome with letters, or commission in writing. But for that this manner of excuse should not serve their r turnagain afterwards; the Senat gave them plainly to understand, that they ought to takecare and order that the Roman Embassadors might at all times have means of free access to their Councils, like as they also reciprocally should have a Senat held for their sakes, as often as they would themselves.

After these embassages were departed, Philip was advertised by his Embassadors, that there wis no remedy but he must abandon those Cities, and withdraw his garritons: and herewith being mightily offended & angred against all, yet he discharged his choler only upon the Maronits. Unto Onomassus, warden of the ports and sea-coasts, he gave commandment to kill the chief of the adversepart. And he by the means of Cassander, one of the Kings supposts and savorits who along time had dwelt in Maconea procured certain Thracians to be let into the town by night & there Faccommitted murder and maffacre, as if it had been a City won by force of arms. And when the Roman embaffadors madecomplaint to him, namely of such outrages committed so cruelly against theguittels Maronits, and so proudly and insolently against the people of Rome; in that they hould be killed and cur in peeces as enemies, unto whom the Senat had ordained restitution of their freedom he made answer and said, that neither himself, nor any of those who belonged unwhim, could do withall: but it was long of themselves and their variance one with another; whiles some of the Citizens drew to him, and others enclined to King Eumenes. Which ye may (adhe) foon know to be a truth, if ye will but ask the Maronits themselves: for this account he made, that whiles they were all terrified with so late and fresh a massacre, there durst not one of them open his mouth against him. Appins replied again, and said, That they were not to make an enquiry in this fo evident and notorious a fast, as if it were in any respect doubtfull: but if he would discharge and clear himself as innocent of the action, he should send to Rome Onomastus and Cassander, who were named to have committed the outrage, that the Senat might examine themupon interrogatories. This word at the first so troubled and dashed the King that his colour went and came in his face, & he knew not how to keep his countenance. But after he was come again to himself, he made answer, That (if they needs would) he cated not much to send Cass ander, forthat he had dwelt & continued in Marones; but as for Onomestus, who neither was at Maronea, nor so much as in any quarter near unto it, how possibly could he be charged or touched with the H matter? Now as he spared Onomastus the rather of the twain, and was loath to have him come in question, as being his more dear and honourable friend: so he feared him much more than the other, left he should bewray and disclose the thing; for that himself had conserred with him thereabout; and besides, he had served his turn divers times as a Minister to execute, and been privy unto him as a complice to plot such like designments. Cass ander also, as it is verily though, was poiloned and made away, by certain that were fent of purposeto accompany him through Epirus to the sea side; and all because the villany should not be detected and come to light. Thus the Legats departed from the parley and conference with Philip, as shewing in their countenance, that they were nothing well pleased : and Philip on the other side went his waies as resolute to levy war again : but forasmuch as his forces as yet were not sufficient to do any exploit, I and because he would delay the time between he determined to send his younger son Demetrini to Rome, both to purge his father of those matters wherewith he was charged, and also by humble request to appeale the anger of the Senat; supposing, that this young gentleman, who had been left as an holtage at Rome, and there had shewed a good testimony of a Princely nature and royall disposition, might much avail in the cause. In the mean while himself under colour of aiding the Bizantins, but in very truth to firike some terrour into the Princes of Thrace, made an expeditionagainst them: and when he had in one battell discomfitted them, and taken prisoner their chief Captain Amadorus, he returned into Macedony, having fent certain messengers to sollicit the barbarous nations inhabiting near the river Ifter, for to enter and invade Italy. In Peloponne fus also the coming of the Roman Legats was expected, who by this commission were enjoy-k ned to pais out of Macedony into Achea: against whom because the Acheans would not be to feek what to fay, Lycoreas their Prætor summoned a publike Councill aforehand. In which there was parly as touching the Lacedamonians, namely, how that of enemies they were become informers and accusers, and danger it was, lest when they were an quished they would be more to be feared, than all the time that they waged war. For during the wars, the Achaens found the Romans to be their good affociats, but now the same Romans are more friendly to the Lacedamonians than to the Achaens, seeing that Areus and Alcibrades (banished persons both out of Lacedamon, and by the means of the Acharans restored again to their place) had undertaken to go in embassage to Rome, against the Achaan nation, which had so well deserved at their hands; and there gave so hard language against them, as it they had been chased and driven out of their coun-L try and not reftored thereunto by them. Hereupon arose a great outcry from all parts of the alfembly, for to put to question, what should be determined expressely of them by name; and in this fit, where all went by choler, and nothing by counsel, condemned they were to die, Some sew daies after came the Roman Embaffadors, for whose fake a Councill was holden at Clisoresa City in Arcadia But before any matter was treated on the Achaans were surprised with exceeding fear, confidering and thinking how this deciding of matters was not like to be managed and carried with any indifferency for their behoof; forasmuch as they saw Areus & Alcibiades Condemned by them in the last Councili) to be in the company of the faid Embassiadors, and no man durst open his lips and speak a word. Appius declared, That the Senat was much displeased at those matters whereof the Lacedamonians had made complaint, namely, That first in a tumultuary fray and M conflict, they were murdered, who had been called forth by Phil pamen, and came to plead and speak in their own cause: Then, after they had exercised their cruelty thus against their persons, to the end, that in no part their inhumanity should be wanting they had rafed the walls of a right noble and famous City, abolished their most ancient laws, and put down the discipline and government of Lycurgus, so renowned throughout all nations. When Appins had made an end of his speech then Lycortas, both in regard that he was Prætor, and also because he took part with the faction of Philopamen (who was the author of all that had been done at Lacedamon) made answer in this wife: "More hard it is for us now, O Appins, to speak before you, than of late it was in the presence of the Senat. For then we were to answer the Lacedamonians, who accused us: but at this present we have you to be our accusers before whom, as competent judges we should N e plead in our own defence. Howbeit, we have submitted our selves, and undergone this unequal "and hard condition, presuming upon this hope, that you will lay ande that accusatory heat which not long fince you used, and put upon you the person of a Judg to hear with indifference "and equity. For mine own part, confidering that you erewhile have but related those matters " which the Lacedemonians both here in place before Q. Cacilius of late, and also at Rome after-"wards complained of I would think that I am to answer therefore not unto you, but unto them "in your hearing. You charge us with the murdering of them who being called out by the Prator " Philopamen to plead their cause were killed. This crime I hold that it ought not to be objected "against us by you Romans, no, nor so much by any other in your audience. And why so? because "it was expressely specified in your own treaty and accord of covenants, that the Lacedamoni-O "ans should have nothing to do with the maritime Cities. At what time as the Lacedamonians took arms, and feiled by force in the night those Cities, which they were precisely forbidden er to meddle withall; T. Quintius, if the Roman army had been in * Peleponne [w., as aforetime no 6 doubt we must needs think, that being thus surprised and evillentreated, they would have had " recourse thither for succour. But since ye were so far off, whither else should they flie and re-"tire themselves, but to us your allies, whom they had seen before to help and succour Gyttheum?

" whom upon the like cause they knew to have affailed Lacedamon together with you? It was in "your quarrel therefore that we enterprited a just and lawful war. Which being an act of ours, by others commended, and which ought not by the very Lacedamonians to be condemned, and a confidering that even the Gods themselves have approved thereof in that they gave us victory, "how cometh it then to pals, that you bring those matters into question which are by right of "law warranted? And yet a great part thereof in no respect toucheth and concerneth you. That "we canled them to come forth to answer their caule, who had raifed a commotion of the multia tude, who had forced the maritime: Cities, who had rantacked them, who also had massacred "the principal citizens, we are to answer therefore, and to us that properly appertaineth. But "that they were murdered in the way as they came into our camp, was nothing to us, but your R "deed O Areus and Alcebrades, who now (iorsooth) are become our accusers. The banished La-"cedamonians (or which number those two alroare, and who at that time were with us for that "they chose the coast Towns to retire into for their habitations) supposing that their own death " was fought, and that there would have been outrage committed upon them, they ran upon chose, by whose means they were driven out of their countrey, even upon an indignation that they might not fo much as pass their old age in banishment with safety. They were the Lacea demonians then and not the Acha ans that flew the La edemonians whether juffly or unjuffly "that is not the question, neither skilleth it. But what lay ye to this O Achaans, how can ye deny "but that ye are ulpable, in that ye have abouished the Laws and the most ancient discipline of "Lycurous? and withal rafed the walls of acedamon? And how is it possible that both these C "points should be objected unto us by the same men? considering that those walls were never c brill by Lyourgue but contrary-wife (and not many years past) for to overthrow and anull the discipline instituted by Lycurgue? For the tyrants of late daies built them to ierve as a fortress Gand bulwark for themselves, and not for a defenceunto the City. And it Lycargus at this day chould rife again from death to life, he would take joy in their ruins, and fay that he acknowc' ledged now his own native countrey and ancient Sparta indeed. You Laced amonians should thot have expected Philopamen nor the Achaans but your telves ought with your own hands to chase pulied down and deftroied, all the tokens and memorials of tyranny. Those walls were the every mirks and as a man would lay the unleamly and deformed lears of your thraldom and ferevitude. And you who without walls for the space almost of 800 years had lived in freedom, not year and for a certain time also had been mafters of Greece became flaves during a hundred years, sensioned and restrained within walls, as if ye had been settered by the seet. Now as touching the claws, which we pretend to have been taken away by us, I suppose verily that the tyrants they " were, who deprived the Lacedamonians of their ancient laws: and that we have not taken from e them theirs (for none they had of their own) but rather have given them ours: neither have a we done otherwise than well by them but regarded much the good of their City and Commona wealth, in that we have united them in our folemn court of Parliament, and incorporated them sunrouss to the end, that in all Peloponn fus, there should be but one body, one State, and one «Councel. Then (I wot well) they might have justly complained to have been wronged, then a they might have grieved and faid they had not been well uled, in case we our selves had lived E a under one kind of laws, and put them to be ruled by others. I know full well, O Appine, that "all my speech hitherto is neither beseeming allies to use unto their allies, nor decent and meet , for a nation that is free but rather (to speak more truly) fit for flaves debating before their maafters. For it that found of the trumpet, if that voice of the publick cries were not in vain, whereuby ye ordained and declared, That we Achaans before all others should be free; if the consedegration fland firm and stable; if our alliance and amity be entertained and observed equally and a indifferently; why demand not I of you Romans what you did after the winning of Capua? Seeung you will have us Achaans to make account unto you, what we did to the Lacedamonians whom we conquered by war? Set case that we caused some of them to be killed. What of that? Commanded not you (I pray) that the Senarors of Capus should lose their heads? We have Fix demolished the walls indeed, but ye have not only ruinated their walls, but wholly turned them uout of City and territory. But (you will say) the confederation in behalf of the Acheans is equal and indifferent in oneward apparence, and in truth and effect their liberty dependeth upon the good will and pleasure of the Romans, who indeed have the pre-eminence of the seignory and dominion besides; I know it Approxias well as you can tell me, yea, and (although it behove th menotio to be) I am not overmuch offended and discontented therewith, But this I beseech 1001, let there be as great ods and difference as ye will between us Achains and you Romans: provide this only, that your enemies and ours be not with you in as good regard and account, hay, that they be not in a better degree and condition than we your allies and affociats. For that they should be equal to us we have been the cause; in that we granted them our own laws, inthat we admitted them to be incorporate in the general Diet of the Achaan State and commonalty. But will ye have the truth? the conquered have not sufficient to content and satisfie the conquerors : enemies demand more than allies have and enjoy and those things which are confirmed by oath ratified and confectated by monuments and infirmments of writings, cut any engraven in flone, for a perpetual memory to all posterity, they would force and wrest from us even with our perjury. True it is O'Romans we honour and revence you; yea and if you will needs have it fo, we dread and fear you also: but yet so, as we both honour and also lear the im-

" mortal Gods more than you. Audience he had with the accord and confent of the greater part: H and all men judged, that he had spoken like a Magistrat indeed, and for the dignity and Majesty of his place: in fuch iort, as it was easily feen, that they were never able to hold their dignity and maintain their authority with the Romans, in cale they went coldly to work and proceeded in mild terms with them. Then Appins aniwered and faid, "That he would gladly advise and per-" swade them, all that he possibly could, to be reconciled unto the Laced monians, whiles they " might do it with full contentment; for fear left foon after they should be constrained and forced " to feek unto them against their wills and maugre their hearts. At this word they all fighed and groned again; but affraid they were and durit not refuse to do that which they were commanded. This petition only they made unto the Romans, that as touching the Lacedemonians they would change & alter what they thought good, and not force the Achaans to fin against their conscience, I in disanulling those things which they had established and ratified with a solemn oath, So the sentence of condemnation only (lately passed against Arens and Alcibiades) was reversed.

In the beginning of this year (when at Rome they had fitten in consultation about the Provinces of Confuls and Pretors) Ligaria was affigued unto the Confuls for their charge and government. becaule there was no war in any other place. Then the Pretors cast lots for theirs. To C. Decimins Flavus fell the jurisdiction of the City: and to P. Cornelius Cerhegus that other between citizens and forrainers: C. Sempronius had the government of Sicily, and Q. Navius Matho of Sardinia with commission also to fit upon the inquisition in case of poiloning. A. Terentius Varro was deputed L. Governor of high Spain, and P. Sempronius Longus of the low. Out of those 2 Provinces it sell out fo, that there came much about the same time two Lieutenants, L. Juventius Talva and T. K Quintilius Varus; who having related before the Senat how great a war was now dispatched and finished in Spain, required withal, that there should be rendred praise and thanks to the immortal Gods for the happy fuccess in the wars, and likewise that the Pretors might be permitted to bring away their armies. So there was a folemn procession ordained to be holden two dayes; but as touching the reducing of the armies, they gave order to refer it wholly to be debated, at what time as there should be question about the armies of Consuls and Pretors together. Some sew dayes after, it was ordained, that the Confuls should have with them into Ligaria two legions apeece, which Ap. Claudius and M. Sempronius had the conduct of, As touching the Spanish (orces, great contention there was between the new Pretors and the friends of Calpurnius and Quintius in their absence. Both sides had Tribuns and both had Consuls to take part with them, The Tribuns L threatned to cross the act of the Senat, if they ordained that the armies should be brought home. The Confuls again protested, that if the Tribuns thus opposed their negative, they would not suffer any other decree and ordinance to pais. In conclusion, the respect of those that were absent, was of less importance: and an act of the Senat was entred, That the Pretors should enrol 4000 footmen of Romans, and 400 horsemen: likewise 5000 foot and as many horse of Latine allies, to conduct with them into Span. And when they had thus enrolled these four full legions, look what filrplulage there remained over and above 5000 foot and 300 horse in a legion, they should give them their congie and difmissthem of fouldiery; first, as many as had served our their full time, and then those who had born themselves most valiantly in the war under Calpurnius and Quin-

After this debate and variance was appealed, there arose another in the neck of it, occasioned by the death of P. Decimius the Pretor. Cn. Licinius and L. Puppius (who had been Ædiles the last year before likewise C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter, and Q. Fulvius Flaceus, laboured to be in his room late deceased. As for the last of these rehearsed (because he was Ædile Curule) he shewed not himself in his white robe; but he made more means and laboured above all the rest, having to his adversary and concurrent the Flamin abovesaid. At the first he seemed equalonly unto him in the fuit, but afterwards when he began to have the better of him, certain Tribuns of the Commons flood upon this point, and alledged, That his name was not to be accepted as eligible; for that one and the felf-same person might neither take nor exercise at one time, the sunction of two Magistracies; and namely, both Curule or of State. Others againsaid, that it was N meet and reason that he were dispensed with and exempt from the Laws in that behalf, to the end that the people might be at liberty to elect whom they would for Pretor, L. Porsius the Conful was first of this resolution, not to admit his name: and afterwards, because he would seem to do by warrant and authority of the Senat, he affembled the LL together and faid that he propounded and put to question before them, That for asmuch as an Ædile elect sued to be Pretor without all right, or any precedent tolerable in a free-state; for his own part he was minded (unless they were of a contrary opinion) to hold the general assembly for the election according to law. Then the LL, gave their advice, that L. Porcius the Conful, should commune and treat with Q. Fulvius, that he would be no hinderance, but that the affembly for the substitution of a Pretor in the room of C. Decimius departed, might be holden by order of law. As the Conful was thus in hand with him according to the act of the Senat Flacous made answer, That he would do nothing unfitting his own person. By this doubtful and indifferent answer of his, he put those ingood hope (who expounded and construed as they would have it) that he would accommodate and apply himself to the authority of the LL, of the Senat: but at the time of the election he sued more earneftly than before; complaining of the Coroll and Senat, That they wring and wrefted out of his hands the benefit of the people of Rome intended unto him; and to bring him into illwill and

A obloquy of the people, they made much ado about two offices and a double dignity: as if all the world faw not, that after he were declared and pronounced Pretor, he would incontinently refign up the Ædilethip. The Conful perceiving both him fully resolute and set upon a pitch in the suit, and also the favor and affection of the people enclined more and more toward him, brake up the affembly aforefaid, and called a Senat: where, in a frequent teffion of Senators it was ordained, That for as much as Flaceus was little or nothing moved with the authority of the LL, of that honorable court, he was to be dealt withat in a general affembly before the body of the people. When the people were met together at the fummons of the Conful he proposed the matter unto him before them. Flaceus relented never a jot, but perfifted still in his opinion, and gave the people of Rome thanks for their favour, in that they shewed themselves willing to elect him Pretors alo often as they had time and place wherein they might tellify and declare their love to him: which affectionate kindness of his fellow citizens, he never means to reject and abandon. This conflant and resolute speech of his, kindled and enflamed so great love and affection in them towardhim, that past all peradventure he had been chosen Pretor out of hand, in case the Consul would have received his name, Much fixite and debate there was amongst the Tribuns, one against anothersyea, and between them and the Conful, until at length the Conful held a Senat, and there a decree passed in this wife. That for asmuch as the wilfull stub borness of Q. Flaccus of one side, and the inordinat affection of men on another fide, was such, as the folemn affembly for subelecting of a Pretor in the place of the deceased, could not be holden according to the laws, the Senat agreed and relolved, that there were already Pretors enough, and P. Cornelius should administer Cand execute both jurisdictions in the City, and exhibit the playes and games in the honour of

After this trouble some debate about the election, was by the sage wisdome and valorous courage of the Senar suppressed, there arose another far greater by how much the thing was of weightier importance, and the perions agents therein more in number and for quality and place mightler. Therestood in election to be Ceniors (and that with earnest andeavour and exceeding heat of contention) L. Valerius Flaccus Pand L. both Scipios; Cn. Marlins Volfo, and L. Furius Purpureo, all Paritis. And of commoners, M. Porcius Cato, M. Fulvius Novelior. T. and Marcus both Sempronii, the one furnamed Longus, the other Indicanus. But M. Poscius over-went them all by many degrees, as well those of the Patricians as also of the commons, not withstanding they were Ocome of most noble families This man carried with him fo vigorous a spirit and pregnant wit, that The commendation howsoever he were born and descended, it seemed he was able to make way of himself to advancement and honour. He wanted no Art and skill meet and requisit for the managing either of Porting Cate. private busines of his own, or publick affairs of state: cunning he was in country husbandry, as well as in civil policy. Some are advanced to the highest dignities and most honourable places, by their deep knowledge in the law: others attain to promotion by eloquence: and there be again, who have rifen and become great through martial prowefs and feats of arms. But this man was by nature for trainable and pliant to all alike, that what soever he addicted and gave himself unto, a man would have faid, he had been born and framed even from his mothers womb to it and to nothing elfe. In war, a most hardy and valiant souldier: and in many foughten fields highly re-E nowned. Being mounted once to high places of honorable calling, a right excellent commander he proved, and General of an army. In peace again, for found counsel in the civil law, passing well learned: for pleading at the bar and making orations, most eloquent. Neither carried he himself so, that his congue flourished only whiles he lived, as leaving no monument behind him of his finguliteloquence; but it liveth, nay, it flourisheth still, immortalized as it were and recommended to polierity in all kind of writing. Orations of his there be extrant many, which he penned and pronounced as well in his own cause as for the desence of his friends, yea, and invectives also against others: for able he was to put down and weary his adversaries, not only by declaiming and accuing them, but also by pleading his own cause. Factious quarrels and enmitties there were exceeding many that tormented him; and he plagued others with as many: and hard it is to lay or fer flown, whether he were urged and preffed upon by the nobility, or himself coursed and baited themmore. Doubtless, by hature he was auftere and rigorous, his speech was sharp biting, and be-

yourd measure plain and free : but he carried a mind with him that stooped to no desires and lusts whatfoever: his life to fevere and precife, as it was untouched and without all foot of blame: dehing all fawning favours, and contemning earthly riches. In this and frugality, in sobriety, in Patence, in sufferance of travail and danger, his body was steel to the very back. And as for his

mindand courage, it was fuch, as very age and time (which abateth and confumeth all things elfe) Wasnot able to break and daunt: when he was fourfcore years old and fix, he pleaded at the bar for others: he made orations for his own defence, and wrote books: and in the nintieth year of his age he convented Sergius Galba before the people to receive his judgment by them. As all his letime before, the nobility was fer against him, so when he stood now to be Censor, they pressed hard upon him: infomuch as all his competitors (excepting L. Flaceus, who had been his col-

eague in the Confulfhip J complotted together, how they might give him the repulse and put him

belides the Cushion:not only for that their own teeth watered and they were defirous themselves

pather of that honor; nor because they repined to see a new risen Gentleman, and one of the first head to be a Cenfor: but also because they looked for no other but that his Cenforship would be

Regions and prejudicial to the name and reputation of divers men; confidering how he had been

croffed and hurt by very many, and was defirous himfelf to wair them a shrend turn, and be meet H with them again. For even then, whiles he laboured and fued for the place, he used minatory speeches, and gave out, that they only were opposed against him, who feared they should have Cenforthip therply exercised without partiality and respect of persons, And herewith he maintained and upheld the fuit of L. Valerius with him, saying that if he had but him of all others to be his colleague, he should be able to repress the wicked enormities newly come up and rise in the City, and to bring in requelt again the ancient manners and fashions of the old world. Men were much moved in these respects and considerations; and so mangre the heads of the nobility, they not only created him Centor, but also adjoyned unto him L. Valerius for his companion in that go-

After the election of Cenfors was ended, the Confuls and Pretors took their journies into their several Provinces, alliane Q. Navius; who before that he could go into Sardinia, was staied behind no lets than four months about certain inquitions of polioning: whereof, he fate upon mamy without the City of Rome, in corporate burroughs, market Towns and places of great refort, for that he thought that manner of proceeding more convenient. And if we lift to believe V. An-

tias, he condemned two thouland persons.

Semblably, L. Post humans the Pretor, (unto whom the government of Tarentum by lot fell) did good julifice upon great conspiracies made by certain grasiers; and with great care and diligence followed the enquest of the Bacchanals, and dispatched the reliques thereof quite and clean. Many of them who were adjourned and made not appearance, but gave the flip and left in the furch their furcties bound body and goods for them, and lurked in that quarter of haly he either g judged and condemned as guilty and convicted, or caused them to be apprehended and sent to Reme unto the Senat; who were all cast inprison by P. Cornelius.

In the firther part of Spain all was quiet, by reason that the Lusitans were in the last war subdued : but inthe hither part, A. ? erentins forced Corbio a Town of the Suessetans, which heastaulted with mantilets and other fab. icks of war, and fold all the prisoners: which done, he passed the winter peaceably in that higher part of Spain also.

The old Pretors, C. Calpurnius Pifo and L. Quintius returned to Rome; and both of them were with great accord and content of the LL. of the Senat allowed to triumph. And first C. Calpurning triumphed over the Portugals and Ceitiberians. In which triumph, he carried in thew 83 coronets of gold, and 1 2000 pound of filver. Within few dayes after, L. Quintius triumphed over the same Portugals and Celtiberians. In which solemnity, there was represented in shew, as much gold and filver as in the former,

The Centors, M. Porcius and L. Valerius, whiles men hung in suspence between sear and hope what they would do, he d a review and a new choice of the Senate. Seven Senators they displaced and depoted from that dignity: amongst whom, there was one of mark, for his nobility of birth and honorable offices which he had born, namely, L. Quintins Flamininus who had been Conful. An ancient order (they fay) it was in time of our fore-fathers, That when the Cenfors had put any out of the Senat, they should note them directly for those faults which they had committed: and at this day, extant there be divers sharp orations of Caro, against them whom either he catied and diplaced out of Sentt, or from whom he took away hories of fervice: but of all others, the fourest and bitterest is that of his, against this L. Quintin; which if he had pronounced M as an accuser before he had noted him with that disgrace, and not as Censor after the said note, his very own brother T. Quintus (if he had been then Cenfor) could not possibly have kept L, Quintins in the state of a Senator. Among other grievous matters he articled against him, That he had trained with him from Kome into his Province of France (in hope of many great rewards) one * Philippus Pannes, a notorious and costly Ganymede. This boy, as he was sooling rnd playing the want on with the faid Quintius then Conful, used to upbraid him with this, That he was had Carthaginian, away from Rome, against the very time that the shew of sword-players at utterance was tobe exhibited: and this he faid, to shew how ready he was to satisfy the pleasure of him his lover. Now it chanced as they were making good cheer together, and having taken their wine liberally were well heat their with, newscame and reported it was in the banket time, That a certain noble man of the Boians was arrived, with his children, as a renegatirom the adverte part; and was defirous to peak with the Corful, for to have affirmance from his mouth of safe-conduct : who being brought into the pavilion began to parly with the Conful by a truchman or interpreter. And in the mide o his speech; How faist thou (quoth Quintins to that wantondeinty, his Catamite) because thou has missed and lost the fight of those sword players at Rome, wilt thou see presently here this Frenchman die in the place before? He made not any great semblance unto him in good earnest of his defire that way: but the Conful at the first beck of that beastly filth and baggage. caught the naked fword which hung over his head, and first gave the poor Gaul a wound in his sconce as he was speaking unto him, and afterwards as he made shift to flie from him, and called upon the protection of the people of Rome, and the affiltance of those that were present, Quintins ran him quite through the fides. Valerius Antias, who never had read the oration of Cato, but gave credit to a flying fable only, without any head or author, telleth the tale with some other circumstance howheit much like in substance of matter, as touching his lecherous lust and bloody cruelty. He writeth, that Quintins whiles he abode at Plaifance, fent for a famous courtefan (upon whom he was enamored) to a banket; and as he courted and made love to this firumpet, vanting himlest

A parto her, among other discourses he recounted with what rigor he had followed certain involintions; what a number of prisoners he had in itons condemned to death ; and how many of their heads he minded to chop off. Then this harforry fitting next beneath him, faid, That she had never in all her life feen any man to cut ones head off, and it was a fight that of all other the would faink (ee, Wherupon, this kind amorous knight, to gratify the quean, cauled one of those poor fouls condemned to die, to be let out of prison into the banketting room, and presently to be beheaded efore her face, A cruel fact it was & inhuman, whether it were committed as Care hath objected in his Otation, oras Valerius hath written in his story, that any human creature should be thus maffacred like a facrifice, and the table befprinkled with histblood, amid the cups flanding full of wine and the diffices furnished with viands, where and when the manner and cultome was to tast Bandtakethe first estay in the honor of the Gods, and that devoutly with grace and good prayers and all to content and feed the eye of a wanton and thameless Harlot, lying in the bosome of the Conful. In the end of Cato his Oration, this condition was offered unto Quintimy That if he would plead unguilty, and deny this fact and others which he charged him with, then he hould put in a real caution, and fland to his defence and trial : but if he confessed himself guilty then he willed him to consider whether he thought any man would grieve and be forry at the ignominie which he was to receive, who being transported beside his understanding with wine and women. made but a sport and pastime to shed mens blood at a very banket. In taking a review of the Cavalry or Gentlemen of Rome, L. Scipio Afaticus had his great horse of service taken from him, This enforship was likewise executed with severity and rigor to all sorts and degrees, and namely, in C the prising and valuation of their goods. For Caro commanded the Sergeants to take a note of all the ornaments, jewels, and appartel of women, also of their chariots and coaches if they amounted to the fum of 1 5000 affes, and to enrol the same in the Censors book, stem all bonds ares under twenty years of age, fold after the last tax or affetsment for 10000 Affes or upward, that they hould be valued at an higher price by ten fold than they were effeemed worth : and that for all these things they should pay and contribute to the City chamber after three in the thousand These Centors cut offall water either running out of any common (tream into a privat house, of derived into particular fields and grounds. And all houses either built by private persons upon common ground, or any wayes encroaching and leaning to publike places they caused to be demolified and pulled down within thirty dayes. After this, they fet out divers peeces of work to Dbe wrought at a price, of that money which was ordained to that purpose, namely, to pave certampools with stone, to scoure the draughts and finks where need was: and in the mount Aventine and other parts where none were already to make new. And particularly of themselves Flacou caused the causey or whatto be made against the waters called Neptunia, that the people might pais to and fro that way: and also a fireet-way through Formianum, And Cato for his part built two galleries, " Manium and Titium, in the Mineries ; and bought four shops for the City: bout two gaueries, viaminm and a rining, and Poreig. As for the City revenues, they did fet * Sueries. he built there also the flately Hall or Palace called Poreig. As for the City revenues, they did fet * Sueries. Launia. and let them forth to farmers, at an exceeding racked rent : but all the City works they put out to indettakers by the great, at as low a reckoning as they could. These leases and bargains aforesaid being once cancelled by order from the Senat, and new made at the importunat fuit and that with E outries and tears of the Publicans, as well farmers as undertakers: then the Cenfors by proclamationcommanded those to avoid far from the subhastation, who had disamilled the former leases and bargains, and with some little abatement and easing of the former rents, they demited the same profits and revenues again to others. This was a centorthip of great note; full of rapine ill will. and heart-burning, which troubled and molested M. Porcius as long as he had a day to live, for that he was reputed and held to be the author of that feverity and rigor exercised therin, The same year two Colonies, were erected and inhabitants sent from Rome, to wit, Pollentia into the Picene territory, and Pifaurum into the Gauls country, Six acres of land were affigued to every one of the coloners, And the same Triumvirs, namely, Q. Fabins Labeo, M. Fulvius Fliccus, and G. Falvius Nobilior, were they that both parted the faid lands, and also had the leading and planfing of the forefaid Colonies. The Confuls that year atchieved no memorane exploit at all, neither at home in City, nor abroad in war. Against the year following they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabio u, who upon the fifteenth of March, on which day they entred into their government, put to odlion as concerning the Provinces, as well their own as the Pretors. For there had been choin Pretors C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter (who also the year before was in election for the pace) Sp. Posthumius Albinus and P. Cornelius Sifenna, also L. Puppius, L. Iulius, and Cn. Sicinius. lim the Confuls was affigued the province Ligaria, together with the charge of the same armies which P. Clandins and M. Porcius had conducted. As for both the Provinces in Spain [as we I be-Jona's on this fide Iberus] they were referred with their ordinary forces, for the Pretors of the himer year by special commission without casting any lots at all therefore. The new Pretors were bloyned forto dispose and part their governments, that C, Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter might Mile one of the jurisdictions of Rome. So he was L, chief justice for the forrainers, and Sienna sover the citizens Unto Sp. Post bamins fell Sicily to L. Puppins Apulia to L. Iulius Gallia, ind to Cn Steiniar Sardinia. As for L. Julius he was enjoined to make half and let forward on his pattery afor the Transalpin Gauls (beyond the mountains) had passed over by the Breights of the

buens and water unknown beforetime, into Italy, as hath been before faid, and were building them

This Pretor had incharge to im. H peach them in that enterprite, fo far forth as he might possibly without war and force of arms: and it there were no other remedy but that they must of necessity use violence, then to certify the Consuls therof: for agreed it was that one of them should lead the Legions against the Gauls. In the end of the former year there was a general affembly holden for the chufing of an Augur, wherin So. Posthumius Albinus was created in the room of Cn. Cornelius Lantulus late deceased, But in the beginning of this present year P. Licinius Crassus the arch-Pontily departed out of this world. in whose place M. Sempronius Tuditanus was invested for the Bishop, But C. Servilius Geminus was created the arch-prelat or high-priest aforiaid, In the honor of P. Licinius at his funerals, there was given a dole of flesh; and a shew exhibited of 120 sword-sensers fighting at sharp: likewise there were represented funeral plaies and games, which continued three dayes: and after that folemnity, I a feast was holden; during which, when the tables were set scipred accordingly all over the grand place of the City, suddainly there atole a tempest with great storms, which forced most men to erect tents and booths there: but after a while when the weather was fair again, they were taken down and had away; and men commonly gave out and faid, That wheras the Prophets & wilards had foretold among other their fatal prefages, that they should be forced to quarter & pitch tents in the market place of Rome; now that prophesie was fulfilled, and they were freed and excused from farther danger. And no sooner were they eased and delivered of that scruple, but they were troubled with another; for that it had rained blood two daies in the court-yard of Vulcan; and the Decemvirs published a solemn supplication for the expiation of that prodigious sign.

Before that the Confuls departed into their provinces, they brought into the Senat for to have x audience, the embassiages come from beyond Sea. And never before that day were so many men of those forrain parts icen at Rome. For from the time that the bruit was blown abroad amongst the nations bordering upon Macedony, that the Romans gave no deaf ear to the complaints and accufations commented against Philip, and that many had sped well by complaining; every City and State in their own behalf, yea, and many privat persons in particular (for an ill neighbour he was to them all) repaired to Rome, in hope either to be righted and eafed of their wrongs, orto difcharge their flomacks and be moned and comforted for their mileries. Likewile from King Enmenes there arrived an embassage accompanied with his own brother Athenaus to makecomplaint, as finding themselves grieved that the garrisons were not withdrawn out of Thracia: as alto to inform that Philip had fent certain aids into Bithynia to Prusias who made war upon Es L menes, Now Demetrius (Philip his son) at that time a very yong Gentleman, was to answer to all these challenges: and an easy peece of work it was not, either to bear in mind all the matters objested; or to think upon the points of every answer accordingly. For over and besides, that the articles were many in number, most of them were of very imall confequence and importance; namely, strife about limits and land-marks, about carying away men and ravishing women; of driving of cattel, of ministring justice partially and with affection, or else of none ministred at all: of sentences given and judgments passed in causes either by force or for favour. The Senat perceiving that neither Demetrius could speak to these points and give them good evidence, nor themselves be well informed and clee ly inftructed by him; being moved also and grieved to see the youth so raw a scholer in the e affairs, and therwith much troubled inspirit, gave order to enquire and de-M mand of him. Whether he had received any notes in writing from his father, as touching the premisses? And when he answered and said, Yea, they thought the first and principal thing for them to do was to fee and hear what were the answers of the King to every specialty and particular, And thereupon they prefently called for that book of his fathers, and then permitted him to read the contents therof. Now therein were set down certain brief abstracts of pleas and desenles to each feveral point shewing Imprimis, that some things he had done according to the decrees & awards of the Roman Delegats and commissioners. Item, Wheras he had lest somw hat undone the default was not in him but in the very parties that accused him. He had interlaced between, certaingieva ces and complaints as touching the iniquity and hard penning of those decrees; and how matters were not scanned and debated before Cacilius with that indifferency and equity as was meet N and requifit: and namely that without defert of the art, all men were fet against him and insulted over him. The Senat collected hereby good arguments, how the heart of Philip was wounded and galled against the Romans. But when the yong Prince excused some of these matters, and sor the rest promited and undertook, that all should be done to the uttermost as it pleased the Senat to order and set down; then it was thought good to deliver this answer unto him, That his father had in nothing done better nor more to the contentment of the Senat than that he seemed willing (howfoever matters were passed already) to make satisfaction to the Romans by the means of his fon Demetrius, As for the Senat, they could diffemble, forget, put up and endure many things done and past ; yea, and were perswaded verily in their hearts, that they might believe and trust Denie trius: as knowing affuredly, that although they fent his body again to his father Philip, yet they had o his heart and affection with them fill, as a fure pledge and hoftage; and that he was a friend to the people of Rome, so far forth as his reverent duty to his father would permit and give him leave letting him withal to understand, that for to do him honor, they would fend Embassadors into Macedany to the end that if ought had not been to fully effectuated as it should have been, it might be done yet in good time, without imputation of fault and blame, or poenal fatisfaction to be mide for any thing hitherto omitted: yea, and defirous they were, that Philip fliould understand, that by

he mediation of Demorrim and for his sake; the stood yet in good terms of peace and friendship with the people of Rome. These things intended and done for the increase of credit and reputation, presently turned to the dipleasure of the yong Gentleman, and in the end to his utter ruin and overthrow.

Then were the Lacedzmonians admitted to audience in the Senate. They moved many petty matters and trifling controveries; but those that principally touched the main point were theleis to wit, Whether they should be reflored again whom the Acheans had condemned or no? Items Whether they were justly or unjustly killed, whom they mustered? Moreover, they put to question, Whether the Lacedzmonians were to be comprised within the general affembly, and Counced of Acheas; or, that this State (as before-time) should have their rights and franchises apart by, glammfelves from all others in Pelopanos with The Senat ordained and awarded: Imprimis, That they should be reflored. Item, That the senator pronounced against them, should be reversed. Item; That Lacedsmon should be fervice to that high court and publick Diet of Acheas and finally, that, this accord and award should be engrossed, subscribed, and signed as well by the Lacedzmonians as Acheans.

Q. Martin was sent Embassador into Macedony: who also had direction and order given him by the same commission, to visit the state of the allies in Peloponnesses for there also remained some troubles after the old quarrels and variance; yea, and the Messenians refused to appear at the genes ral councel of Achea. Now if I would fet in hand to record the causes and circumstances of that war, I should forget my purpose in the beginning of my work, wherein I resolved not to touch at Gallany discourse of forain histories, no farther than they were linked to the Roman affairs. How 4. beit one memorable occurence there hapned, which I cannot pass by namely, that albeit the Acheanshad the better hand in war, yet it chanced that Philopamen their Pretor was taken priloner by the Messenians, as he made an expedition to seize upon Corone by pravention, which the enemies were defirous to be mafters of. Surprifed he was in a valley of great difadvantage, and fome few horsmen with him. It is reported that by the help of the Thracians and Candiots, he might have fled and escaped: but for very shame to abandon those men of arms, which were the noblest Gene tlemen of that nation, & whom he lately had made choice of he had not the power to do otherwife, but flay to fee the laft. For whiles he came himself behind in the rereward, because he was desirous to make means for their evasion through the streights of that pass, and to that purpose va-D liantly received the charge of the enemies, his horse sell and cast him at once; so as with his own fall and his horse lying upon him, he had like to have gone away in a swoon: a man now threescore. years old and ten; and withal, newly crept abroad and recovered of a long and lingering dileafe. which had mightily wasted and consumed the strength of his body. Well, thus lay he along, and the enemies ran over him; and so scon as they knew who he was, they reared him upon his feet from under his horse, no less respective than if he had been their own General in regard of a reverence they bare unto the man, and in remembrance of his noble exploits: they brought him again to himfelf, and forth of that by-valley standing out of the pais, they carried him into the high way : and were so far possessed and overcome with joy so unexpected, that they could not well believe their owneyes that they had gotten him: Some dispatched van-contriers to Messene with the news E hereof: namely, that the war was brought to an end, confidering that Philopagnen was taken and. was their prisoner. At first the tidings seemed so incredible, that the formost messenger was held. not only for a vain liar, but also for one not well in his wits : but after that there came one after . another, and all with one voice verified and affirmed the same at length it was believed. And then fee what they did I before they knew for certain that he approached neer unto the City; they all, ran forth of the gates by heaps to fee the man: all (I fay) bond as well as free, women and childen one with another. In fo much, as the gates were choaked up with the thrust and throng of the press: for no man could believe assuredly it was true, the thing was so strange, unless he might fee him with his own eyes. They that had the charge of bringing him, found much ado to put by the multitude whom they encounted, and to enter in at the gate; and fo thick they flood in the prefs, that they took up all the wayes befides, fo as he could not be brought forth to be feen Now because the most part of the people might not possibly have a fight of bim, they gat up all at once into the Theatre, which flood neer unto the way, and pettered is full; and with one voice theytried aloud, That he might be brought thither and presented unto the view of the whole people. The Magistrats and principal citizens, fearing lest the compassion that might arise in mens hearts spon the beholding of fo worthy a personage, would raise some trouble and commotion; whiles ome comparing the reverence of his former authority and Majefly, with his prefent condition. and calamity; and others calling to remembrance his manifold deferts and paffing good turns; might haply be couched with pity; fet him a far off in the open fight of them all, and then at once took him halfily out of their view : for their Pretor Dinocrates gave out openly and faid, That the Migistrats were to enquire and demand certain points of him as touching the main sum of the toall war. Then he was brought into their Councel-Chamber, where their Senare affembled and began to consult about him. It was now well toward evening; and so far off they were from teloting in other matters, that they could not bethink themselves and agree, in what place they might keep him that one night in faleguard. Astonical they were and amaled, to consider and, hink upon the greatnes of histelface part, and of his noble vertue and valour a and no man; dust receive the charge and custody of him in his own house, mor grust any one besides with his keeping. At length some there were, that put them in mind of the publick treasury of theH City, valued under the ground like a dungeon, and walled all about with frong square flone bto it was he let down bound as he was, and a mighty huge Rone (being the cover of the vault) as by an engin laid over, to enclose him fure, Thus reposing more trust for his fafe custody in that place than in any person, they waited and attended the next morning. When morrow day was come, the whole entire multitude in general, recommending the benefits and good turns done of old by him to their City, were of mind to pardon and spare him, and by his means and mediation, to feek for remedies and redrefs of their prefent diffresses and calamities. But those persons by whose motive and inducement the Messenians had revoked (and such were they as ruled all the common-weal) consulted apart in secret, and concluded with one consent to put him to death: only the doubt and question was, whether they should do the thing with speed, or by I delay, But those prevailed in the end, who were more greedy of present revenge, and so they sent one unto him with a draught of poiton. When he had taken the cup in his hand (by report) he gave not a word, but only asked, whether Lycortas (the other General of the Achzans) were efcaped alive, and the foresaid horsmen safe? When answer was made, that they were in safety; That is happy, (quoth he) and therewith drunk off every drop in the cup right heartily, and a while after yeelded up his vital breath. But long joyed they not of his death who were the bloody authors of this cruelty : for the City of Meffene being conquered by force of arms, among other capitulations, delivered these maletactors into the hands of the Achaans, who demanded presently to have them. The bones and reliques of Philopamen were likewife rendred unto them, and interred he was by the general Councel of all Achea, in such solemn wife, that in heaping upon him all ho- K nours that could be devised for an earthly man, they forbare not allo to adore him as a Godimmortal. The Historiographers, as well Greek as Latine, attribute so much unto this man, that some of them have recommended to posterity (as a memorable thing of all others that happed this year:) to wit, that in this one year there died three renowned Captains, Philopamen, Annibal, and P. Scipio. See how they have matched him in equality with the greatest warriors and noblest

Generals of the two most puissant nations in the whole world! Then came T. Quintins Flamininus inembaliage to King Prusius, whom the Romans had in inspition and jealousy, both sorthat he had received Annibal after the flight of Antiochus, and also because he made war upon Eumenes. Now, were it that among other matters Flamininus charged Prufiat, that he entertained in his court the most spightfull enemy of all men living, unto the L people of Rome; who first follicited his own native countrey to take arms against the Romans, and after the force and power thereof was abated and defeated, perswaded King Antischus to do thelike: or rather that Prusian of his own accord to gratify Flamininus there present, and to do the Romans a pleasure, had a meaning and intent either to kill Annibal, or to deliver him alive into their hands. I wot not how it come abour, but upon the fifft communication and confetence between them, there were fouldiers fent incontinently to befet and guard his house. Annibal evermore forcast in mind some such issue and end of his lite, seeing the deadly and inexpiable hatred that the Romans bare unto him; repoling belides no confidence at all in the fidelity of these Kings, and having withal some experience already of the inconstancy and levity of King Prufias. Moreover, he had in horrour this coming of Flaminiums, as fatal unto him, and a mean to M work his final destruction. To the end therefore he might be ever provided aforehand against those inconveniences and dangers, wherewith on all sides he was encumbred, and have a ready way of evalion to lave himself, he had devised and caused to be made seven dores for egress out of his houle, whereof some were very privy and secret vaults, because they should not be environed with guards. But Kings commandments are of that force, that whatforver they would have to be fearched out and discovered, cannot lielong hidden. For the guards to compassed and enclosed the wholecircuit of the house, that it was impossible for any to get forth and make an elcape. Annibal being advertised that the Kings fouldiers were at the gate, affaied to fleal away at a postern, which stood furthest out of the way, and wherof the convelance was most secret, but perceiving that the fouldiers had befet it too, and lay for to encounter and receive him that way, N and that every place was invested with a set guard, he called for the possion which he had of long time before ready prepared for all such occurrent occasions, and necesed these words withal, "Let "us rid these Romans of this their continual fear and pain wherein they have been all this while, " fince that they think it fo long to flay for the death of one old man, Flaminians shall obtain no egreat nor memorable victory of me, difarmed thus as I am, and betraied into his hands, Butthis "very day shall prove and testify, how far the people of Rome are degenerate and changed from their ancient manners. Their foresathers (qd, he) advertised King Pyrchus their enemy amed in field, and lying with an host of men against them in Italy, they gave him wathing I say to take " heed of posion: but these living at this day, have sent their Embassador, even one that hath "born the dignity of a Conful to advile and complet Prufias wickedly to take the life away of his o own gueft. Then after he had curied the person of Prusa and his whole realm, and called upon " the Gods, protectors of the law of hospitality, to bear witness how he had violated his faith and broken promise with him, he set the cop of posson to his mouth, and drank it off. This was the end of Annibal, Polybins and Ratilius write, that Scipio also died this year, But Laccord neither with them nor with Valerius. From them I square, because I find that when M. Porchus and L. Palerius were Censors, the same L. Valerius being Censor, was elected President of the Senat, where-

A as Africanus had been President for ten years space together, during the time of two reviews by Centors next before. And to long as the taid Africanus lived, there would have been no other chofen Prefident in his room, unlets himfelf were to have been caffed and deprived of the Senators dignity, of which diffrace and note of infamy, there is not one that maketh any mention. And as for Valerine Amias, he is sufficiently refuted by M. Navin a Tribun of the Commons, against whom there is an Oration extant, and the same penned by P. Africanus, and bearing his name, This Navint is recorded in the rols and registers of Magistrars, by the title of Tribun of the Commons, in that year when P. Cladina and L. Porcius were Confuls, but he entred into his office during the Confulfhip of App. Claudeus and M. Sempronius, the tenth of December. From which time to the fifteenth of March are three months, upon which day Yub, Clodius and L. Porcius be-B gan their Conjulship, So, it seemeth that he was living during the I ribnoship of Navin, and that he might well commense an action against him, and call him to his answer, but he departed this life before that L. Cato and M. Porerus were Cenfors. But in my conceit the death of the ethree (the most renowned perionages each one of their own nation) are not to be compared one with theother in this regard, that they hapned all just at one time, more than for this, that none of them all had an end correspondent and answerable to the portly thate and giorious lutire of his life. For full and formost in this they all jumped together, that they neither died nor were enterred in their native countrey. Again, Annibal and Philopamen were both poilon d. Annibal was banished and betraied by his own friend and hoft, Philopamen was taken pritoner, and left his life in prilon and irons. As for Scipio; although he was neither exiled nor condemned, yet making default of appa-C rance at the day affigned unto him, and being cited to his answer in his absence, wi lingly banished not himself only for his life time, but his corps and funerals also after his death.

Whiles those affairs passed in Pelaponnesus (from whence our pen hath a little diverted and digreffed) the return of Demetrius and the Embaffadors into Macedon, diversly wrought in mens minds, and amused them some in one thing, and some in another. The common people of Macedoms, who were mightily afraid that the Romans would make war upon them, highly affected Demetrias, and cast a favourable aspect upon him as the author of peace and withat they delined him without all doubt to the Kingdom, after the decease of his father. For albeit he were yonger than his brother Perfeus, yet menthought and ipake, that he was begotten in matrimony by Philip of his lawful wife, whereas he had Perfeus by a concubin, who carried no token and mark of Da certain father, as having to his mother a woman that was nought of her body and common. Whereas Demetrius relembled his father Philip, and was as like him as might be. Moreover, men faid, That the Romans would place and establish Demetrius in the Royal throne of his father, but Perfess was in no credit and reputation among them. Thus folk fluck not to give out abroad in their common talk. Whereupon not only Perfeus was in care and doubt, that the preeminence of age only would little boot and advantage him, confidering in all respects else he was inferiour to his brother, but Philip also himself, supposing verily that it would hardly lie in his power to leave the inheritance of the crown to whom he pleased, thought that his yonger son was a mote in his eye, and troubled him more than was for his eafe. Offended otherwhiles he was, that the Macedonians reforted unto him io much as they did, and highly displeased that there should be Eany more royal courts than one in his realm, during his life. And to speak a truth, the young Prince himself returned from Rome more puffed up, no doubt with pride than was befeeming; as who prefumed and grounded much upon the opinion that the Senat had of him, perceiving that they had granted those things to him which had been denied unto his father b fore: but look how much favor and honor (in respect of the Romans) he won among the rest of the Macedonians, so much envy and ill will he procured himself thereby not only with his brother. but with his father also: and especially after that other Roman Enbassadors were arrived and that Philip was forced to part with Threeia and withdraw his garrifons, and to do other things either by verthe of the old award of the first commissioners, or by a new ord nance of the Senat. Well, he performed all, but with an heavy heart and many a deep figh and grone, and so much the rather, be-Faule he observed and saw how his son Demetrius conversed more with the Embassadors, and frequented their company oftner than his. Howbeit he obeied, and did whatfoever was enjoined him by the Romans, because he would minister unto them no occasion of levying war against him out of hand. And supposing it was good policy to a vert their minds from all surption that he minded any fuch designs tending that way, he led his army into the midst of Throwa against the Odyfians, Danthelets, and Beffians. He won the City Philoppopolis abandoned by the inhabitants who were fled, and had retired themselves with their whole families to the high mountains next adjoining : and after he had wasted the Lands and territories of the Barbarians that inhabited the champain countrey, he received them under his subjection by composition. Asterwards, having lest agarrison at Philippopolis, which soon after was chased and expelled by the Odrysians, he destumined to build a Town in Deuriopus, a region of Paonia neer the river Erigonus, which issueth Ott of Illyricum, and keeping his course through Paoma dischargeth it self, and selleth into the river Axins. Not far from Sroba the old City, he built a new and caused it to be called Perfeis, thereby to do honour to his eldest fon Perfeus.

During the train of these affairs in Macedony, the Consults took their journey into their several Provinces. Marcellus sent a messenger before him to L. Porcius the Pro-consult, to give him to understand that he should present his legions before the new Town of the Gauls, But at the first approach approach of the Conful, the Frenchmen yeelded the place. Twelve thousand they were that bare H arms and most of them had by force gotten their armour out of their country, villages, which was taken from them maugre their hearts, with allthings elfe, that either they had gotten out of the country by pilling and robbing, or brought with them of their own. Wheneupon they addressed their Embaliadors to Rome, for to make complaint of thefe abules and wrongs: who having audience given in the Senat by C. Valerius the Pretor, declared, how by occasion that Gaul was furcharged with a multitude of people, they were confirmined as well for want of ground and pofferfions, as also for need and poverty, to pais over the Alps and leek themselves some place of habitation. And where they faw any quarters forlet, defart, and unpeopled, there they had planted themselves, without offering injury to any person : where also they had begun to builds I own, which might be a good proof and argument, that they came not to do violence upon any City or I country Village, And now of late M. Claudius had fent unto them a meffage, that unless they submitted and yeelded, he would war upon them: whereupon they preferring certain peace (although it were leis honorable) before the doubful hazard & adventures of war, furrendered rather to be in the protection and safeguard, than under the subjection of the people of Rome. But a few daies aftter, they were commanded to quit both City and Country. And thereupon resolved in their mind to depart in filence and faying never a word into what place feever they could, there to seektheir fortune : but then they were disarmed, yea, and spoiled and stript of all that ever they had and nothing left, that either they drave before them, or carried about them. In regard whereof they were humble suppliants to the Senat and people of Rome, that they would not proceed in more rigour and cruelty against them, harmless persons as they were, and submitting themselves w unto them, than against professed enemies. To this Oration of complaint the Senat caused this anfwer to be returned: That neither they had done well in coming into Italy, and prefuming to build them a City upon other mens territories, without permission of the loveraign Roman Magistrat, who had the government of those parts: nor yet the Senat was well pleased, that they should be thus despoiled, considering they had yeelded. And therefore minded they were to send with them their Embaffadors to the Confuls to command them in their name, to fee that all their own goods should be restored again unto them, so that they made return thither from whence they came: who also should go forward immediatly over the Alps, to give the States of France warning to keep in their people with them and hold them in their native country: for almuch as the Alps were the frontier limits standing in the mids to confine between them, and therefore L those mountains neither ought nor might be passed of one side or the other; and to make account of this, that they should speed no better now in transgressing their bounds, than at what time as they first made a way and passinge over them into Italy. The Embassadors emploied about this bufiness, were L. Furius Purpurio, Q. Minutius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. Thus the French, after reflitution made unto them of all that was their own by good right, and without wrong of others, departed out of Italy, Now when these Roman Legats were come they had good words and conrteous answer from the Transalpine nations. And those amongst them that were more ancient than the rest, blamed the people of Rome for their overmuch lenity, in that they let those persons 90, who without warrant from the whole State, durst be so bold as to take a voyage to settle upon any lands belonging to the Signory of Rome, and were fo hardy as thereon to build a Town. For M furely they deserved not less than to abide grievous smart for their rash demeanor. Moreover and belides, whereas the Romans have given them their own goods again, they feared much that fo great indulgency of theirs, would induce and encourage others to enterprise the like. So they friendly entertained and as kindly accompanied the Embassadors yea, and liberally presented them with rewards. M. Claudius the Conful having thus expelled the Gauls out of his Province, began to lay the ground of the litrick war, and for this purpose wrote his letters unto the Senat, for a warrant and commission to pass with his legions into Isria. The Senat was therewith contented, But whereas they were in question and consultation about conducting a Colony to inhabite Aquileia, they could not agree whomto fend, whether Latins or Roman citizens. But in conclusion the LL, N thought it better to plant there a Colony of Latins, The Triumvirs for to effect this, were created

P. Scipio Nafica C. Flamininus, and L. Manlins Acidinus.

The same year were two Colonies of Roman citizens erected at Mutina and Parma: and two thousand persons were to either place translated out of the territory which lately was occupied by the Boians, and before time had been in the tenure of the Tuscans. They of Parma were endued with eight acres of land, and those of Mutina with five a peece, The Triumvir-Commission oners who had the disposing and managing of the business, were M. Emplius Lepidus, T. Ebuius Carus, and L. Quintius Crispinus. Likewise the colony Saturnia confisting of Roman citizens, was brought into the territory of Caletra, by the conduct of Q. Fabins Labeo, C. Afranius Stellio, and T. Semp Gracehus, deputed Triumvirs therefore: who fet out for every man ten acres of ground. 0

The same year A. Teremius the Pro-pretor, not far from the River Iberus in the Ausetans country, fought fortunatly against the Celtiberians, and forced certain Towns which they had fortified. Base Spain beyond Iberus was quiet this year, because both P. Sempronius the Propeetor lay fick of a long disease, and also the Lustranians (as good hap was) rested still and quiet, as being by not man provoked to fir. Neither was there any memorable exploit atchieved in Ligaria by Q. Fabins the Conful, M. Marcellus was called home out of Istria: and after he had discharged his

my, returned to Rome for to hold the election of the Magistrats. For Confuls he created Cn. aim); Tamphilus and L. Empilus Paulus, This man had been Edile Curule together with M. Emilist Lepidus, who was Conful five year before; and yet the same Lepidus suffered the repuse mice ere he was created Coniul. Then were Pretors chosen, to wit, Q. Fulcius Flaceus, M.V. I. riunne Levinus, L. Mantises the second time, M. Ogulnius Gallus L. Cacilius Denter, & C. Terentius ifra. Inthe very end of the year there was a folemn inpplication ho den by occasion of certain prodigissior men believed verily that in the court yard of the goddeis Concordia it rained bond on the pace of two daies: and reported it was not far from Stelly, that a new Land was discovered out of the Sea, where never any was before feen V. lerius Am as writeth that Annibal died this years and that to compais and work his death, there were fent in embaliage to Prufiss, L. Se pio Afragieus, and P. Scipio Nafica, befides T. Quintius Flamininus, who in that action is named most,

, The fortieth Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the (ity of Rome. The Breviary of L. Florm upon the forcieth Book.

CWW Hen Philip had given commandment to make streight search for the children of those whom he kept in prison (and personages they were of most noble birth) for to put them to death. The oxena fusing the King his malicious intent and wicked luft, in the behalf as well of her own children as of her fifter fittle ones (God wot) and very yong infants brought forth and offered unto the faid children neked ten words, and a cup of deadly poilon, per wading with them to wood the imminent frame and definencur, by prefent death: which after for had obtained and feen effected, fhe likewife placed her own part and flew ber our felf, Moreover in this book are related the debate and variance between Perious and Demettius she two fons of Philip King of Macedony: and how Demetrius came to his death by porfon, through the missions practise of his trather Persons who devised fills crimes and raif a standars against him: and principally among the reft, charged him that he intended to kill his own father, and me ant to usurpe Dibe Kingdom, & I.ft of all, because he was a friend to the people of Rome: by which means after the death of Philip Perseus obtained the crown. Also it contained the happy expl. it auchieve d by many and divers commanders in Liguria, and in Spain againft the Celtiberians. The books of Numa Pompilius were by certain hubbandmen as they laboured in the ground of L. Petilius a Notary, under the Janiculum, found enclosed within a coffer of stone, and written both in Latine and Greek, And when the Pretor of the Cityto whom the books were brought, had perufed them, and found therein many points tending to overthrow-eligion and the divine service of the Gods she swore before the Senat that it was dangerous for the State and Common-wealth, that they (hould be read and preferved : in fuch fort that by an Att of the State, they were burned within the Comitium or Hall of pullick affemblies. The Celony Aquileia was now eretted. Philip exceedingly diffleafed with him felf and pricked with remorfe of conscience for that B be had cassed his fon Demetrius to be possoned, upon the fulfe suggestions and accusations of his other Conframed appainst him, devised to punish Perseus, and rather to confer the Kingdom upon Antigonus his friend, than that his fon foould succeed him tout in this designment and purpose of his he s. ddainly died: and fo Perseus took the crown and Kingdom upon him.

The fortieth book of T. Livius.

N the beginning of the year next entuing, the Confuls and Pretors call lots for their leveral governments. As for the Confuls, there was no other Province to employ them in but Liguria, The civil jurisdiction among citizens fell to M. Ogulnin: Gallus; and the forrein over strangers to M. Valerius. High Spain was affigued unto Q. Fulvius Flaccus; and the Nether-land thereof to P. Manlins. L. Cecilius Denter had the governance of Sicily, and C. Terentins Ifra of Sa dinia. The Confuls were enjoyed to take musters: for Q. Fabin had written out of Liguria, that the Appuans inclined to rebellion, and greatly to be feared it was, that they would break out and make rodes into the territory of Pifa. And well they knew already, that of the two Provinces of Spain, the higher parts were in arms, and the war with the Celtiberians was fill in train: and as for the lower the military discipline there, was clean corrupt and gone, by reason of riotons pleasures and idlenes, where unto the fouldiers were wholly given, by occasion that the Pretor lay so long sick. For these causes thought good it was that new armies should be levied and en olled; to wir, four legions for Liguria, and every one of them to contain $200 foot and 300 horse: unto which, there was an addition of 15000 footmen, and 900 men of arms from out of the Latine allies, And thefe two armies were to ferve the Confuls. But over and befides they were commanded to entol 7000 foot, and 600 horfemen of Latine allies, and them to fend into France to M. Marcellu, who was to continue ftill in place of command, after the term of his Confu thip expired, Likewife they had in charge to levy of Roman Citizens 4000 footmen and 200 horse, and of allies 7000 of the one, and 300 of the other to be conducted into both Provinces of Spiin, And Q. Pa-7000 of the one, and 300 of the other to be conducted into both 1 longer, with the charge of bius Labes had his commission of government renewed for one year longer, with the charge of The that army which he had in Liguria.

The fpring feafon that year was very flormy and tempeffuous. On the even of the feaft Palilia about noon-tide, juddainly there arole a mighty bluftring wind, which overthrew many edifices as we lacred as profane. It call down the braien flatues and images in the Capitol: it caught up the wicket of the dore belonging to the Temple of the "Moon, (which is in the Aventine) caried it away and fet it falt to the back wall of the Temple of Ceres. It overturned and laid along other flatues in the great cirque or flew-placed called Circus Maximus, together with the pillars upon which they flood. The lanterns and pinnacles it rent and tare after a firange fort from the roof and top of certain Churches, and carried them clean away. And therefore this tempel was held birin day (asir for a prodigious token, and the Aruspices gave order for the expiation and latisfaction thereof Likewise the same provision was made in regard of a report from Reate, that a mule was foled were) of Rome. with three feet : and from Formia, that the Chappel of Apollo (and namely at C jeta) was triken I with lightning. For these prodigies, there were twenty greater bealts killed for tacrifice; and a supplication holden one whole day. And about the same time, intelligence was given by letters from A. Terentins the Pretor, that P. Sempron us having continued above a year in k was departed this life, in the farther Province of Spain; which was the cause that the Pretors were willed to make more hall, and so much the sooner to pass into Spain. After this, the embaffages from beyond the Sea had audience given them in the Senat, The first was that, of the two KK Eumenes and Pharnaces, and also of the Rhodians, who complained for the great loss and overthrow by the Sinopians received. And about the same instant arrived also Embaffadors from Philip from the Achæans and Lacedæmonians who had their antwer and difpatch, after a speech made by Martins, who had been sent to visit the estate and affairs of Greece K and Macedony. But as touching the foresaid Kings of Asia, and the Rhodians this flood for their answer: namely That the Senat would fend their Embassadors and Commissioners to take knowledge and see to all things there in place. But as concerning Philip, Martins had so told his tale. that he put the LL, of the Senat in more fear and perplexity: for in his declaration he contested, that Philip indeed had accomplished the will and pleasure of the Senat, but in such fort, as it was evident to be seen, that he would do so no longer than he were held thereto and compelled of neceffity; for apparant it was, that he minded to make war again, confidering that what oever he either did or faid, tended to no other end. For first and formost he caused all the multitude to be removed and translated (with their whole families) out of the cities by the Sea-coast, into that quarter which now is called * Emathia, and in times past was named Paonia; and gave those I Cities aforesaid to the Thracians and other barbarous nations to inhabit; supposing that this kind of people would be more fast and taithful unto him in his wars against the Romans. And verily this deed of his bred a great discontenument and murmuring throughout al Mardona: info much, as few there were of th m, who thus left their native habitations together with their wives and child en, that could bite in and contain their fecret grief and heart-burning, and fay nothing : but being pricked and netled more to anger than curbed and bridled with fear, they brake out, and were heard to curse and cry out upon the King, as they went along the way in troops and companies. Hereupon his fell (tomack by nature was logalled that he had all men in jealouly, and no time nor place there was, but he inspected. In the end he began to give it out openly, that he could not make account to be in fafety and fecurity unless he apprehended and kept in prilon the chi dren of those persons whom he had before-time killed for to dispatch and make away them also (in time) one after another. This crue ty in it telf hainous enough and enormous, the calamity and wofull milery of one house made more odious and detettable. Murdered he had many years before Herodicus, a noble man and a Prin e of the Theffalians: and fome time after, he flew also his sons in law, who had married his daughters. These Gentlewomen being lest Widows, had each of them by their Husbands a little Son: and the names of these women were Theoxena and Archo. As for Theorems the would in no wife marry again, albeit the had many fuiters that woed her: but Archo was wedded to one Poris, the very principal and noblest personage of the Enean Nation: and when she had born him many children she died, and lest them all very yong. Then a terwards Theoxenalikewise was married to the foresaid Poris, to the end, that she might have the bringing up of those her sisterschildren with her own hands : and in truth she was not more kind to her own pretty fon than to those her lifters children; but so tenderly regarded them all alike, as if the had born them of her own body. Now when the heard once of the Kings ed et and proclamation which was gone forth, for the apprehension of all those infants whose fathers before had been put to death; supposing that their children should be exposed not only to the abuse and scornful mockery of the King but also to the lust and villany of his guard she conceived in her mind an horrible designment: yea, and she stuck not to say, That with her own hand the would rid them of their lives, rather than they thould come within the chitches of Philip. But Poris her husband (who abhorred the very naming of so abominable a fact) said that he would conveigh them out of the way as far as Athens, to certain truly friends of his there, and would himself in proper person accompany them all the way thither, and take part with them of that exile and banishment. So they put themselves in their journey, all together [he and his wife and children] from Thessalonica toward Anea, unto a solemn lacrifice and sent which yearly they use to celebrate with much ceremonions pomp, in the honor of Eneas their first founder. Now when they had spent that day in feafting full solemnly, about the third watch of the night (when all others were found afleep) they were embarked in a ship prepared aforehand by Poris

making femblance, as if they would return to The falonica; but indeed purposing to cut over to Eubera. But when they had laboured and wrought to no purpose upon the wind, which was full against them, they were overtaken and prevented by the day-light before they were far from the Land, and past fight. And being discovered by the Kings officers who had the charge and keeping of the haven, there was a pinnace or foilt (well appointed with armed men) fet out to ferch in that veffel, with express commandment (as they would answer to the contrary at their utter penil) not to come again without it. Now as they approached neer, Poris verily for his part was very earnest: with the rowers, mariners, and failers, to plie their bunnels and make way from them; otherwhiles fretching out his hands up to heaven, calling and praying unto the Gods to help them in this their hard diffress. But the couragious lady his wife all the while (turning again R to execute that defignment of hers long before purposed) tempered and mixed a potion of poilon. and brought forth certain fwords withal. Now when the had fet the poisoned cup before the children in their very eye, and drawn the words naked : Death (quoth the) is the only means we have to fave our liberty; lo here the wayes that lead to death: now as every ones heart flandeth to this or that take thereto, and avoid the cruelty and pride of the King. Come on lads and joily striplings, lead you the way first that are the bigger and elder; take sword in hand, fall therepoon and work the feat at once: or if ye lift rather to be long a dying, drink here of this cup. What should they do? the enemies were fast upon them ready to board their veffel, their mother on the other fide, encouraging them instantly to take their death. In such wife, that to conclude, fome dying the one way and some the other, were all cast headlong over shipboord, when they were but half dead. Then the for her part embracing her husband about the middle (because the would dye with him for company) threw her felf and him both together into the Sea. Thus the Kings men seized upon the ship, when the masters thereof were gone.

The horrible example of this fact kindled more coals, and fet the malice and hatred kindled against the King as it were on a light and flaming fire anew, in omuch as now commonly in al places they fell to open curfing of him and his children. Which maledictions and execuations, it was not long but all the Gods liftned and gave ear unto, and caused that he likewise exercised cruelty even upon his own flesh and blood. For Perseus seeing his brother Demetrius to artise every day more than other in favour, greatness, and reputation with the whole Macedonian people, and to grow also in credit and grace among the Romans, supposing with himself how he had D no other hope left him of attaining to the crown, but by the means of some wicked practile bent all his thoughts and studies that way, and aimed only at that mark. But believing verily that he wasnot firong enough and fufficient alone, to execute and bring forth so much only, as within that unmanly and womanish mind of his he had deviled and conceived, he practised with his fathers friends, and eftioons founded their hearts one by one apart, cashing our ambiguous and doubtful speeches. And at the first verily some of them shewed countenance, as if they could not abide to hear of any such thing, because they reposed more hope in Demetrius. But afterwards, as the hatted of Philip grew daily greater against the Romans, which Perseus still fostered and maintained, whereas Demetrius with all his might laboured against it; they fore-seeing in their mind the unhappy end of Demetrius, who lay too open and was not heedful enough to guard himfelf E against the fraudulent and mischievous plots of his brother, sided with Persens; making this account in policy, to fer that agoing and help it forward, which in the end would take effect, and namely to entertain and advance the hope of the mightier. For the execution of the rest they referved every thing to a meet and convenient time therefore. As for the prefent, the best course they thought upon was this, to incense the King all that ever possibly they could against the Romans, to induce and put him forward fill to think of nothing but war, whereto of his own accord his mind flood well enough and was enclined. And withal (to the end that Demetrius might befrom day to day more and more suspected) they entred of purpose (as before they were agreed) into speech, as couching the hope and great port of the Romans: whereat when some of them would feeling again in feormul wife to debate their manners and fashions, others to de-Prave their deeds and acts, fome fcoffing in general at the very form and making of their City, how it was not yet embelished & beautified either with stately edifices in publick places, or with hir houses of private men; so there mocking and having in derision the principal and chief persomges of the City in particular, the inconfiderat yong Gentleman, carried away as well with an affedionat love to the Romans, as with a defire to cross his brother, would answer to althose points In hedelence and maintenance of the Romans: by which means he brought himfelf both into more jelonly with his facher, and also to be subject & exposed to flanderous imputations. Wherespon his father accurainted him no more with any counsel as rouching the Roman affairs, but wholly edied upon Perfess, and with him conferred thereabour, imparting thro him both day and light all his projects and deligns what oever, By this time were they returned whom he chanced to lend to the Bafferns for to levy fuccors and aid-louddiers, and brought they had with them from thence certain noble young Gentlemen, and some among of royal blood. One of them promised to give his fifter in marriage to one of Philip long infomuch as the affociation by way of affinity with that nation let the Kings heart also, aloft, But Perfeus brake out into these words: "What serves "All this for (qd. he) fince we have not to much help and fafety by aids from a broad, as harmand "anger by a milchief and malady as bome. " have sent us again, but his heart and soul they are possessed of, ever since he was an hostage at H 6. Rome. All the Macedonians in a manner have their eies upon him fet, him they court, and give Cour in plainterms that they will no other King than whom the Romans shall fet up. Old Philip was of himielf badly enough affected in his mind, but upon these suggestions buzzed into his head. he was the worfe, and more disquieted and set out of frame: he entertained these surmises, and set them neerer to his heart than he made fair in outward shew and countenance. Now it fortuned that the time was come of the ordinary review of his army, the folemnity wheref was usually performed in this manner. They cut a dog overthwart the midft in two halfs, the head and foreparts together with the entrals were fet on the right hand of the high way; the hind parts on the left. Between this facrifice thus divided, the companies in their atmour passed in a shew. Before the front of the vanguard were carried the coats of arms and royal entigns of all the Macedonian Kings T that ever had been from the beginning, Then followed the King himself in person with his children. Next marched the Kings guard and cohort, with the squires of his body. And last of all, in the reregard behind came the rest of the multirude and commons of the Macedonians, Of either fide of the King went his fons, two lufty Gentiemen. Perfeu was about 30 years old, and Demerius five years yonger; the one in the mids and best of his age and strength, and the other in the very prime and flour thereof. An happy father had he been for to fair iffue, feeing this proof, this maturity and perfection of theirs, if the grace of God had gone with al, and that they had been well dispoied and affected in mind. The manner and cultome of this review and iolemn fight was (after the facrifice duly accomplished) for the whole army to joult and tourney in this wife that being divided into two battailons, they should one charge the other, and represent the shew of a very K conflict and fet field. And who frould be the chief leaders and captains in this brave pastime, but the Kings two fons? But believe me they jested never a whit, nor made a vain shew for disport, but went to it roundly in good earnest, as if they would determine now who should be King another day? Foul work they made with their woodden walters and headlesspikes; many were wounded, and nothing wanted there but there iron, of a very bloody battel indeed. That regiment which Demetrius commanded, had the upper hand by ods, Perfeus thewed himself highly displeafed and angry thereatibut contrary-wife his frier ds and favourits of the wifer fort rejoyced at it, and made remonstrance, That this was the only thing to minister just occasion unto him for to challenge and accuse his yonger brother. Now the same day, the one as well as the other fealed their companions, who had thus performed the joults and tournaments of either fide with them, I Perfeus was invited by his brother to supper, but he refused and denied to come. Howbeit such was the good fellow thip amongst them, and so merry were the yong gallants and lufty Cavaliers, that they passed the seastival day in all joy and mirth, either part with their Captain, and plied the wine full liberally. Then in their ups they tell to discouring freely of their running and pattime, and began to cast out merry conceits and broad jests at their adversaries of the contrary fide, infomuch as they forbate not to glance at the very Captains themselves. Now had Perfeus lent a privy spie, one of his guests, to listen what good talk there was at his brothers boord, but he demeaning himself & walking not so circumspectly as he should, was encountred by certain youths, that chanced to come forth of the hall or parlor where they fate at supper, and was evil entreated and well beaten for his labour. Demetrius nothing aware thereof, among other table talk, Why M go we not (qd,he) and banket with my brother? and if there remain any anger and displeasure behind after our joulting in jeft, appease and mitigate the same in simplicity of heart and mitth-making? Mary, no better, cried they all again with one voyce, save only those that seared to be met withal prefently and ferved alike for militing & knockingthe forfaid spie, Demetrius would needs draw even them allo with him; whereupon they carried weapons hidden under their apparel for fear of the worst that they might defend themselves, if any violence were offred, But what can be carried to fecret, but out it will, where there is intelline discord in one family? All was full of spices and faife knaves, as well in the one house as the other. For there ran a pick-thank and talecaries beforounto Perfens, and declared unto him that there werecoming with Demetrius four yong men with privy skeins by their fides, And albeit he wist well enough what was the cause thereof for N he had heard that one of his guests was by them beaten) yet to aggravate the matter and make it more odious, he commanded the dore to be fast locked; and from the upper rooms and loss of the house and out of the windows to the street side, he kept off and repelled those (that came to banket and be merry with him) from approaching the dore, as if their coming were for no other putpose but to murder him. Demetrius after he had for a time cried out in the fireet and taken on for this diffrace and indignity, faying it was long of the wine and nothing elfe that he was thus excluded, returned again to his own house to make an end of the banket there: and all this while knew nothing what the matter was. The morrow after, Perfeut, fo foon as ever he thought he might have accels to the speech of his father, came to the court and in the fight of the King stool afar off with a troubled countenance and heavy cheer, and not a word with him. How now (qd. o " his father) what is amil's with your is not all well? Ahmy good lord and father (qd. he)! would "you knew, that it is the fair gift & grace of God that I am a live man at this hour. That brother " of mine, goeth not about us any more by way of secret practises and hidden ambushes: for the "night that was, he came with armed men to fet upon me in mine own house, and to take away "my life, I was driven (father) to that the doors against him, and to save my self from his surious "sage, within the defence of the walls thereof. When he had thus possessed his father with fear and aftenishment together; Nay (qd, he) I will prove all plainly before your facesthat you shall know it is a truth that I fay, if your grace can be content to give me audience, Audience? (gd.he) yes mary will I and that with patience: and immediatly he commanded Demetrial to becalled before him. And withal, he fent for two of his old triends to affilt him, and to take their advise, to wit. Lyfimachus and Onemaftus, who will nothing oi the quarrel and variance between the two brethren, for that they had been strangers a long time at the court. In the mean while, he walked up and down alone, attending their coming, courling and discoursing many matters in his head, and his ion Perfere Hood fill aloof. After word was brought that the parties were come he retired afide with thole two friends, and as many of his guard into an inner room, and permitted his tons to bring with them into the place, three friends a piece unarmed. And when he was fet, thus be-B gan he to speak.

Thetwo Confuls took their journy into Liguria the fole confular Province of them both and because they had atchieved their exploits fortunatly there ordained there was a solemn procession for one day, It fortuned that there came two thousand Ligurians or thereabout to the utmost from tier of the Province of Gaul, where Marcellus lay inleaguer, requesting to be received under his protection. Marcellus after he had commanded the laid Ligutians to give attendance upon him in the same place, required by his letters the advice of the Senat, The Senat gave order to M. Ogalnine the Lord chief justice of the City, to write back again unto Marcellus to this effect, That it was more meet that the Confuls, unto whom that government appertained, should give order and determine (as touching the Ligurians who yeelded and submitted) what was expedient for the common-weal in that behalf, than the Senat. As for them, if they were to give their opinion, they thought it not good to accept of the Ligurians forrender: and being once received then to be difarmed but they were of this mind and advice, that it was requifit they should be sent and referred over to the Confuls.

The Pretors at the same time arrived in their Provinces, to wit P. Manlius in base Spain, where he had been Governor before during his former Pretorship and Q, Falvius Flacem in the higher where he received the army of Terentius; for that other fide of Spain beyond Iberns, had been led without a Lord Deputy, by occasion of the death of P. Sempronius the Pro-pretot. Whiles Ful vius Flaccus affaulted a Town in Spain named. W. bicula, the Celtiberians made head and came upon him; where many and fundry hot skirmilbes passed, and wherein many Roman soul diers were both hure and flain; Howbeit Fulvins held fill his resolution, and by no for cible means whatfoever, could be brought to levy the fiege. The Celtiberians toiled out of heart with divers combats, retired and departed. The City then teeing their fuccours dislodged and gone, within few daies was forced and ranfacked; and the Pretor gave the pillage thereof to his fouldiers. Thus Fulvius after he had gained this Town, and P. Manlius, when he had retired and rallied his forces into one place, which had been dispersed; without any other memorable ac performed, brought their armies within the wintering harbours. And thefe were the exploits in Spain, during that lummer featon. Terentum who was departed out of that Province before, entred the City of Rome in a petty triumph by way of ovation. He carried before him in fliew, eight thousand three hundred and twenty pound weight of theer, and tour love of gold: bendes two golden coroners weighing 67 pound.

The same year the Romans were chosen Arbitrators between the people of Carthage and King Malaniffa, as couching their territories: and came personally to see the place in controversy. And thus flood the case: Gala the father of this M. fanifles, had won the ground in question from the Carthaginians, Syphax afterward differed Gala thereof: and confequently to gratify Aldrubal, his wives father, freely gave the same to the Carthaginians, and set them in possession again. Now last of all, even this very year, Mas anissa had dispossessed the Carthaginians of the same. This matter was debated by the parties of both fides in the prefence of the Romans, with no lels cougage and fervency of spirit, than at other times when they tried the issue by dint of sword in open field. The Carthaginians laid claim and put in their plea. For that first it appertained to their ancellors in right of inheritance and afterwards was conveighed to them by the free gift and donaction of Syphax. Mafaniff a counterpleaded again and a ledged, that he had both recovered the faid territory, as parcel of his fathers realm, and also held it by the law of nations: and that the case was cleer on his fide, in regard as well of the just title as also of the present possession wherein he was; faying, that in his cause he doubted nothing else but that the modesty of the Romans should prejudice him, for fear lest they might be thought to be partial in the cause and respective to him, a King their ally and good friend, and in favour of him to give up their a ward against the common enemies both to him and them. The Commissioners and arbitrators would not infringe and alienat the right of possession, but left all as they found it, and referred the entire deci-

fion of the matter to the Senat of Rome. Nothing was there done after this in Liquria: for first, the enemies were retired for fafety into ntheir wilds and forrests out of the way; and afterwards they casted their army, and slipt away every man to their own villages and castles. The Consuls likewise were willing to break up and dismiss their forces; and thereupon sent to the LL, of the Senat to know their pleasure in that point; who advied the one of them to discharge his own regiments, and repair to Rome for the election of Magistrats the next year: and the other, with his legions, to winter at P fa. Arrumour there ran, that the Transalpine French put their youth and serviceable men in arms: but it was not known what quarter of Italy this multitude thus levied would invade. But the Confuls thus agreed together, that Cn. Babins should be present at the general assembly at Rome, for the election aforesaid, because M. Babius his brother sued to be Consul. Then was the affembly holden for the creation of Conuls, and elected there were, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and M. Babius Tamphilus. This done, the Pretors also were chosen, namely, the two Quintii Fabii, the one Maximus, and the other B. teo, T. Claudius Nero, Q. Pet lius Spurinus, M. Pinarius Posca and L. Duronius. When these were entred into their magistracy, the Provinces were by lot after this manner disposed. The Liguransfell to the Confuls: as for the Pretors, Q. Petilius was Lord chief Justice for the citizens pleas, and Q Farius Maximus for the strangers: Q Farius Butto had the government of Gaul, T. Claudin Ners of Sicilia, M. Pinarius of Sardinia, L. Duronius of Apulia together with the Istrians; for that the Tarentins and Brundufins had given intelligence, that the fea-coalts were much troubled and annoied by the robberies of pirats and men of war from beyond Sea: and the like complaints were made by the Massilians, of the Ligurian navy. For these causes order was given, and warrants went out for to levy armies: that the Confuls should have four legions between them, contain-Fig in every one 5200 Romanfootmen and 300 horfe: also to enrol 15000 footmen and 800 horsemen of Latine allies. In the Provinces of Spain (both the one and the other) the old Pretors continued still in their government, with the charge of those armies which they had already: and for a supplement to reenforce and make up their broken companies, there were appointed 3000 loot and 200 horse of Romancitizens together with 6000 of the one and 300 of the other from out of the Latine nation. All this while they forgat nor their navy at Sea. And the Confuls had incharge to chuse for that purpose, two wardens called Duumvirs, who after they had out of the Affenal shot into the Sea twenty ships. and set them assote, should furnish them with mariners, and those Roman citizens, such as had been slaves and were enfranchised: and that natural Romans free-born should only be Captains and have the conduct of the faid vessels. These two Dumvirs so parted and ordered betwirt them the defence of the maritime coasts with ten ships pecce; that the Cape of Minerva should be as it were the middle point and mark between them: to asthe one should guard that part on the right hand as far as to Massilia; and the other the left

Moreover, the plague reigned to hot in H the contrey villages market Towns marry and places of frequent relort yearand within the City of Rop , that they were not able to futnish the funerals accordingly and inter the dead. The 11. of the Senat, being in great anguish and trouble, in regard of those tearful cokens and the loss of their people, ordained, That as well the Conful should kill greater healts for lacific unto what Gods they thought good, as also the Decemvirs should wish and peruse the prophetical books of Suylla. And by vertue of their decree, there was publick supplication proclaimed at Rome torong whole day, at all the alters and fhrines of the gods and goddeffes, By their counicl allo and direction, both the Senare advited and the Coniuls also published throughout all Italy for three dates space, solemn litaries and devour holy-dates. The rage of this petitience was to great, that whereas there passed an act by the Senate to entol Booo footmen and three hundred hone from t out of the Latins (in regard that the llanders of Corfica were revoked and the lolians up in aims within Sardini) with which power M. Pinarius the Pretor was totall over into Sardinie; the Confuls made report again unto them, that such numbers of people were dead already, and to many lay to kethat it was not possible to levy that proportion of fighting men. So the Pretor had commission to furnish out that deiect of fouldiers, with a supply which he was to receive of Com Babius the Pro-conul, who then wintered at Pife; and from them directly to take the leas and paf: over into Sardinia.

L. Duronius the Pretor funt o whom the Province of Apulia was allotted) had a commission befides to make inquistion for the Bacchanais, for there remained yet fome seeds of the io mer enormines which began already the former year to sprout and bud torth. But L Pappus the fretor K latt before had entred into the enquiry at diearch of the matter, rather than effected nucht and brought it to a final end : and therefore the LL. gave order to this new Pretor to cuttoff this milchief in the spring and breeding thereof before it gat more head a second time, and upon growth fored to ther. Moreover, the Confuls by the advice and authority of the Senat, prefetted ettain laws unto the peop e, as tou hing the 'inordinat fuit and an bitious lecking after offices of government. After air this tuey brought into the Senat the forrein embaffiges ; and gave audien e fill to them that came from the KK, to wit Eumenes, Ar ar tes the Cappadocian, and Phrinces of Postus. But no other dispat hand answer they had than this That they would lend : estain Delegate and commissioners to hear decide and determine their controverses. After them the Emb Madors of the Laredzmonian exices, and of the Acharus, were admitted into the Senat L home. The banished persons atoretaid were put in some good hope, that the Senat would write their letters to the Achaans for their restauration. The Achaans declared as touching therecovery of Meffene and the pa ification of all troubles there, with the great contentment of the LL. of the Senat. There arrived moreover two Embassadors from Ph lip King of the Macedonians, namely Philocles and apelles, about no mit that they had to the Senat, but fest rather as ipies to usder-prie and to learn iomwhat as touching those points that Perfeus had the ged Dometrius with, and namely of certainspeeches that he mould have with the Romans, and especially with T. Quinti s, against his brother bout succession in the Kingdom. Thele twain were chosen by the King as indifferent perions, and nothing affectionat either to the one brother or the other; howbeit they were the ministers. conjorts, and complices of Perfeus, in his insended michievous plot a- M gainst his brother, Demetrius (as one ignorant of all designments against him but only of the late wicked prank of Perfew which last brake our) at the first, was neither in great hope. nor jet in utter despair to be reconciled unto his father. " befell to Antigonus in the like case, who being upon a time much tossed at Sea in a boisterous "tempest, and having with him in the same ship all those that were of his bloud, is reported "to have given this good advertisement and lesion to his children, that they should alwayes re-"member, and also give their posterity warning, never to venture all their goods in one bottome, of nor to engage themselves together with their wholerace and off-spring in any peril and danger. "Remembring therefore (qd,he) this good precept and counted of his, I will not hazard both my "fons at once in this present jeopardy which I see before mine eyes: but for almuch as I propose to take mine elder (on with me, I will fend my yonger back into Macedony, for to uphold and amaintain the hope of my posterity, and for the detence of my Kingdom in the mean while. Demetrial found him threight, and with well enough that he was fent away for no other intent but n thathe should not be present in countel, when upon the view of those places abovesaid, he was to devise and consult in what coast lay the neerest and shortest way to the Adriatick Sea and to Italy, and what courie they should plot for the management of the war. But there was no remedy he must not only then obey his father, but also sooth him up and seem to approve and like well of that which he faid, for fear left it might be thought, that it went against his stomack to veeld obedience unto him, and so be held in more jelousy and suspition than before. Howbeit, to the end that he might pals into Macedony with fafety Didas one of the Kings Deputies and L. Governor under him of Paonia, was commanded to accompany and conduct him with a mean guard and convoy. Now was this Didas one of those conspirators that had I worn the death of Demetrius, whom Perfens had made fure to his part, like as he had many other of his fathers friends, even fince c that men began to make no doubt, unto whom Philip in affection was enclined, and whom he meant to make the heir apparent of the crown. And at this very instant Perseus had charged him and given him instructions, by all obsequious services to infinuate and wind himself into most familiar talk, and to come to neer within him, that he might draw from him all his secrets, & discover the very inward and hidden thoughts of his heart. Thus departed Demetrius attended with a trainabout him more dangerous to his person, than if he had travelled alone without any company, Philip first passed through Madica and then forward over the delatts lying between Madica and Amas, and at the seventh daies march was come as far as to the foot of the mountain. Where after behad rested and staied one day to make choice of those whom he minded to take up with him the morrow after he fet forth & put himself in his way. At the first, the labour was not great, phor the pains much to overcome the nethermost hills; but thefarther they went and the higher that they advanced, the more wild and woody still they found every place; yea, and they met with many that had no passage at all. At length they were mounted to a pass or way so shadowed and dark, that for the trees flanding so thick together, and their boughs plaited and interlaced one within another, icare ely or hardly could a man tee the skie through them. But when they approchedonce the pitch and creft of the mountain, behold (a thing not lightly seen in other parts) they light upon so gross and thick a mit, which overspread and covered all that they had as much ado to march forward, as it they had travelled in the dork & mid-night. At last by the third daies end, they gained the very top of the mountain. Now when they were come down from thence again, they made no less report thereof than the common opinion was that went of it; which I believe E verily they did of purpose, because they would not be mocked and scorned for this their foolish and vain voiage, rather than for that they could indeed within the same prospect and from one place, view feas, mountains, and rivers, fituat and diffant fofar afunder, Much moiled they were all, and fore toiled in this untoward way; but the King above the rest, by reason that he was far stept inage, and unweldy of body. Well, after he had done facrifice there upon two alters confectated to Jupiter and the Sun, he descended in two daies, whereas he had made three of it in ascending: and that which he feared most, was the cold nights, which there in the beginning of the dog daies were like to those of midwinter in other places. Many difficulties he wrestled and strove withal during those daies, and being returned into his camp, he found no better. Nothing was there but otteam want & penury, as being pitched in a place compassed about on every side with desarts and wilderness. And therefore when he had staied there but one only day to rest and repose his men, whom he had taken with him in that journey, he hastned away, and in a running march, as if he had fled in rout, entred the countrey of the Denthelets. These Denthelets were his own consederat allies, but the Macedonians (such was their need and necessity) pilled and spoiled their confines, no less than if they had been professed enemies. For first they wasted & destroied their holts, granges, and farm houses, afterwards certain wicks and villages also, robbing and rifling as they went, to the great dishonor of the King; who could not chuse but hear the piteous complaints & mones of his affociats crying to the Gods, Patrons of alliances, and calling upon his name for help, but could have no redreis and remedy. When he was purveyed of corn from thence, and returned into the countrey Madica he began to assail a City which they call Petra. Himself in person lay encampedinthe avenue and ready way upon the plains, but he fent his fon Perfeus with a small company to fetch a compais and give the affault from the higher places that commanded the Town. The Townsnen thus hard bested with terror on every side for the present yeelded upon composition, and gave hostages; but after the army was retired, they forgetting their pledges, abandoned the City and fled for refuge into certain forts, fenced places, and high mountains. Philip having weatied his fouldiers with all manner of travel to no effect, and withat entertained more jeloufie and Upition of his son Demerrins, by the lewd practise and false suggestions of Didas (the Governor of Peonia) returned into Macedony. This Didas (as hath been faid before) fent to conduct Deme H or I come abused the simplicity of the yong Gentleman, who was nothing circumspect and wary, but seemed discontented and complained to him(as good cause he had)or those that were nearest in nature and blood unto him; he, I say, by flattering, by soothing him up, and seeming withal to be offended and grieved for his part at fuch hard nlage, laid inares and grins, and fer tips for him; and in conclution, by his double diligence and offering his voluntary fervice to do than pleafure, protefling allo to be true and fast unto him, yea, and to keep his couniel, fetched out of him the very secrets of his heart. Now had Demerrins a purpose with himself to flie to Rome, and to effectuate this delignment of his, he was periwaded, that of a special grace and favour the Godshad ient and offered unto him this Didas the Pretor of Paonia to behis helper and afficient; for through his Province he conceived some hope to pass and escape with security. This intent and I plot of his was both immediately disclosed to his brother Perfens, and also by him de lared to his father, And first were letters hereof brought unto him, whiles he lay at the fiege of Petra. Afterwards Herodorus (the principal friend that Demetrius had) was committed to ward, and withal, order was taken to watch and observe Demetrius that hestarted not aside; but all underhand and close, without semblance of any such matter. These occurrents above all others, caused the King to have a dolorous and heavy return into Macedony, These new acculations thus presented troubled him much : howbeit he thought good to expect the return of those whom he had sent to Rome as spies to hear all and find out the truth. In the anguish and agony of these cares and perplexities, when the King had continued certain months, in the end those Embassadors came home; who at first ere they set foot out of Macedony, had devised and framed before hand what reports they K would make from Rome. These messengers, to make up the full measure of all their wicked and divellish practices, delivered also into the Kings hand a false and forged letter, sealed with a counterfeit fignet of T. Quintius. The faid letter was indited to this tenor and effect, That Quintius should feem for his own excuse to say, that albeit yong Demetrius, carried away with an inordinat defire to be King, had slipped a little, and treated with him about some such matter, yet would he do nothing to prejudice any one about K. Philip, neither would he be thought or found a man, to give any ungodly and ungracious counsel. These letters struck it dead sure, and made the King believe, that all the former imputations fafined upon Demetrius were true and past all peradventure, Whereupon Heredorus prejently was put to the rack and examined, but after he had endured incolerable pains a long time, and confessed nothing, he died in the end under the tormentors hand. L Perfeut acculed Demetrius again before his father, for that he intended and provided to take his flight through Paonia. And there came forth certain to testify against him, faying, that he had corrupted, inveigled, and induced them to accompany him in that journey. But that which made most of all against him, was that same devised letter of T. Quinties. Howbeit there was no grievous sentence pronounced openly against him, to the end, that rather by some covert and cautelous practife, he might come to his death : and this, not for any fear that he had of him, but doubting left some open punishment executed upon him, might reveal and discover his secret designment, of making war upon the Romans,

Philip himself raking his journy from The falonica to come to Demetrias, sent Demetrias his Son to Aftreum, a City in Paonia, and the same Didas still to accompany him: but Perfeus he ad-M drefled to Amphipolis, for to receive the holtages of the Thracians. Now it is reported, that when Didas took his leave of him and departed, the King gave him in charge to kill his fon Demetrins. Didas then, either purposing indeed or making semblance to sacrifice, invited Demerins to the celebration and least thereof, whereupon he came from Estreum to Heraclea. And (as menfay) at this supper he met with a cup of poison. He had no sooner drunk it, but immediatly he felt that he was sped; for within a while it began to work extreamly, and for very dolour and pain, he was forced to rife from the Table and retire into his bed-chamber: where he piriously complained of the hard heart and cruelty of his father, of the murderous mind of the particide his brother, and of the trecherous villany of Didas: and all this while endured deadly wrings and torments in his belly, But afterwards there were fent into the chamber, one Thyrfis a Stuberzan, N and Alexander of Berrhea, who enwrapped his head and throat with the bed-cloaths, carpets and counterpoints of tapiftry, and held them fo hard, that they throtled and imothered him and in the end Hopped his breath that he died. Thus was this poor innocent yong man pitcoully made away; whole enemies one fingle kind of death could not content and fatisfy, but needs they must kill and murder them twice. Whiles these things happed in Macedony, L. Emplius Paulus, who continued fillingovernment after his Confulfhip expired, marched with his army against the Ligurians Ingaunes in the beginning of the spring. So soon as he was entred into the confines of his enemies country, and there encamped, there came Embassadors unto himunder colour of seeking peace, but indeed only to escout and spie. Prulus made them answer, That he could contract no accord with them, unless they yeelded first: which they seemed not so much to refuse, but said. That they needed fome time to perswade their nation unto it, being a rude and uncivil kind of people. And when they had ten daies truce allowed to effect this, they requested moreover, that the Roman souldiers might not pass over the next hills adjoyning either for fewel or forage, for asmuch as those lands were the only tilled and well manused grounds of their appurtenances and territory. When they had obtained to much, they affembled all their forces on that fide of the hills, from whencethey

A had averted the enemies, and faddainly with a mighty multitude charged upon the Roman camp. and affaulted all the avenues and gates thereof at once. With all forcible means they continued the aff ult in luch fort, as the Romans had not to much as either time enough to tet forth and difplay their enfigus, or room sufficient to put their army in order of battel; but were compelled to defend their camp more by flanding thick thronged together against the enemies in the very gates then otherwise by hardy fighting. But about the going down of the fon, when the enemies were retired, Paulus dispatched two light horsemen with letters to M. Babius the Contul, as far as Pifa, that he should come a way with all speed to succour him, being in time of truce befreged. But Babins had delivered up his army before to M. Pinarius, the Pretor, she went into Sardinia. Howbeit he both certified the Senat by his letters, that L. Emplins was invelted by the R Ligurians, and he wrote also to M. Cl. Marcellus, whole province was next adjoining, to bring over his forces (if he thought fo good) out of Gaul in to Ligaria, and deliver L. Amylius from fiege. But alas, these succours should have come all too late; for the Ligurians the very next day returned and advanced against the camp Amylius, albeit he not only knew that they would come, but also might have brought his power forth into the field and ranged them in array, yet he kept himfelt to close within the ftrength of his rampiar, minding to hold off and not to fight, until Babins might with his army come from Pife. Now the letters of Bebins canfed great fear at Rome : and fo mace the more, for that Marcellus being returned to the City, some few daies after he had made over his army anto Fabius, put them out of all hope, that the army which was in France could not policity passe into Ligaria, by reason of the war with the Istrians, who impeached the planting Cofthe colony at Aquileia; against whom Fabius was gone, and might not possibly retire from thence, now that the war was once begun. The only hope they had therefore of aiding Amilia was this, (and yet the same seemed to be with the latest, considering the urgent necessity of the time) in case the Consuls made halt to go into their privinces : which to do all the LL. of the Sea nat called aloud and earnestly unto them. But the Consals denied flarly to stir one foot before the levy of fouldiers was fully finished; alledging that it was not their flackness, but the violence of the plague, which cau'ed it to be to late ere it were performed. Yet for all this, such was the general accord and confent of the Senat, that they could neither will nor chuse but go forth of the City in their rich coats of arms, and by proclamation to assigne a certain day, upon which all the fouldiers whom they had enrolled thould thew at Pife: and commission they had to take no n libitary fouldiers, all the country over as they went, to prefie them forth prefently and have them away. Moreover, the Pretors, Q. Petilius and Q. Fabins were both of them commanded, the one. namely, Petilius, to enrol in halt two tumultuary legions of Roman citizens, and tender the military oath to all that were not above fiftie yeers old: and Fabine, to levy of the Latine allies fifteen thousand toot, and eight hundred horsemen. The two Duumvirs or Wardens for the navy and the ports were created, namely, C. Matienus and C. Lucretius, who were foon provided of thips ready rigged, trimmed and furnished to their hands. And Matienus, who had the charge of the coallsupon the gulf of Gaul, was commanded to bring his fleet with all fpeed possible along, to to the track of the Ligurians, if hapily he might any way thead L. Emylina and his army. Emylina m after he perceived that no aid appeared from any pl ce, supposing verily that the two horse men above-laid, were intercepted and staied by the way, thought good to put off no longer, but alone withhis own forces to trie the fortune of a fight. And thereupon before the enemies came (who nowalready began more coldly and heavily to affail them then before) he put his men in battell array at the four gates of the camp, to the end that upon the fignall given, they should at once from all parts fally forth. To the four extraordinary cohorts, he adjoined two other, under the conduct of M. Valerius a Lieutenant, and commanded them to break forthat the falle postern gate called Extraordinaria: within the gate Principalis on the right hand, he embattelled the Haflatior Iaveliners of the first legion, and the principes of the same legion in the rearguard to second them, commanded both by M. Servilius and L. Sulpitius, Kn marshals, or Tribunes military. The third legion he marshalled full against the other gate Principalis on the left hand. This change only was here, for that the Principes were let in the front, and the Hastati behind in the tail of them. Sex. Inlines Cafar and L. Aurélius Cotta, two military Tribunes had the leading of this legion. Q. Fulvius Flaceus a Lieutenant, having the conduct of the right wing, was placed at the gate Onestoria. Two cohorts and the Triarii of two legions had commandment toftay behind for the defence of the camp. The Generall himself in perfon rode all about from gate to gate. exhorting and encouraging his men : using all the forcible means he possibly could devise, to provoke and whet the stomacks of his fouldiers, and to give a poinant edge to their courage and choler: one while reproaching his enemies for their fallhood and treachery, who having craved peace and obtained truce ; during the time of the faid truce, against all law of nations were come to affail the camp: another while shewing and declaring unto them what shame and "indignity it was for the Roman army to be belieged by the Ligurians, who more truly may "be accounted theeves and robbers, then go for warlike enemies. If (quoth he) you should escape "from hence, not by your own vertue and valour, but through the help and fuccour of others. "with what face shall any of you be able to meet, I say, not those souldiers who have vanquished "Annibal, defeated Philip, and lubdued Antiochus, the mightiest King, and greatest commante ders of our age : but even them who many a time have hunted and chaired the very fame Liguri-"anslike bruit bealts, over the wilds and forreits as they fled, and he wed them in peeces in the end?

6. That which the Spanisrds that which the Gauls that which the Maccdoniars and Carthagurians H "dare not enterprife, namely, to approach and enter upon the rampier of the Roman camp; shall "a Ligurian enemy adventure to do? shall be of his own accord presume to besiege and " affail our camp, whom heretofore when we best all the blind bufhes, by-woods and thickets, " to frart him out, we had much ado to find, he lay to cloie and lurked to covertly? At these words the fouldiers fet up a confonant crie in token of applaufe, and answered him with a general shout, laying, there was no fault on their part, feeing that no man had given them the fignal to ffue forth and make a fally. For let him but once fay the word to found the trumper, he should fee and find, that both Remans and Ligurians were the same still as before-time. Now the Ligurians kept two camps on the neer fide of the mountains aff ront the Roman leaguer , from whence (for the first daies to soon as the sun was up) they used to advance their ensigns, and march forward I well armed and ranked in battell array : but then they put no armor upon their backs, nor took weapon in hand, before they had filled their bellies well with meat and their heads with wine: they came forth (1 fay) dispersed and out of order; as who hoped and trusted affuredly, that the enemies would not march under their enfigns without their rampier. Against them (coming thus in diferray) the Romans issued forth at once, out of all the gates in one instant with a mighty shout, which not only they who were within the camp fet up, but also the lackies, scullions, landers, and other drudges that follow the camp redoubled. This was fuch an unlooked for occurrent to the Ligurians, that they were let in as great an affright therewith, as it they had been surprised & befet all about with juddsin ambushments. For a small while there was some shew of a conflict, fuch as it was ; but anon they took their beels and fled for life; but as they fled, they left their lives K behind them in every place. Then the men of arms had the fignal given to mount on horfeback, to purfuethem & not fuffer one to eleane alive : & to in this fearful rout they were driven to take their camp for fafety : but in the end were differzed and turned out of it alfo. That day were Dain of the Ligurians not to few as fitteen thousand, and 2500 taken pritoners. Within three daies after, the whole nation of the Ligurian Ingaunes, yeelded absolutely, and put in their bostages. A learch was made for all the pilots and mariners, who had exercised piracy on theica, and they were all laid up faft in prison. Sembably C Matterns; one of the Dumwirs or wadens of the navy met with two and thirty thips of that lort, belonging to men of war upon the coalt of Liguria, and boorded them. To carry these news to Rome, and letters to the Senat, L. Amelius Cotta, and C. Sulpitime Cotta were feat to Rome: who allo were to require that L.o. Empline (when his time was expired) might depart out of his province, and bring his fouldiers from thence with him, and to discharge them of service. Both these demands were granted by the Senat, and a foleum procession besides was orderned in all churches and chappels, and at every shrine and altar for three daies space. The Pretors also were commanded, Pesilsus, to caste and dimite thelegions of the City; and Fabin, to remit the Latine allies the levying and mustering of their fouldiers. Also there was order given to the Pretor of the City, for to write unto the Cost and give them to understand, that the Senat thought it meet and reason, that the subilary souldiers (who were enrolled in half for the fuddain tumult and slarm) should with all speed be licensed to depart. The same yeer the colony of Gravifes was planted in the territory of Tafeson, which in times past was conquered from the Tarquinians , and five acres of land was fet out to every man. The M Triumvirs who had the charge thereof to diffribute thefe lands, were C. Calpurnim Pifo, P. Claudius Pulcher, and C. Terentius Ifra. A yeet it was of note, in regard of the drought that hapned, and the dearth of corn and all other fruits of the earth. For recorded it is, that in fix month space

The same yeer it fortuned, that ascertain plow-men and labourers plowed and digged some it never rained one drop. what deep within the ground, in the lands of L. Petilins a fecretary, (which lands lay under the hill Insiculum) there were found two coffers of ftone, each of them about eight foot long and four foot broad, the lids and covers whereof were bound and fodered with lead. Bothinele chefts had a superscription upon them in Greek and Latine letters to this effect, That in the one of N them lay buried Numa Pompiliss the ion of Pomps, fometime King of Rome: and in the other, were beltowed the books of the said Numa. The owner of this ground opened their coffers by the advice and counsel of his friends : and that which carried the ritle and infeription of the Kings sepulture, was found empty, without any shew or token of the reliques of a mans body or any thingelie, by reason the bones and all were rotten and confirmed, in continuance of time after io many yeers past. In the other were found two fardels, wrapped within wax candles (or cear-cloths) conteining either of them leven books; which were not only whole and found, but alto feemed very fresh and new. One seven of them were written in Latin, as touching the Pontificiall law : the other feven in Greek, entituled, The difcipline or dottrine of Philosophia, such as thole daies might afford. Valerius Auties faith moreover, I hat they were the books of Pythagores; 0 according to the common received opinion of Numa, that he was the disciple of Pythagorat; herein giving credit to a probable lie, relembling a truth. These books were first read by those friends of his who were present at the place where the chests were opened; but afterwards as they came into more mens hands to be read, it chanced that Q Perilius the lord chief juftice of the City, defitous to perufe those books, borrowed them of L. Pesilins, with whom he was familiarly acquainted, by reason that the abovenamed Quintus Petilius had chosen the forelaid Lucius into the decury of the Scribes and fecretaries. Who after he had read the titles with the immunites and contents of every chapter, and finding the most part thereof, tending directly to sholish the fateof the religion then established, faid unto L. Petilius, that he purposed to fling those books into the fire; before he did to, he would permit him to use what means he thought by order of law, or other wife would ferve his turn to recover the faid books out of his hands, and good leave he should have to take that course without his displeasure, or any breach of friend hip between them, The Scribe or notary aforefaid goeth to the Tribunes for their assistance, the Tribunes put the matter over to the Squat, before whom the Pretor faid plainly, that he was ready to take his corporall outh, if it were to put to it, that those books ought neither to be read nor kept. Wheremon the Senat judged, that for such a matter the offer only of the Pretors oath was sufficient, and that the books should be burned with all speed possible in the open place of assemblies called B. Comitium: but they awarded withall that they should be paied unto Q. Petilius the right owner as much mony for the books, as the Pretor and the more part of the Tribunes of the Commons efteemed them worth. The Scribe would touch none of mony : but his books were burnt in the fortaid place before all the people in a light fire, made by the ordinary fervitors attending upon the

The fame fummer there arose suddainly a great war in the higher Spain. The Celiberians had gutheted a power of five & thirty thouland men, a number more then lightly at any time before they had levied. Now was Q. Fulvius Flacens lord Deputy of that province. He for his part; becaple be was 'advertifed that the Celtibertans put their youth in arms, had raifed and affembled as great aids of the confederats, as he could, but nothing came he neer to the enemie in numbers cof fouldiers. In the beginning of the Spring he led his army into Carperania and encamped before the town Ebura, after he had plainted a mean garrifon within it. A few daies after the Celtiberians pitched their tents within two miles from thence under a little hill. When the Roman Pretor perceived they were come, he fent his brother Marcus Fulvius with two companies of the hortemen of allies in espial, to view the enemics camp, willing him to approach as neer to the trench and rampier as he could, and to fee what compatie the camp took, but to forhear skirmifh; and in any hand to retire, in cale he perceived the Cavalry of their enemies made out against him. According to this direction, in did in every respect. And so for certain dates together, there was nothing done, but only these two companies of horsemen shewing first, and afterwards retiring backfo toon as the Calvalry of the enemies iffued out of their camp. At length the Celuberians h allo came forth and adva need forward withall their power, as well horse as foot, and having set them in ordinance of battell, flaied as it were in the midft between. The whole ground was a smooth and even plain, fit to join a battell int. There stood the Spaniards (11av) exp. ctiog their enemies : But the Roman Pretor kept his men within the rampier four daies together ; and they like wife of the other fide held the fame place ffill in battell array. The Romans all that while flirted not a foot. The Celtiberians then feeing the enemies refuled fight, held the mtelves quiet allo within their camp : only the hortemen rid forth; and they kept a corps de guard, to be inreadiness if peradventure the enemies should be bufic and come abroad. Both of he one fide and other, they went out of the back fide of their camp to purvey forage and fuel, and impeached nor one another. The Roman Pretor, supposing now that after to many daies rest, the enemies were bom in hand and hoped fully, that he would never begin first, commanded L. Aciliarto cake with him the left wing of the Cavalry, and fix thouland of the provincial auxiliaries, and to fetch a compasse about the hill which stood behind the enemies; and from thence to toon as they heard aCry, to run down amain and charge upon their camp. And becaufe they might not be ditco e ted, in the night time they departed. Flacens the next morning by peep of day, tent out C. Seribenim (a colonel of the allies) against the enemies camp, with the extraordinary horizonen of the left wing: whom when the Celtiberians beheld both approaching neer toward them & also more innumber then usually they had been, they put forth all their Cavalry at once out of the gates: & withal gave the figual to the Infantry allo to come abroad Scribon:as, according to the direction given, to foon as ever be heard the first noise and shout of the hottemen, turned the head of his boile and retired back full upon the camp : therewith the enemies followed more freely : first the horlmen, and within a while the footmen also, making full account to be mafters of the Roman leaguer that day, and verily now were they put path half a mile. When Flaceus tuppoled that they were trained far enough from their camp, for fuccouring it, he islued forth at once in threeplaces, with his army arranged before in order of battell within, and cauted them to let op amighty ery, not only to animat the fouldiers to the combat, but also that their fellows behind the hill might hear it. Who made no stay, but presently ran down and set upon the enemies camp as they had in charge, where there were left in guard not above five hundred armed men. By reason therefore, that they within were so few, the enemies without so many, and the enterprise to suddain and unlooked for, they were mightily terrified, and to in manner with a out any skirmish and resistance at all, their hold was forced and won. Actions let on fire than part allo, which might easieft be feen of them that were fighting in the plain, Now the Celuberta ans which stood behind in the rereguard, were the first that discovered the flame, but afterwards it was noised and went current through the main battel, that their camp were loit and all on a light fire. The enemies were greatly amated, but the Romans much more animated. For now they might hear the shout of their tellows, having the upper hand, now might they see the tens of their enemies burning with bright flames. The Celtiberians for a while flood in inspence;

doubtfall what to do ; but afterwards, perceiving they had no place of tafe reteat, it upon their H difcomfiture they should fall to running away, they saw no other hope but in fighting it out, and fo they began to renew the skirmith aireld, with more resolution then before, Fiercely they were encountred and charged in the midft of their battel by the fift legion; but against the left flank and wing, where they saw the fouldiers of their own nation ranged (who came to sid the Romans) they made head, and advanced their enfigues with more boldgeffe, and confidence. And verily that left wing of the Romans was at the point to have retreated, but that the feverith legion feconded and succoured them : and withall they that were left within Eber ain garrifon, time from the town in the very midft, and hottelt of the conflict; and Acidia from another part plaied on their backs, Down went the Cekiberisus along time, and were ent in peeces between, As many as remained, made thirt to flie and eleape on all hands into every quarter. The Cavalry was I fent out after them two wajes in feverall bands : who also committed great flaughter and execution. That day were flain of the enemies about 23000, 4800 taken priloners, with five hundred hore and above ; befides 88 military enfignes gotten from them and carried away A great victory this was, but not without bloudfhed of the Romans part : for of two legions there died ioniew hat more then two hundred, but of Latine allies 830 3 of forrein aids, much about 2400 loft their lives in the field. The Pretor theo retired with his victorious army into his own camp. Acidim was commanded to abide full in that of their enemies, which he had forced and won. The next morrow they fell to gather up the spoils of their enemies : and those who had born themselves valuate ly in that tervice among the rett, were rewared with gifts in a full and frequent affembly of the whole army. After this, when the burt and maimed were brought back into the town Ebura, the K legions were led through the countrey Carpetania, towards Contrebia. This City when it was once belieged lent to the Celtiberians for succour; but they came not in time : not for any flicknels of their part, but becaule after they were departed from home, & had entred on their jour ney, the foul waies hindred and flaid them, which they were not able to pass for the continual rain that fell: over and befides, the waters were out and the rivers (welled to high, that possibly they could not come forward : whereupon the belieged inhabitants being in dilpair of help, from their friends, rendred the town. Flaceus likewife was torced by the ftorm and tempeltuous weether to put his army into the same City. Now the Celtiberians, who were on foot in their journey, and not aware that their friends had jurrendred, at length having passed over the rivers (when the rain gave over and the weather took up) came to Contrebia 3 but feeing no camp without the L wals, and improfing that it was either removed to the other fide, or the enemies diflodged and gone, they apposened the town, and marched loofely and retchiefly forward in distray. The Romans fallied out upon them at two gates, fell upon them (disbanded as they were) and put them to the rout But fee what hapned / that thing which hindred them that they could not make head, refit, and tettle themselves to begin fight (namely, because they came not together in one entire band, nor yet by great companies about their colours) the fame flood them in good flead to fave many of their lives that fled. For they ran fo feattering, and were fo preadall over the plaines, that in no place could the enemy meet with them in any number thick together, to compais them about on every fide Howbeit 1 2000 of them were killed, & above $600 tiken pritonen, befides 400 horie, 62 enligns of war won from them. Thole who after their ftraggling flight re- 11 tired homeward, met with another troop of Celtiberians coming forward, unto whom they recounted the yeelding up of Courrebia and their own misfortune: by which means they cauled them to turn and goe back againe, who immediately flipt away in their villages and forts Then Flacens departed from Controlia, and conducted his legions through Celiberia Wafling and spoiling as he went : where he forced many castles until the greater part of that conntrey was reduced under his obedience. Thete affairs passed in high Spain that year. As for the lower province, Manisms the Pretor fought fortunally in certain battells against the Portu-

The same yeer a Colony of Latins was pl nted in Aquileia, within the territory of the Gauls, and thither were conducted three thouland footmen, and every one of them were endowed N with fifty acres of land. The Centurions befides had a hundred, and the hortemen a hundred and forty acres apecce given unto them. And the Commissioners for this conduct and distribution were P. Cornelius Scipio Nafica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. In which year also two Temples were dedicated, the one to Venns Ergeina neer the gate Collina (which L. Porcius Lieumus the fon of Lucius dedicated, being a Dummvir deputed for that purpole, and had been vowed before by L. Percins the Contal in the Ligurian war) the other to the goddels Piny, in the herb market : and of this chappell M. Acilius Glabrio the other Duumvir, had the dedication; where, he erected and fet up in the henor of his father Glabrio, a guilt statue, which was the fift gilded image that ever was made in Italy. This Glabrio the father was he, who had vowed to edific the 'aid Temple that very day on which he fought the battell against K. Antiochus, at Thir- O mopyle and by warrant from the Senat, had bargained for the building thereof at a price in thole dates wherein thele holy houles were confectated, L. Emplius Paulus the Proconful, trumphed over the Ligurians Ingaines. He had born before him in flew five and twenty golden Coronets, and befides them there was no gold or filver elle carried in that triumph. But many principal Ligurians, men of mark, whom he took captive; were led before his chair. He dealt among his fouldiers, 300 Affes specce. The fame of this triumph of his, was much mere renouned by this occasion, that the Ligurian Embassadors craved to have a perpetual peace with the Romans A "Jaying, That their whole nation were refolved, never to take arms again, but by commandment "and licence of the people of Rome Q. Fabius the Pretor, returned this answer unto them by the "advice of the Senat, That it was no news to hear this language from the Ligurians; but it flood "them upon and was befeeming rather, to carry a new mind, and the same agreeable to their " foeech: and therefore they (hould go to the Confuls, and do by them which they were en joined: for almuch as the Senat would believe none but the word only of the Confuls in the behalf of the Ligurians, as touching their true and fincere meaning to observe peace. Thus was peace concluded with the Ligurians : but there was a battel fought in Corfica with the Manders there : in which M. Pinarius the Pretor flew 2000 of them in the field : which defeat compelled them to give holtages, and belides 100000 pound weight of wax. From thence the army was conduct-B ed into Sardinia, where passed some fortunat battels against the Ilians, a nation at this day not fully quieted & appealed lothis very yeer also were the hundred holtages rendred back again to the Carthaginians; with whom the people of Rome made and maintained peace, as well for their own part, as in the behalf of K. Maf. miffa, who at that time with an armed garifon, held the policision of that territory which had been in question. The Confuls in their province sat still and had nothing to do. M. Babius was ient for to Rome, against the generall affembly for the election of magifirates : who created Confuls, A. Posthumius Albinus Lufeus and C. Calquinius Pifo. After this, were elected Pretors Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, A. Posthumius Albinus, P. Cornel. Mamercus. T. Minutius Mollicubus, A. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Manius; and they all entred into their magiltracy upon the 15 day of March. In the beginning of that yeer wherein A. Postbumius Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Pifo were Coolus : A. Post humins the Conful brought into the Sen t those persons who were come from Q Fulvius Flaceus out of the hither province of Spain; to wit L. Minutius his Lieutenant generall, and the two colonels, T. Manus and L. Maffaliota. These men after they had made report of two field: fortunatly fought against the Celtiberians, of their countrey yeelded and brought under their inbjection; and that the term of government in that province was expired, and no more left to to be done there; to as there was no need either of the ordinary mony which was wont tobe lent for femidiers pay, or of corn to be caried unto the army for that yeer: requelted of the Sense first, in regard of their happy successe, to yeeld honor and praise to the immortali gods : and then, that Q. Fulvius might depart and come his waies out of the province, and bring with D him that army of his from thence, whose vali int service, both himself and also many Pretors before him had used : which (tay they) was not only meet and convenient, but also requisit and needfuli in a manner to be done : for almuch as the fouldiers were fo ftiffnecked and obstinat, that it les med unpossible to hold them any longer in that province, but that they would be gone and depart without licence, if they were not dimified or elfe break out into some dangerous fire of a mutiny, if a man should go about to keep and hold them back by strong hand. The Senat gave order that Liguria should be the province for both Confuls: which done, the Pretors also cast lots for theirs. To A. Hoftilius fell the civil, jurisdiction over the citizens : and to Minutins over the forrainers; P. Cornelius had the government of Sicily: C. Manius of Sardinia. Unto L. Possbumius was allotted the farther part of Spain, and to Tib. Sempronius the hither. This Sem-E promus (because he was to succeed Q. Fulvius) fearing his province should be left naked and disfurnished of the old foundiers," I demand (qd. be) of you, O L. Minutins, fince you bring word "that there is no more trouble behind of that province, whether you think that the Celtiberians " will continue fast in their allesgeance for ever, so as that province may be protected and held "in obedience without any army at all? And if you cannot undertake to a flure us of the faith and Toyalty of thele Barbarians & do advise us in any hand to maintain an army in those parts, whe-"ther you will give counfell to the Senat for to fend a supply into Spain, that they only should be "caffed and discharged, who have served out their full years required by law, and so that new and "raw fouldiers be mingled with the rest of the old? or that the old legions should full and whole " be removed out of the province, and new legions enroiled, and lent thither in their flead? confor fidering that the finall account that usually is made of such fresh and untrained fouldiers, were "enough to induce and move even the more quiet and peaceable fort of Barbarians to rebel and "make war again. Soon faid it is, but not fo eafily done, to have made an end of all troubles in "fuch a province, especially where the people are naturally inclined to war, and prone ever and " auon to make infurrections. Some few Cities, as far as I can hear, and namely, those which be-"ing neer unto the fouldiers lying in winter garrifon, were by them held in aw and kept down, "have yeelded and are become subject : but they that were farther off, be in arms still and have "weapon in hand. Which being to, I tell you (my LL) even now before hand, that I will per-"form my fervice to the Commonweal, with the help of that army which is there already at this present but in case Flaccus bring away those legions with him! I will chuse those quitters which "are in peace, to winter in, and not hazard my yong and new fouldiers among them, to be pre-"fented to the devotion and mercy of most fierce and warlike enemies. The Lieutenant answer-"ed to these demands in this maner, That neither himself nor any man else was able for his life to "divine and foredeem what was in the hearr of the Celtiberians now, and what they would" "mind and intend to do hereafter : and therefore he could not deny, but the better policy it was to lend an army among these Barbarians (peaceable though they seemed to be at this present because as yet they are inured to government, and cannot well skill of being subjects. But whether H 18 it be more expedient to employ new forces, as the old, it is for him to fpeak and fet down, who 4 upon his knowledg can fay, how loyally the Celtiberians wil carry themselves in time of peace, "and is withall affored, that the fouldiers will hold them content and quiet, if they be detained "any longer in the province. But it a man may conjecture and give a gueffe what they think in stheir heart, either by their grumbling words fecretly one to morner; or their freeches intered "in the presence and hearing of their General, when he maketh orations to them in publick audier ence : I tell you truly they have cryed out with open mouth, that either they will keep their Generall with them in the province, or home they will with him into Italy. This debate between the Pretor and the Lieutenant, was interrupted and broken off, by a new matter propounded before the Senst by the Confuls, who thought it meet and reasonable, that order should be taken for 1 their own furniture and fettn g forth with men, mony, and munition to their provinces, before any thing were spoken or treat of as touching the Pretor his army. So, ordained it was, that the Coff. should have their entire army of new fouldiers, to wit, each of them two legions of Rom. citizens with their cavalry, together with the usuall and accustomed number at all other times of Latine allies, namely, 15000 foot and 800 horse. And with this power they had incharge to make war against the Ligurian Apuans. As for P. Cornelius and M. Babius, they continued still in place of command and were willed to hold their provinces, untill the Confuls were thither come. Then they were commanded to discharge the army which they had, and so to return to Rome. After this, speech there was concerning the army of Tib. Sempronins; and the Confuls had warrant to enroll one new legion, confifting of five thouland and two hundred foot and 400 K horie : ove and belides, 1000 footmen, and 50 horie of Roman citizens. Likewife the Latine nation was charged with a levy of 7000 foot and 300 horle. With which army it was thought good. that Tib. Sempronius should go into the higher province of Spain. As for Q. Fulvius, he was permitted to bring back with him (if he thought well thereof) all those fouldiers, as well Romans 28 allies, which had been transported over into Spain before the Confulthip of Sp. Pofibminia and Q. Martins : and more then that (after a new inpply was come) the furplulage in two legions above 1400 toot, and 600 horfe, and the over-plus of 12000 footmen of Latins, and fix hundred horsemen; and namely, those whose valorous servince C. Fulvius had tried and found in two bartels against the Celtiberians. Moreover, tolemn processions and thanksgiving were by authority ordained, for his happy managing of the affairs of the Common-weal; & then the reft of the Pre- L tors were fent into their provinces, Q. Fabin: Bnico had his commission renewed to govern Gallia fill. Thus it was agreed in the Senat-houle, that there should be eight legions maintained and kept in pay that yeer, over and above the old army in Liguria, which was in good hope shortly to be dilmified. Howbeit even the fe forces (being no greater then they were) hardly could be made full and compleat by reason of the petitience which now three years had raigned, and dispeopled the City of Rome and all Italy, During which plague the Pretor T. Minutius, and not long after him, the Conful C.Calpurnius died : with many other brave and famous persons of each degree and quality. So, as at length these men began to hold this depopulation and calamity for a prodigious token and strange wonder. Whereupon C. Servillius the Arch-bishop was charged, to learch out means for to appeale the wrath and anger of the gods; and the Decemvirs likewise to perule M the books of Sibylia: the Cof, to vow certain prefents and oblations, to Dan Apollo, Esculaping and Lady ' Salai, and to let up their images garnished with gold which he vowed and erected accordingly. The Decemvirs proclamed supplications & praiers two daies together for the health of the people, throughout the City, and in all market towns and places of frequent refort and alfembly. Al above twelve yeers of age, were chaplets & garlands of flours upon their heads, & bare branches of lawrell in their hands, whiles they were at their praiers & devotion Moreover, there was crept into mens heads a suspicion that some devilish and wicked hand might be the cause of all this. Wherupon by an act of the Senat, a commission was granted our unto C. Clandin; the Pretor (who was substituted and chosen in the room of T. Minutius) to make search and diligent inquisition after all confections of poison, & the practisers therof, within the City, & for the compali N of ten miles about it every way : In like maner, to C. Manius, for to fit in the enquiry therof before he crossed over-sea into his province of Sardinia) in all the mart-towns and places of assembly which were more then ten miles off, from Rome. Of all others, the Conful his death was most inspected. For given out it was, that Quarta Hoftilia his wife, had murdered him : but when he was feen once, that her own ion Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was declared Conful in place of his father in law and mothers husband, the death of Pifo the Conful beganto be more infamous and inspicious a great deal then before. And witnesses there came forth ready to depose, that after Albinus and Pifo were pronounced Confuls (in which election the faid Flacens was rejected and suffered arepulle) his mother reproached him therewith, and laid it in his difh, that this was the third time that he fued for the Confulfhip and gone without : adding moreover, and willing him to be rese of dy to fland for it again, for that the would work and bring it about, that within two months ha should be Consul. Among other testimonies and depositions making for the cause and tending to the tame, that speech of hers also, taking effect too truly and so just within the time, was thought infficient to condemn Hostilia.

In the beginning of this ipring, whiles the levy of fouldiers staicd the new Conful at Rome, whiles the death of the one and the choosing of the other into their place, caused all thing there

A togo more flowly forward; in the mean time P. Cornelius, and M. Babius who had done nothing worthy of the remembrance during the Confulship, led their armies against the Ligurian Apuans. Thele Ligarians, who before the coming of the Confuls into the province looked for no war, were surprized at unawares, and to the number of 12000 of them yeelded : whom Cernelius and Babins refolved (upon advice had first with the Senat by letters) to transport from the mountains, into plains and champian countrey from their own home; to the end they should have no more hope to return, for other wife they supposed the Ligurian war would never have an end. Now there was in the Samnits country a certain territory belonging in common to the people of Rome, which fometimes had been in the tenure and possession of the Taurasins. In which place they being delirous to plant the Ligurian Apuans, published an edict, That they should descend down R the mountains Anidos, together with their wives and children, and bring away with them all that ever they had. But the Ligurians tent their Embassadors oftentimes to intreat, that they might not be forced to abandon their domesticall gods, the place of their nativity, and the ferulchres of their ancestors; and therewith promised to deliver up their armor, and to put in hostages. Howbeit, feeing they could not prevail, and having not thrength and power enough to wage war again, they obeyed the edict and proclamation. So there was translated from thence at the publick charges of the City, to the number of four thousand persons free born, together with their women and children : and unto them was allowance made of 150000 Selterces, toward the building of new houses. And for to distribute and divide land among them the same men(to wit, Cornelius and Babius) had commission ; who also removed them into those parts. Howbeit at Ctherequelt of these twain, there were Quinquevirs or five commissioners aisiltants granted unto them by the Senar, by whose advice they might manage all. These affairs being finished, after they had brought with them to Rome their old army, they obtained of the Senat a grant to triumph. And these were the first that ever triumphed &made no war before. Only the enemies were led in shew before their chariot; for nothing had they gained and won for to be caried or led in pomp; neither was there ought to be feen in their triumphs, which might be dealt and given among the fouldiers.

The same yeer Fulvius Flaccus the Pretor in Spain, by occasion that his successor stayed long ere he came into the province, brought forth his army into the field out of his wintring camp, and began to wast and spoil the farther parts and territories of Celtiberia: from whence the inhabi-D tanis came not in to submit and do their homage and fealty. By which deed of his he rather provoked and angred the barbarous people, then terrified them : for when they had fecretly gathered together certain forces and companies, they belet and barred the passage Maulianum, by which they were affured that the Roman army would palle. As L. Post humius Albinus was upon his journey into the nether province of Spain, Gracehus his colleague charged him to advertile Quintus Fabius for to bring his army to Tarracon, for that he propoled there to discharge his old fouldiers, to distribute the supply which he brought, & to range in order al his army by companies. Notice also was given to Flaceus of the very day (which was neer at hand) upon which his successor would come. This new occurent caused Flacens to lay aside those enterprises which he intended, and in all hast to withdraw his forces out of Celuberia. The barbarous people knowing not the R caule hereof, but supposing that he had some inkling of their revolt, and how they had in secret taken arms, and that thereupon he was fore affraid, guarded and stopped the passage io much more streightly. Now to toon as the Roman army was entred into the passe one morning betimes at the break of day, the enemies arose suddainly at once out of two parts, and charged the Romans: which when Flaceus perceived, he gave commandment by the ministery of the Ceturions, that every man should keep his place and stand his ground, to have his arms and weapons in readineffe ; by which means he appealed the tumult and affright in his holt. Then after he had brought all his labouring beafts with the baggage, unto one place, he embattelled and put in array all his bands and companies, partly by himielf in person, and partly by his Lieutenants and colonels, according as the ground and the time required, shewing no lign at all of tear, but putting his men in mind of the enemies, in these terms : "Ye have (quoth he) to do with those that "twice already yeelded have yeelded unto us, who are inured and practifed ftill in wickedness & "perjury; not bettered in vertue and courage : those (I say) who are like to make our return home "honorable and glorious, which otherwife would have been obscure and nothing memorable : so "as we shall carry to Rome for a triumph, our twords all bloudy and newly bathed in the green "wounds and fresh massacre of our enemies; and beare away the spoils of their bodies, all embuted and still dropping with their bloud. Time would not permit him to lay any more for now the enemies advanced forward, and the charge was already given in the utmost skirts of the army. and anon the main battels encountred and joyned conflict. The fight was hot and cruell alike in all parts, but the fortune divers: for the Roman legions in the main battell fought valiantly, and the two wings of either hand did their devoir as bravely. The auxiliary strangers had to deal with themies armed in deed at all points like to themselves, but better souldiers by ods then they were; in inch fort, as they were over-charged by them, and could not make good their ground. The Celtiberrans perceiving they were not able to match the legions in ranged battell and close handfight, cast their companies into a pointed and coin-formed battaillon, for to pierce perforce and er. terupon their enemies in which maner of fight they are to ftrong, that it is not possible to withftand them, wherelover they give their violent charge. And then the legions also were put in difarray, and the whole main battel after a fort, was disbandoned and broken. Which diforder and fear- H full trouble when Flacent perceived he rode a gallop to the legionary men of arms : What? (qd. he unto them I is there no help at all in you? and shall this army here be thus defeated utterly and come to nought? Whereat they cryed on all hands to him to give direction and speak only the word what he would have done, & he should see how they would best ir themselves in the execution of his command. " Mary (quoth he) double your troops, you that are the hortemen or two elegions, and run your hories with full carrier against that wedge-formed battailon of the ene-"mies, where with they presse upon our men , and this shall you perform with the more violence of your horses, if you disbridle them and let them have full head, and so let spurs and mili in a-"mong them : which we have read in stories, that the Romans many a time have practicate "their great praite and honour. No fooner faid, but done it was , pluckt were the brides over I their horse heads; twice they ran through the mids of them to and fro from one side to another, brake all their lances upon the enemies, overthrew them, and made foul work and flaughter among them. When this pointed battaillon of the Celtiberians was once broken, (even the whole and only hope they had;) then they began to fear and tremble, then were they at the pointto quit the fight, and to look about them which way to take their flight. The extr ordinary Cavalry in the out-wings (leeing to brave a fervice performed by the Roman horimen) were enkinded and incented by their valorous example, and of their own accord without attendance of any mans commandment, charged upon their enemies, thus difordered and in difarray already. Then the Celtiberians ran away and fled on all hands. The Roman General feeing them once turn back and shew their hin-parts, vowed to build a chappell to Fortuna equestris, and to exhibit games K in the honor of Inp. Opt. Max. The Celtiberians, thus disbandoned and feattered in the rout all over the length of the threight patlage, were killed and cut in peeces. It is recorded that there died that day feventeen thousand enemies, and were taken priloners alive more then three thoufand, together with 27 field entigus, and well neer eleven hundred hories. For that day, the victorious army lodged within no camp at all: yet was not this victory fo cleer, but it colt them the loffe of tome fouldiers : for of the Romans were flain four hundred feventy and two; of allies (and namely of Latins) 1019; and together with them, addouldiers three thouland. Thus the army having by this good hand recovered their ancient honor and glory, was conducted to Tarracon. Teb. Semproniusthe Pretor, (who was arrived two daies before) went out to meet Fulvius in the way as he came, and the wed how he rejoyced on his behalf, for this good man ging and I happy atchieving the affairs of the commonweal : which done, they agreed together with great accord as touching the fouldiers, namely, whom to case and tend away, and whom to resan ftilin tervice. Then Fulvius having thipped the fouldiers that were discharged, took his journey to Rome : and Sempronius conducted the legions into Celtiberia.

Both the Contuls led their forces into Ligaria, and entred the countrey in two divers quarters. Post burnius with the first legion and the third, beset and invested the two mountains, Balista and Suifmontium and to threightly he kept the narrow passes of those parts with his garrions, that he cut them off from . Il victuals, and tamed them with extream fearcity and want of all things. Fall ins with the freend legion and the fourth, after he had affailed the Apuan Ligurians from the coalt of Pife, received submission and homage of as many of them as inhabited about the river N Macra; and when he had embarked upon feven thousand of them, he sent them over to Naples, coalling along the Tuican ies. From whence they were brought into the Samnits countrey, and certain territory assigned them to inhabit amongst the rest of thir countrymen. As for A. Postbamins, he cut down the vineyards, and burnt the corn of the Ligurian mountainers, so long until they were driven by all maner of calamities following war, to come in and fubmit, yea, and to deliver up their armor and weapons. From thence Post humins departed and took the sea, becaute he would vifit the coasts of the Ligurian Ingaunes and Internelians. Now, before that these Consuls came to the army which was appointed to meet at Pife, it chanced A. Postbumini & M. Fulvius Nobilior, the brother of Q. Fulvius, were the commanders, and had the conduct thereof. N This Fulving was a Colonell of the second legion, who during the time of those months, wherein by turn he had the command and charge thereof, dimiffed that legion, having bound the Centarions by an oath, that they should make paiment back of their wage-mony well and truly to the Questors in the chamber and treasury of Rome. Notice hereof being given to Au. Posthumius at Placentia, (for thither it hapned that he was gone) he rode after those casted souldiers, and purfued them with a company of light horfemen. As many of them as he could overtake, after he had checked and rebuked them for their fault, he brought to Psfa; of the rest he gave information to the Conful. Who put the matter to question, and after it had been debated in counsel, an act of the Senat passed against the said M. Fulvius, that he should be confined and sent into Spain beyond new Carebage. And letters he had given him to carry from the Conful to P. Mantins into the fare o ther province of Spain. As for the fouldiers, hey were commanded to return again to their colours, and for an ignominious difgrace of that legion, ordained it was, that for a full years pay they should be content and take up with fix months wages. And look what souldiers repired not to the army accordingly, the Conful had warrant and commission to make sale of him and all that

The same yeer L. Daronius, who was returned with ten ships to Branda from out of Illyricum (where he fat as Pretor the former yeer) leaving his ships there in the rode, came to Romet 'A where, in discouring of the achs by him done, he laid the whole fault of all the recovery and piracy at les upon Gentins the King of the Illyrians, faying, that all the ships which had lien upon the coast of the Adriatick fea, came out of his realm. For which he had fent Embassadors to complain, but they could never find means to fpeak with the King about it. Now they were Embalisdors arrived at Rome from Geneius, who avonched, that when the Romans came for to parle with the King, he hapned to be fick in the most remote parts of his kingdome : and therfore Gene tim their King and mafter requested the Senat, not to give credit to those falle accusations and forged flanders which his enemies had raifed and informed against him. But Duronius alledeed moreover, that divers and fundry persons, as well citizens of Rome as Latine allies within his ddminion, hadreceived many wrongs : yea, and by report certain Roman citizens were staied and a detained at Coreyra. Whereupon it was in councell thought good that they should be brought to Rome, and that G.Clandins the Pretor should have the hearing of the matter, before such time no aniwer would be given unto King Gentins or his Embailadors.

Among many othersthat the plague this yeer confumed, certain prieffs and prelats also died. and namely, L. Valerius Flacens, a bishop, in whole room was cholen Q. Fabius Labeo. Also P Menlins one of three Triumvirs for the celebration of the holy feafts. In whole flead Q. Fulviwithe fon of Marcus was elected Triumvir. He was at that time very yong, and not out of his em- * Prataxialis brodeted Pratexta. But as touching the King of facrificers, who was to be chosen in place of Cn, It appeareth Cornelius Dolobella, there was debate between C. Servilius the Archbishop, and Cornelius Do-that he was labella one of the Duumvirs for the navy. For when the bishop would have had him to resign that under 17 years office, that he might coniecrate and inaugurat him the King tacrificer, he refused to to do. For troy weeth which caule the bishop fet a round fine on the Daumvir his head. Then Dolabella appealed to the this word in people; and before them it was to be tried, whether the faid fine should be taken off or paied? Now the end of the proper and of the tribes called into the rails for to give their voices, advited the Dummivir to obey 22 book; for when mok of the tribes called into the rails for to give their voices, advited the Dummivir to obey 12 book; for when mok of the tribes called into the rails for to give their voices, advited the Dummivir to obey 12 book; for when more or the warded the fine to be pardoned and remitted, in case he would give over that Pretexia was the biftop, and warded the fine to be pardoned and remitted, in case he would give over that Pueritis habitus office which he had, behold it lightned at the very instant from heaven, which is the only ominous Tacitus 12. fin that interrupteth the affemblies of the people. Whereupon the Colledg of the bishops made lib, and upo ferale of conscience to inaugurate Dolabella, but they consecrated P. The same year granted it was to the johabitants of Cumes, at their own request and petition, that they might commonly speak Latine : as alloto the publick criers, to make portfale of goods in the Latine tongue. The Senat gave thanks to the Pilans for the offer they made of lands, wherein to plant a Colony of Latins, And three Triunvirs or Commissioners for that business were created, namely, Q. Fabins Butes, Marcus and Publiss, both named Popiliss, and both furnamed Lanas . Letters were brought from M. Manus wis to give over that inquilition, or to refign up his province Sardinia, Q. Fulvius Flaccus returned out of Spain to Keme with great honour for his acts there atchieved. Who remaining yet without the City, because of his triumph, was created Conful with L. Muslins Acidimus, and within few daies after, rode triumphant into Rome, accompanied with his fooldiers, whom he had brought home with him. He carried in triumph a 120 * golden comes, Moreover in gold 31 pound weight, befides 173200 peeces of coin in Olcan filver. He dealt to his fouldiers fifty Denarii perces out of the booty and pillage which he had gotten. To very Centurion he gave it double, and to the gentlemen of Rome that ferved on horsback, triple. The like he did by the Latin allies, and to all in general he paied double wages. This year was the law fift proposed by L. He declared that on that very day wherin he lought his latt battell with the Celtiberians, he had made a vow to exhibit games to the honour of that most mighty and gracious god Japuers, and likewife to build a temple to Fortuna equifirit : and how thereto the Spaniards had contributed certain jums of mony. So a decree patied, that those plaits (hould be tet forth : and two Duumvirs choien, to give order and bargain for the edification of the same temple. Likewise there was set down a certain flint of mony to be disburted for the defraying of the charges : to wit, dor-exceeding that fum in the folemnty of the plates, which was allowed unto Fulvini Nobilior, when he exhibited the like sports after the end of the Etolian war. Item, that for their games he fhould not feek or fend for, gather and raile, receive or do I any thing, contrary to the Act of the Senat, which in the time of L. Amplim and Co. Bebins Confuls was made as touching such passimes. This decree the Senat orderized, by occasion of the fuperfluous and excensive expenses emploied about the plaies of T. Sempronius the Ædite; which were very chargeable not only to Italy and the Latine alices, but also to fortain provinces. The winter this year was very tharp, by realon of frow, and all manner of tempetinous weather. The trees that were tender and lubject to frost and cold, were all biasted and killed a besides the winter featon continued much longer then ordinary in other yeers. And thereupon the fellival folemnity of the Latine holidaies were to troubled and difordered by a fuddain and interportable ftorm and tempest upon the hill [Alba] that by an ordinance of the Bishops, it was reiebrated again the second time. The same tempett caft down certain images in the Capitol, and disfigu K red very many places with thunderbolts and flishes of lightning. It overthrew the temple of jupiter in Tarracina, the white temple at Capua: Item. the gate there called R. mana, and the batelements of the wals in divers places. Among these wondrous produgies it was reported also from Reare, that a mule was foaled with three feet. For this caufe the Decemvirs were commanded to go to the books of Sibylla 1 and out of that learning they thewed to what gods farifice should be made, & what number of beasts was to be killed. And because many places were with lightning defaced, they ordained that a folemn supplication should be holden one whole day in the temple of Jupiter. This done, the forefaid games and plaies which Q. Fulvius the Contul had vowed, were with great magnificence exhibited for ten daies together. After this followed the election of the Centors, wherein M. Emplius Lepidus the Arch-bishop, and M. Fulusus No. L bilior, who had triumphed over the Ætolians, were created. Now between these two men, then had been notorious enmity, oftentimes tellified and shewed in many that p and buter debates, both the Senat, and also before the people. When this election was ended, the two Cenfors according to the ancient ple and cultome, fat upon their ivory chairs of effate in Mars field, netr the alter of Mars. To whom there foon repaired thither, the principal Senators, accompanied with a troop befides of citizens . and among the tell, Q. Cacilius Merellus made a speech to this effect. The Latins & Sabins both, were sendenizen'd Romans. An old faying it is, and not fo old as rrue, and for the truth become a a common proverb, that enmittes ought to be transitory and toon die, wheras friendship should "continue & live for ever. At these words, there arose a confused bruit, among them there assembled, intoken of their confent and approbation : and anon were heard the diffinct voices of them allingeneral, craving and requesting of the Censors the same; which making one entire found. brake off the speech of Metellus. Then Emplins among other matters complained that M. Fulvius had twice put him besides the Consulship, which other wite he was sure of. And Fulvius on the other fide found bimlelf grieved, the the evermore by Amplius had been provoked, and that he Rhad waged law by ftipulation against him to his dihonor and difgrace. Yer both of them made fair and thewed, that if the one were as willing as the other, they would relent and be over-ruled by fo many honorable personages of the City. So, at the instant request of all them that were present, they shook hands and thereby affured one another to forgive and forget all matters past, and truly to make an end of malice, and be perfect friends again : whereupon they were much commended by the whole affembly, and conducted by them into the Capitoli. Where the Senat approved and highly prested, as well the exreful industry of the principal citizens, in effecting this io weightramatter, as also the good pature and flexibility of the two Censors. Who afterwards when they required to have a certain fum of of mony assigned unto them for to employ in the publick ediffices and other works of the City, were allowed by their decree, the full rent and revenues of one

C The same yeer L. Posthumius and Tib, Sempronius the Pro-Pretors in Spain agreed to together that Albinus should make an expedition against the Vacces through Lustiania, and fo return from thence into Celtiberia. But Gracehni went as far as the utmoit quarter of Celtiberia, forthat in thoje parts there was the greater war. And first he forced the City Munda, which he surprised fuddainly in the night at unawares. Then, after he had received holiages, and put a garrifon there, he went forward affaulting forts and burning the villages, until he come to another City of exceeding strength, which the Celtiberians call Certima: where, as he was about to approach the wals with his engins of battery, there came unto him orators out of the City; who like good plain men of the old world, made a speech unto him, nothing discembling but that they would war and be revenged, if their ftrength and forces were sufficient. For they requested leave to passe D to the Celtiberian camp, there to receive aid and fuccour : but if they could not speed, then they would confult spart by themelves what to do. Good leave they had of Gracebus; and fome few diesafter, they brought with them ten Orators more. About noone-tide it was of the day. and the first thing that they craved at the Pretor his hand was this, That he would make them to drink before they paried. When they had once quaffed and carowfed round, they called again for more: whereat, all that were present and flood about them, laughed heartily, to see them so rude and uncivil, and altogether without good manners. But afterwards, the eldest man of the company began in this wife: We are fent (quoth he) unto you from our nation, to know what affured means hath ind uced you to levy war against us? To this demand Gracehus antwered, That he came with the confidence that he had in a brave and valiant army; which (if they were so defirous) bewould do them the favour to fee, that they might be able to make more certain report to their countrymen upon their own knowledge. And with that, he commanded the colonels and knight marthals, to put in arms and embattell all the bands and companies, as well foot as horfe; and then armed as they were to charge one upon another in manner of a battel. These Embassadors after they had once feen this fight, were fent away : who went directly to the Celtiberians their neighbors, and frighted them for lending any succourto the City belieged. The townsmen within having in vain 1:t fire-lights in the night time aloft upon their turrets (which was the fignal agreed opon between them) and seeing themselves destitute of the only hope they had of aid, yeeldcaby composition. So they were enjoined to make paiment of four and twenty hundred thousand Seferces; and to deliver forty of their nobleft gentlemen and best men of arms; not by way of hollages (for commanded they were to ferve in the wars); and yet in truth, they frood for a pawn of affurance for their fealty. From thence anon he marched to the City Alco, where the Chiberians lay encamped, and from whom of late the Embassadors aforesaid came: whom, for tentin daies he provoked to fight, making fmall skirmilhes, by fending out against their corps de gund his light-armed vancurtiers, to the end that scuffling together every day more then other bemight train them all forth of their camp at length. And when he perceived once that his delign had taken eff. ct., be commanded the captains of the auxiliary fouldiers, that after forms flost skirmilla, they should make semblant as if they were overcharged with numbers, and so at once turn their backs, and flie as fast as they could to their own camp: himself in the mean while put his men in battell array within the rampier at every gate. Long it was not, but he might fee he own bands and companies retiring back on fet purpole, and running away, and after them thebarbarous enemies following as hard as they could in chase. Now had he his army embattelkilor the purpose, and ready to receive them: and therefore he made no longer stay then only to tuffer his friends and allies to enter at liberty into the camp, but he fet up a loud cry, and at one initiant idued forth at all the gates. The enemies were not able to endure this unexpected violent charges and to they that werecome to affail the camp of others, could not to much as defend their cwn: for presently they were discomitted and put to flight; and within a white, criven for very fear into their hold, and in the end turned out of it alio, I hat day 9000 of the enemics left their carkates in the field, 320 were taken prifeners, tegether with 112 horie, & 73 field enfigns. Of the Roman army , there died not above 109. Prefently after this battel, Graceh: t marched with his legions to wast and spoil the country of Celtiberia : and is he made hatckinall places as he went, with driving booties, & with harrying & carying all that ever he could come by ; the Cities and States of the country, fome submitted willingly of their own acceld; others for constraint & fear received the yoke of subjection; so as in few daies space he became master of an 103 towns that yeelded unto him. A mighty tich pillage he gat in this expedition. Alterthis be marched back again towards the City Alce from whence he came, and began to befrege and affeilthetown. The inhabitants endured the first affault of the enemies, but afterwards feeing I their town not only affailed by force of arms, but also shaken with engine and instruments of battery, distrutting the ftrength of the City, they retired all within their fortreffer from wheree allo to the end, (having fent their Orators before-hand)they & all that ever they had, were at thedevotion of the Romans. A great booty there was gotten, and many noble gentlemen taken prifenens amongst whom were two ions and one daughter of Thurras. This Thurras was a prince and great lord of those parts, and fimply the mightiest potentat of all the Spaniards by many degrees, who being advertised of the hard hap and calamity fallen upon his children, fent unto Gracebus into the camp for a fafe conduct, and thither he came himfelf in person. And first he demanded, Whether he could grant unto him and his their lives? The Pretor answered, That they should live. Then be deminded again, if he might bear arms and serve under the Romans? and when Gracebui K permitted that alfo; Then will I follow you (quoth he) against mine old friends and allies, fince they difdain to respect and regard me. From this time forward he took part with the Romans: and in many journies he bare him elf loially and valiantly in their wars, and much advanced the Roman State. After this, Ergavica (anoble, rich and mighty City) offrighted at the calamities of other neighbor towns and States about them, fet the gates open for to receive the Romans. Some Authors have written, that their towns and Cities yeelded not bona fide and in fincerity of heart : but that fo foon as he had withdrawn the legions out of any quarter, fuddainly from that part they revolted : also, that afterwards, he fought a cruell battel neer the mountain Cannus with the Celtiberians, from the break of day untill noon : in which conflict there were many flain both of the one fide and the other: neither did the Romans any other great deed (as they sup. I pole) at Ergavica that day to tellifie their victory, but kept the field, and challenged them out of their camp to fight. Moreover, that the next morrow all the day long, they gathered up the fools of the deade &onthe third day strook a second battel, which was greater than the other i & then at length, the Celtiberians without all doubt loft the field cleer; infomuch as their camp was ranfacked. Furthermore, that there died of the enemies that day 22000, and not lo few as 300 taken prifonces, and wel-neer as many horse, besides the winning of 72 military ensigns and to the war came to a finall end, the Celtiberians made peace indeed, continued fast and firm therein with all loyalty, and were not to fickle & unconftant as before. They write moreover, that the same summer L. Possibumius fought a brave battell with the Pages in the father province of Spain, where he put to the (word 35000 enemies, & forced their camp. But it foundeth more like a truth, that he came M not timely enough into that province, for to perform any fuch exploits during that fummer featon.

The Cenfors made areview and new choice of Senators in good concord and faithfull unity: for the president of the Senat was chosen, M. Amilius Lepidus the Centor bimielt, who also was the high prieft or Arch-bishop. Three Senators were cassed and deprived their places : but Lepidus held fome in, whom the colleague over-passed and left out. Of that portion of mory, which out of the main allowance was divided between them, they caused these works following to be made. Lepidus for his patt railed the great cauley or what at Tarracina, which w superce of work nothing acceptable to the people, for that he had himfelf lands and polletsions thereof his own, and feemed to eale his privat expenses, under colour of doing a publick work with the Ci-N ties mony. He built a Theatre, a tore stage or a vant-scaffold neer the temple of Apollo, He bargained with the Publicans or Undertakers for the polithing, blanching and whiting of the temple of Iupiter in the Capitol, and likewise of the pillars about it. From these pillars he removed the Images and Statues, which feemed to have been unhandfomly fet one against another, and out of all order. Likewise he took from thence, the targets and field-enfigns of all forts, that were there fet up and fallned. But M. Fulvins put forth to making more works in number, and those of better and greaterule; To wit, a peer, and certain main piles within the river Tybers; upon which piles, cert. in yeers after P. Scipio Africanus and L. Mummius being Centors, took order for arches to be founded and erected. Item, a stately hall or p slace behind the new shops of the banquers. Item A fish market, with others shops round about him, which he sold to particular persons. O Item, a market place, and a porch or gallery without the gate Tergemina, and another behind the arienall, and neer the temple of Hercules. Item, neer Tyber, and behind the church of the goddesse Hope, he caused to be built the chappell of Apollo the Physitian. Now they had besides another flock of mony in common, which they emploied in taking order for water to be converged into the City; and certain vaults to be made. But this work was impeached by M. Licinius Craffu, who would not fuffer the water to passe through his ground. Over and besides these same Centors, instituted certain rents for portage, & pondage, & diversother imposts. Many chappels & publick

A places in the tenure and occupation of privat persons, they took order to be reduced to the use of the people in common, and to be set open for all comers. They changed the order of giving voices and caused to enroll the tribes according to fundry quarters and divisions, having regard withall of the degrees of men, of their trades, mysteries and occupations. Allothe one of the Cenfors M. Emplies fued unto the Senat, that allowance should be made unto him of money for the games and plaies at the dedication of the Temples of Queen Juno and Disabywhich in the Ligurian war he had vowed eight years before; and affigned there was unto him twenty thoufand Asses. So he dedicated both those Temples within the cirque or shew-place of Flaminius. Also he exhibited Stage plaies three daies together after the dedication of the Temple of Juno, and two daies after the other of Diana: and every of those daies within the cirque Flaminius. B The same Censor dedicated in Mars field a Chappell to the sea gods, vowed by L. Amylina Regilluseleven years before, in a navall battell at lea, against the Captains of K. Antiochus. Over the gates of which Chappel there was fixed a table with this title. [For the appealing and composing of Antiubus and agreat war between two Kings, * the head, * to fibdue * . for to make peace . This confiit, * when L. Æmylius Regillus the Prator, the fon of M. Under the charge, command, and government, happyfortune, and conduct of him between Ephefus, Samos, and Chios, the fleet of King Antiochusthe the Latine, eleventh daies before the Kalends of February was vanquished, discomfitted, shaken, battered, and put to flight, and there upon the same day two and forty Gallies were taken, with all the mariners and servitors within them, After which fight King Antiochus and his Realm* * * * . In consideration hereof wowed a Temple to the Sea-gods, affiftants unto him in atchieving the navell victory.] Another table likewise, C with the very same inscription, was set up and fashed over the gates of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll. Within two daies after that the Cenfors had chosen a new Senat, Q. Fulvius the Cos. made an expedition against the Ligurians: and after he had passed with his army over wilds and mountains, where no tracks led them, through straights and passes of forrests, he fought a pitcht battell with the enemies, and not only won the field, but also in one and the felf-fame day lorced their camp. Whereupon three thousand and two hundred of the enemies, and all that quarter of Ligaria yielded anto him. Then the Contul placed these that had surrendered, in the plains and champain country, and planted garrisons upon the mountains. Letters hereof with great speed came to Rome: whereupon there were ordained processions for three daies. During which time of procession the Prætors celebrated sacrifices, and killed forty greater beasts. But the other Consul D A. Manlius did no exploit worth remembrance in Liguria. Three thousand Transalpine Frenchmen passed over the Alps into Italy, in peaceable manner marching without any hostility or harm doing, and requested of the Conful and the Senat a territory to inhabit, where they might remain quietly under the seignory of the Romans. But the Senar commanded them to avoid out of Italy; and gave the Conful Q. Fulvius in charge to make tearth and enquiry into this matter, yea, and to proceed against them who had been the captains and counsellers to perswade them to pass o-This very year died Philip King of the Macedonians, worn away to nothing, partly, for age, and arrested his body, and brought him into the Kings house; and when he had left him in the safeR arreired mis boury, and oroughe minimum the ore many more than the first the current of certain positions of the position of the control of the deal to know the whole truth as touching your two lons, and be recolved whether of them er gwain it was that laid wait to takeaway the life of the other. Now the only man of all other se that can undo the knot and clear this doubt, is in your hands forth coming, and that is Xychni, Herewith he advited the King to call before him the faid party, fince that (as it fell out) he was alseady brought into the Court, Sent for he was and prefented before the King; and being asked the question, he denied every thing at the first , but with such inconstancy, as it appeared evident ly, that upon some little sear of corture offered unto him, he would be ready to bewray all store the very light of the tormentor and the scourges, he releated. Then he disclosed and shewed in or. I der the whole proceeding and manner of this wicked practice and villany, how it was wrought as well as by the embaliadors, as also by his own self their minister. Immediatly there were some of purpose sent to apprehend the said embassadors. And Philoses who was present in the way, they furpriled and took of a fudden: as for Apelles (who had been lent to purise one Chareas) being ad-furpriled and took of a fudden: as for Apelles (who had been lent to purise one Chareas) being ad-vertiled how that Xyebus had bewraied & told all, failed over into Italy. As concerning Philades, there is no certainty known. Some report, that at the beginning he denied the matter flouily: but after that Xyehus was brought to his face and confronted him, he flood no longer in it. Others fay again, that being put to torture, he endured the pains, and continued fill in the deniall. Phidip: forrow and grief was by this means renewed and redoubled, reputing himself more unhappy in his fons, and his mifery the greater, in that one of them was now dead and gone. Perfess being K an and individual all was discovered, took himselffor a greater and mightier person, than to sear and chink it needfull for him to flie upon it. And therefore he fought only to keep far enough out of the way, purpoling to stand upon his guard all the while that his father lived, and avoid the start when the way is the way is the way in the start will be start as the way in the start will be start with the way in the ming fire(as it were) of his burning choler. Philip feeing that he could not possibly come by his perion for to execute justice, thought upon that which only remained to be done, and studied how Porfess befides impunity, should not be recompensed and rewarded also for that his wickedness, Hecalled therefore Antigonus before him, unto whom he was bounden and beholden already, for bringing to light the unnatural murder committed upon Demetrius his fon; and of whom he conceived this opinion, in regard of the fresh and late glory of his uncle Antigonus that the Macedonians should have no cause to be ashamed or repent, if they had had him for to be there. L cedonians modicinate to be amand of repeat, in they had not not not content.

And together with him, there was Antigonus the son of Echecrates, bearing the name of his uncle

And in this wife he brake with him: "Since my unhappy fortune is fuch (quoth he)O Antigonal, that I ought (contrary to all other fathers) to wifh my (elf childlefs, I have a mind and purpose to make over unto you that kingdom, which I received at the hands of your uncle, which he & preferred and kept, yea, and augmented for my behoof during the time of my nonage. & whereof in(whiles I was under his guardi-nage) he bare himfelf not only valiant, but also true and faithunto me. No man I have but you, whom I can efteem worthy to wear the Crown; and if I knew of none at all, yet had I rather that both it and the Realm perished and were extinct for ever, than Perfeus should enjoy it as the guerdon of his ungracious & devillish fact. I shall ima-"gine yet that Demetrius is rifen from death to life, I shall think that I have the fruition of him « again, if I leave you in this place, you, I lay, the only man of all others that wept for the death M of the poor innocent young man, and lamented for my unhappy errour and unfortunat trelpas, After this speech with Antigonas, he never cealed to entertain and grace him in the face of the world with all kind of honour that he could devile. For feeing that Perfess was in Thrace, Philip wenn in progress to every City of Macedony, and recommended Amigonus to all the Praces and and States thereof. And without all donbt, if God had given him longer life but a little, he would have enstalled him in full possession of the kingdom, Well, to return again unto Demetria, where he wintered (as beforeis faid) he departed from thence, and (ojourned a long time in Thoff de-Bica. From thence after he was come to Amphipolis, he was surprised with a grievous milidy. Howbeit, certain it was and very apparant, that he was more fick in mind than body; and that e wer and anon the remembrance and object, the apparition and ghost of his ion, whom he caused (innocent as he was) to be put to death followed and haunted him fo continually with care and object, the apparition and ghost of his ion, whom he caused that have a support to the put to death followed and haunted him fo continually with care and the characteristics and the support of the characteristics and the support of the characteristics and the characteristics are characteristics. grief, that he was out of all fleep, and could not lay his eyes together: yea, it drave him into raving, curfing, and execration of Perfess his other ion; and io he ended his daies. But although Philip died omewhat with the foonest for Antigonus, yet he would have gone very near to have Rept into his thron, if either the Kings death had immediatly been divulged abroad, or that Anigonus had then been about the Court that he might have had intelligence thereof. For Califernia the Kings Physician, who had the cure of him, staid not untill the breath was fully out of the Kings body; but fo foon as he perceived that his state was desperar, upon the first deadly sens that he observed, fent mellengers post to Perfess, who were set of purpose in places convenient, according asit was complosted between them twain; but he concealed the Kings death from all them that were not of the houshold, until he was come, By which means Perfess surprised them all before they looked for him, or knew abroad that the King was departed, and thus herook the Crown upon him by policy, which he had purchased with michief.

The death of Philip fell our very well to give some delay and respire, and to gather more force for the waging of war: for the nation of the Ballarna, having been a long time follicited thereon departed out of their own country, and with a great power as well of foot as horse, came on this

A fide the river * Ifter Now there were arrived before to advertise the King hereof, Antigonis and * Denibited Cotto. This Cotto was a nobleman among the Baltarnians, And Antigonus was full against his will joyned in embaffage & fent with Corro to raife the Battarnians. Howbeit, not far from Amphicalis they met with news (but very uncertain) of the Kings death: which occurrence troubled the whole course of their designs. For thus it was complotted that Philip should give the Bastarra tale pasface through Thrace and find them victuals: to the effecting and performing whereof, he had entertained the peers and principal States of those quarters with presents, and affored them upon his fidelity, that the Baltarnians should pass through their country peaceably without any harm-doing. Now his intent and full purpote was, to extenguish utterly the nation of the Dardanians, and to plant the Baltarnians in their country. Hereby he aimed at a two fold commodity: Riche one was this; that the Dardanians (a people most malicious ever to the Macedonians, and who alwaies in time of the troubles and advertities of the KK, took their vantage to annoy them) might be rooted out : the other, that the faid B. frame leaving their wives and hildren in Dardania, might be sent to waste and spoil Italy. Now were they to pass to the Adriatick sea and so to Italy by the way of the Scordicians (for other way there was none to lead an army) and loon would they thought he grant passage unto the Bastarnians : for they distered not at all, either in language, or manners & fashions : and more than that, they were like enough to joyn with them in the expedition, feeing they went to the conquest and pillage of a mote rich and wealthy nation. These designments were accommodated and fitted to whatevents soever should happen. For in case the Bastarnians should happen to be deseated by the Romans and put ali to the sword; yet Cthis would be a comfort again; that the Dardanians were confumed from the race of the earth, that he should meet with a booty of that which the Bastarnians left behind them; and smally, have the possession free and entire to himself of all Dardania. But in case their fortune were to have the upper hand, then whiles the Romans were averted from him, and amufed upon the war with the Baltarnians, he should be able to recover what loever he had lost in Greece. These had been the defigns projected by K. Philip. So they entred peaceably, and marched without hostility, under the word and promife of Cotto & Antigonus. But shortly after that news came of the death of Philip; neither were the Thracians fo tractable and easie to be dealt withall in commerce and traffick: nor the Bastarnians could be content with that which they bought with their money, or be kept in order as they marched but that they would break their ranks & turn out of the di-Drect way, Hereupon they began to do wrong & injury on both fides one unto another; which encreating daily more & more to outrages, kindled the fire of an open war. In the end, the Thracians notable to endure the violence & multitudes of these enemies, leaving their villages in the plains beneath, retired to an exceeding high mountain, called Donnea. To which place, when the Baffarmans would have gone: behold not with standing they approached to the tops and ridge of the hils, they were surprised with a storm, much like to that wherewith the Gauls (as it is reported) perished at what time as they were a spoiling and pilling the Temple at Delphi. For they were not only drenched first with showers of rain pouring upon them pelted afterwards with thick storms of hailftones frucken with great cracks of thunder and blaffed with gleams of lightning that dazled their eye-fight; but also the lightning flashed so upon them on every fide, that it seemed they were charged and shot directly against their bodies: so as not only the common souldiers, but alfo the principal leaders and captains themselves were smitten down there with and overthrown. Whereupon when they were feattered & would have fled down the hill, from the exceeding fleep tocks they tumbled down they knew not how with their heads forward. And albeit the Thracians purfued them thus scared and affrighted, yet they had nothing in their mouth, but That the gods forced them to run away, and that the sky fell upon them. Being thus disparkled with this tempeliuous florm, and returned asit were out of a shipwrack into the camp from whence they fet forth & most of them but half armed, they began to debate in councill what to do. Hereupon atosesome differtion among them: whiles part were of opinion to return back into their own country, and part advised to follow the way still and pierce forward into Dirdania. About 3000 perions went through under the conduct of Clondicus: the rest of the multitude returned the same way they came into the parts beyond * Danubius. Perfeus being possessed of the kingdom, com- * Donary manded Antigonus to be put to death: and whiles he was fetting the States in order, and establithing himself in his own feat, he sent embassadors to Rome. as well to renew the amity that his fathet had with the Romans, as also to request that he might be stilled with the name of King by the Senat of Rome. And these were the affairs in Macedony that year.

Q.Fulvinsthe other Cos. triumphed over the Ligurians: and known it was for certain, that this triumph was granted unto him more for favour, than for any great exploit of his that might deletve tuch honour. He carried in thew a mighty deal of the enemies armor; but little or no money at all, Howbeit he dealt among his fouldiers thirty Asses apeece: to every Centurion he gave twice as much, and to each Gentleman serving on horseback, the same threefold. There was nothing in this triumph more memorable and worthy the noting, than this, that as it fell out, he mumphed now the very same day that he had the year before upon his Prætorship. After his thumph. he published the general assembly for the election of Magistrats: wherein were created Colf. M. Juvine Brutus, and A. Manlius Volfo. This done when there had been three of the Pra- * Ante quartors elected a fudden tempest brake up and disfolved the assembly. Curous, Titus Claudius Noro, and T. Fonteius Capito. The Roman games were exhibited again the H fecond time, by the two Ædiles of the Chair Cn. Servilius Capio, and Ap. Claudiu Come by occasion of certain prodigies that hapned: for there was an earthquake; and in the publike pavilions and tabernacles, where the facred beds of the gods were folemnly foread, the heads of the gods which were laid in those beds, turned away of their own accord, and the wooll together with the other coverlets which were laid before Jupiter fell down. It was taken also for a prodigious wonder, that the mice and rats had gnawn and tasted before of the olives upon the table of Japan; for the latisfaction and expiation of which prodigies, nothing elie was done, but the lolemnizing of those games and plaies again, as is aforefaid.

Now when the Consul was in deliberation with his councill, as touching war in Ifria, some to spoil and raise booties. were of opinion, to proceed thereunto incontinently, before that the enemies could assemble their forces; others advited to con-ult first with the Senate but their counsel imported, who were for speedy expedition, So the Consul dislodged from Aquileia and encamped near the Lake Timavise which lieth hard by the fea, Thither came Caus Furius (one of the navall Duumvirs) withten thips: for two fuch Duumvirs or wardens had been chosen to make head against the Illyrian seet. who with twenty ships in al, keeping the upper sea, were to guard the sea-coasts so, as they had Anom. Theleten veffels (I fay) were lent to the next port, against the marches of Istri. with other ships of buden fraughted with store of victuals and provision. The Conful followed after with his legions and pitched his camp five miles from the fea. And within a fhort time there was a good and trequent market kept in the port from whence there was conveyed all manner of provision into the camp. And to the end that this might hold in more fecurity, good guards were fer about the camp

Placentins, levied on a sudden, opposed and lodged between the sea and the camp. And to the end the same might serve for a guard to desend them that watered at the river M. Ebutius (a Colonell of the two legions) was commanded to adjoyn two iquadrons of fouldiers out of the second legion, Tand C. both Alij (Colonels likewile) had led the third legion, by the way that goth to Aquileia, which should guard the forragers and sewellers, From which quarter about a mile diflant was the camp of the French. And a certain petty King there was among them, one Carmelius, having the conduct of three thousand armed souldiers, or somewhat more, So soon as the Romans were approached, the lake * Timavus with their camp, the If rians let them down lecretly * Timavus or in a close place behind a little hill; and from tyence followed the Roman army as it marched, Larcebia, Bby crois and crooked waies, espying and lying for all advantages that might be pretented: for intelligence they had of all that was done either at lea or by land. And when they perceived upon a time the corps de guard before the camp feeble and weak, and that there was a great number of marmed Merchants between the camp and the fea, without any defence at all either from land or water, they ran at once upon the torciaid guards, to wit, the Placentine cohort, and a fo the foundrons of the second legion. Now their enterprise at the beginning was covered and hidden by occasion of a morning mitt, which at the first warmth of the sun brake and scattered away, and then began somewhat to appear through it : but the light was not yet clear and come to the full; by reason whereof everything (as commonly in such a case) shewed far bigger than it was. And this at that time mightily deceived the Romans, cauting the army of the enemies to feem the greater by many degrees. At which fight, the fouldiers of the one guard as well as the other being affrighted, fled into the camp with a great tumult and alarm, and there caused far more sear than they brought with them: for neither were they able to tell why they fled thus as they did, norgive a ready answer to those that asked them the question. Over and besides, a great noise they heard from the camp gates, as where there was no jufficient guard to justain the first assault, Beides, their running thus in a throng together in the dark, while one tumbled upon another, made fuch a confusion, that they knew not whether the enemy was within the rampier or no. No othercry was heard but this; To fea, To fea. For by occasion that one fouldier at adventure began tolet up that note, all the camp presently rung again therewith, from one end to the other. Whereupon at first, (as if they had been commanded so to do) to the sea they ran, some sew ar-D med but the most part without any armonr or weapons: afterwards more, and consequently at last in manner all ; yea, and the Conful himself, seeing that he laboured in vain to reclaim them, backhe fled, and could prevail neither by command nor authority, nor yet with priers in the end; only M. Licinius Strabo (a Tribune or Colonell of the third legion, abandoned of his own legion) remained behind with three entigns and no more. The Istrians finding him alone, (for no man ellewas icen in arms to make refiltance entred joyntly into the camp, ran upon him (& as he was embattelling his fouldiers and encouraging them in the quarter about the Prætor his lodging) furpilied, and with numbers over-charged him. The skirmish and fight was more cruell, than for proportion of so few defendants; and not ended, before that the Tribune himself and those about him, were flain every man. The Generall his pavilion and all about it, was overthrown: which E when the enemy had raniacked and rifled of all that was there, they went as far as the treasurers lodging, the market place, and to the gate * Quimana: where they found abundance of all things * By that gate fet out ready for their hands, and within the treasurers pavilion the tables spread and covered was the market with good cates and meat upon them. Then their chief Lord & Leader (the petty King alore laid) led directly to

made no more ado but sate him down, sell to his victuals and made good chear; and anon all it. therest following his example, did to likewise, and never once thought of arms, or of enemies; and like to those who were not wont to fare so well and feed liberally, they greedily overcharged their bellies with wine and viands: but the Romans all the while flood in far other terms. They trembled, they went hastily to their buliness both on land and lea. Down went the shipmen and failers with their tilts and booths; and look what provision of victuals or other things were fet forth to sale upon the strand and shore, they harried and hurried a shipboord : the souldiers all affrighted ran amain to the sea-side, for to be embarked. The mariners searing lest their vessels should be overcharged, some put back the preis and withstood them for coming in, others shove off from the what; and lanched into the deep. Hereupon began a braul and broil, and from that they fell together by the ears, fouldiers and marriners, one with another: fome went away with knocks and wounds, and others left their lives behind them; untill at length, by the Confulhis commandment, the fleet was retired far from the land. Which done he began to fort the armed and unarmed apart. And hardly were there (of fo great a multitude) twelve hundredfound with armorabout them, and very few horiemen that had brought their hories with them. All the rest were a confused and disordered company, recembling the rascall fort of camp-Giollowers, as victuallers, launders, scullions, and lackies: who had been a ready booty to have preyed upon in case the enemies could have thought upon any feats of arms. Then at last came a messenger to recall the third legion and to surprise the guard of the Gauls; and with that, from all parts they began to return again toward their own camp, for to recover it, and wipe away and bot on the shamefull stain and dishonour which they had received. The Colonels of the third legion commanded the fouldiers to throw down upon the ground their forrage and fewell, they tharged the Centurions to fet the elder and unweildy fouldiers two and two upon the hories and

labouring beafts which they had discharged of their load; and willed the horsemen to take up be H hind them every one a young lutty footman; shewing what an honous it would be to the third legion, for to regain by their valour the camp, which had been loft by the cowardice and fear of those in the second: and easily (say they) may it be won again, if the Barbarians, while they are encumbred with the pillage, might be iurprifed at unawares, and be taken themselves, like as they overtook others before. This exhortation was received with great alactity and contentment of the fouldiers. Aloft were the entigns born and advanced apace, neither staid the port-entigns one whit for the fouldiers. Howbeit the Cof, and those companies which were brought from the fea. came first to the rampier. L. Atim a principall Centurion of the second legion, not only encouraged the fouldiers, but made remontirance unto them, That if the Istrians thele victories, had ever meant to guard and keep the camp with the same force of arms by which they had won it, they t would at the first have pursued the enemies to the sea, so soon as they had turned them out of their tents; and afterwards have let a good corps de guard, at least wite before the sampier and the avenues thereof: but like enough it is (laith he) that with guzling wine they were dead affeeplike beafts, And herewith he commanded A. Baculonius his own enfign-bearer, a man of approved valour and fingular prowefs to advance his banner forward Mary, that I shall (quoth he) full foon, if you will follow me alone that the thing may be done more quickly. With that he forced his whole frength and having flung the enfign over the trench into the camp, he was the first himfelf that entred at the camp gate, On another part likewife I, and C, both Ælii, and Colonels of the third legion, were come with their Cavalry : then presently followed those also whom they had horsed two by two upon the labouring jades and wagons of carriage, and after them the Col. K with his whole army. But of the Iltrians some few there were (such as were not stark drunk) whose wits and memory served them to runaway; the rest were dead asseep indeed, and never awoke again, So the Romans recovered all their goods, save only the wine and victuals which was devoured and confumed. The Roman fouldiers who were crazy and fick, and had been left in the camp, after they perceived their own fellows within the rampier, found their hands again, caught up weapons, and made a great flaughter and execution. But above all others C. Popilins, furnamed Sabellus, a Gentleman and Cavalier of Rome, bare himself most bravely that day, who being left in the camp (because he was hurt and maimed in one of his feet) flew the greatest number of the enemies by far. Eight thousand Istrians fell upon the edge of the sword, and not one taken prisoner alive: for the choler and despiteous indignation of the souldiers was such, as they had no [mind at all of prizes and booties. Howbeit, the K. of the Istrians, drunk as he was had so good fortune as to be taken from the very boord where he fat, and hastily mounted on horseback by his men, and so fled away and escaped. Of the winners there perished in all two hundred thirty seven fouldiers: and of them, more died in their morning flight than in the recovery of their camp. Now it chanced to that Cn, and L, both named Gavilii, new Coloners and inhabitants of Aquileia as they came with victua's, had like to have stumbled ignorantly upon the camp, when it was taken & possessed by the Istrians. They being retired back in great haste to Aquileia, leaving their carriage behind them, let all on a fright & uproar not only at Aquileia but also at Rome within few daies after: for thither was the rumour run, That not only the camp was forced by the enemies, and (which was true indeed) the Romans put to flight, but that all was loft, and thearmy utterly M defeated. Whereupon, as the manner was in all judden tumults and alarms, writs went forth for multers and levies of fouldiers extraordinarily, not in the City only, but also throughout all Italy. Two legions of Roman Cirizens were enrolled and the Latine allies were commanded to let out 10000 foot with 300 horse. M. Junius the Cos, had commandment to pass over into Gullia, and to levy of the Cities and States of that Province, as many as they were able to make and furnish, It was or dained withall, that T. Claudius the Prætor should make proclamation, that the souldiers of the fourth legion, and of the Latine allies five thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horie, should meet together at Pifa; and that in the absence of the Cos. he should defend that Province: also that M. Titinius the Prator should appoint the Rendezvouz at Ariminum; that the first legion, and the like number of allies, as well foot as horse should there assemble. Then N Nero took his journey clad in his rich coat of arms toward Pife his Province. And Titmim having to Ariminum Caius Coffius a Colonel, to take the conduct of the legion there, took musters at Rome. M. Junius the Cof, passed out of Liquria into Gaul and arrived at Aquileia, having levied aid-fouldiers as he went of all the Cities of Gaul and the Colonies, to be in readiness out of hand. There he was certified that the army was fafe and found: whereupon he dispatched his letters to Rome to advertise them that they should not trouble themselves any more in this false alarm, and himself after he had discharged the Gauls of those aids which he had imposed upon them, went to his companion in government. Great was the joy at Rome, coming thus as it did unlooked for. The musters were laid aside, the souldiers discharged who were enrolled and had taken their military oath, and the army visited with the plague at Ariminum was dismissed and sent home. The O Istrians albeit they were en amped with a great strength of armed men, not far from the Cof, his camp after they heard once that the Conful was come with a new army disbanded and flipt every man away on all fides to their feverall Cities, and the Confuls retired with their legions to Agni-

When these troubles of Isria were thus at length appealed, there went forth anaet of the Sens.

That the Coss, should agree between themselves, whether of them twain wasto return to Rome for

A for to hold the affembly for election of Magistrats, At what time as A. Licinus Nerva, and C.Paprius Turdus, two Tribunes of the Commons, in all their Orations to the people, inveighed bitterly against Mantius in his absence, and promulged a Law to this effect. That after the Ides of March (for the Coss, had their governments already proregued for one whole year) he should continue no longer in place, to the end that so soon as he was out of his office, he might presently be called to his answer judicially. Quintus Elius, one of their Collegues, with sood this bill by them proposed, and after much debate and concention prevailed so much, that it passed not.

About the same time Tib. Sen promius Gracchus, and L. Posshumius Albinus, being returned out of Spain to Rome, had audience given them by the Prator M. Tirinius in the Temple of Bellona, there to discourse of the acts by them atchieved, to demand their deserved honours, to the end B that traite and thankigiving also should be rendred to the immortall gods. Moreover, at the very same time intelligence was given by letters from T. Ebmins the Prator, which his son brought and shewed to the Senat, of great troubles in Sardinia: Namely, that the Ilians, joyning unto them the firength of the Balarishad invaded the province frauding in peaceable terms: neither was he able to make head against them with so seeble an army as he hads& the same wasted and consumed much with the pestilence. The same news related the Embassadors likewise of the Sardinians, making humble fuit to the Senat, to relieve and fuccour their Cities at least wife, for that their villages and country towns were already pail help. This embaffage, with all other matters concerning Sardinia,put over to the new Magistrats; as pitiful an embassage also was presented unto them from the Lycians, who complained grievously of the Rhodians, unto whom they had been annexed and made inbjects by L. Cornelius Scipio: "Indeed (fay they) we lived sometime under the seignory of "K. Antiochus, but that servicude of ours under the K. compared to this present state and condi-"tion wherein we now are feemed unto us an excellent liberty : for not only are we now yoaked "and kept under publike authority in generall, by taxes, levies, and impolitions, but every one in "particular endureth meer bondage and flavery. Our felves are abused, yea, and our wives and "children fuffer villanies before our eyes: upon our bodies, our backs and fides they work upon "and discharge their humour of cruelty: in our good name (an indignity unsupportable) we are "distained, depraved, and defamed: yea, openly in the face of the world, they cease not to com-"mit outrages against us, even to murp and extend their authority over us, and to try masteries "upon us with extremity: to the end that we Lycians might be put of all doubt, that there is no D" difference between us and flaves bought and fold for filver in open market. The Senat moved with these remonstrances by the Lycians addressed their letters to the Rhodiansto this effect, that it was no part of their meaning and intent, that the Lycians should be slaves to the Rhodians: or that any other born free, should be enthralled by any person: but their will was, that the Lycians should in such terms live under the government and protection of the Rhodians, that both States, the one as well as the other might range and frame themselves like good affociats under the Dominion and Empire of Rome.

After this followed two triumphs over Spain, one immediatly upon another: first, Sempronius Gracebus over the Celtiberians: and the morrow after, L. Peshamins [Livina] over the Lustanian and other Spaniards of those parts, Tib. Gracebus carried in shew 40000 pound weight to Estiver: and Albimas wenty thousand, Both of them divided among their conditiers twenty five Denarii speece, to each Centurion the same double, and trebble to every horseman. Thus did they alloby allies as well as by Romans.

It fortuned about that time, that M. Junius the Conful, came out of Istria to Rome, by occasion of the election which was to be holden; and when the two Tribunes of the Commons, Papyrim and Licinius, had in the presence of the Senat baired and wearied him with interrogatories, as touching the affairs passed in Iltria, they brought him forth also before the body of the people. "To which questions, after that the Conful had answered, how he had not been above 11 daies "in the Province: and as for the things that hapned in his ablence, he knew no otherwise than "they did, only by the common bruit and report: then they went on urging him fill, and asking "how it came to pass, that A. Manlins rather came not to Rome, to give account unto the State, "why he palled out of Ganl (which was his allotted Province)into Ifria? and to shew, when it was that either the Senat decreed, for the people of Rome granted by their voices to enterprise that war? But haply it may be faid(qd he) that albeit the war was undertaken only upon his own 'head alone: yet no doubt executed it was fight worthily with policy and valour, Nay, I wis, but fat contrativile: and hard it is to fay, whether it were begun more lewdly, than managed incon-"fidetaily. I'wo entire corps deguards were on a sudden at unawares surprized by the Istrians: the Roman camp was forced & taken, with all the strength of horse and foot that was therein: the reflicattered without arms, and the Col, himfelf was the formost man that ran away to the fea fildeanto the thips: and furely he should render an account of all these matters, when he is a privat person again, since that he should not do it being Cos. This storm past the generall assembly for the Magistrats election was holden; wherein were created Cost. C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracehus. The hext day following were the Prætors chosen: to wit, P. Elius Tuboothe lecond time, C. Quintius Flamininus, C. Numisius C. Mummius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Valerius Lavinus, The civill jurisdiction of the City fell to Tubero, the forrain to Quintius, The goreturnent of Sicily was allocted to Numifius: of Sardiniato Mummius. Howbeit, this Province by reason of the great war therein became the charge of the Cos. And by lot it fell to Gracehus:

but Istriato Claudius his Collegue. Gaul was divided into two Provinces; whereof Scipio by lot H

obtained one, and Levinus the other. Upon the Ides of March, on which day Sem pronius and Claudius entred their Confulthip, moved it was only in the Senat, as touching Sardinia and Istria, and the enemies to both those Provinces, who there had levied war. But the morrow after, the Emballadors of the Sardinians being referred over to the new Magiltrats, and L. Minutius Thermus who had been Lieurenant to the Consul Martius in Illria, entred into the Senat-house, By them the Senat was informed how dangerous the wars were in those Provinces. Moved likewise were the Senators by the embalfies of the Latine allies, who in the end were admitted into the Senat, after they had importuned the Cenfors and Confuls of the former year: the sum of their complaint was this, That their own Citizens being once enrolled at Rome, were most of them departed and removed thitherto I dwell: which it it might be suffered, within few reviews and ceffings it would come to pass, that their Cities should be dispeopled and desolat, their villages and fields desart and waste, and able to fet out no fouldiers for the wars. Semblably the Samnits and Pelignians complained, that four thousand housholds were gone from them, and retired to Fregelle; and yet neither the one nation or the other, were let at a less proportion of fouldiers in all their levies. Two cautelous means and devices there were brought up, whereby men changed thus their Cities at pleafure, The Law granted this indulgence to the allies of the Latine nation, as many as left issue of their race behind them in their house. That they should be reputed Citizens of Rome. By abusing this Law, some did injury to their allies, other wronged the people of Rome: for, both they that were to leave such issue at home, gave their children, as it were, in villenage to some Roman Citizen g or other whom they liked of; with condition to manumife and make them free, that they might be Tribes or enfranchiled Citizens, And they also who wanted issue to leave behind them, were held as Citizens of Rome. But in process of time without any of these colourable pretences of right, without regard of law and respect of issue, they crept in and had the benefit of the Burgesse and freedom of Rome, by their transmigration thither to inhabit, by enrolment in the reviews. To meet with these practites, the embassiadors craved a remedy for the time to come: as also that they would peremptorily command all their allies to repair again to their own Cities: with an express inhibition, that no man should receive any other to be his vasfall and villain, and so to alienat him, with intention by that means to change the City wherein helived: and that who soever became Citizens of Rome after that manner, should not be counted for a Citizen. These petitions were granted by the Senat. Then were decrees passed for those provinces of Isria and Sardinia which were in arms, to wit, for the enrolling of two legions into Sardinia, having either of them five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, besides twelve thousand footmen, and 600 horsemen of the Latine allies; and ten quinquiremes or galleaces, with five banks of oars, in case the Generali would warp them out of the arienall. The like number as well of the Infantry as Cavalry, was affigned for Istria. The Confuls also were enjoyeed to fend to M. Titinius in Spain; one legion with three hundred horse, besides 5000 footmen of allies, and 250

Before that the Confuls cast lots for their Provinces, certain prodigies were reported. Namely, that in the territory of Crustinmium, there fell from heaven a flone in the lake of Mars: That in M the territory of Rome, there was an infant born like a very flump, without head, feet, or hands: and a snake or serpent seen sour-looted. That in the market-place of Capua, many houses were imitten with thunderbolts and lightning. Also at Puteolitwo ships were set on fire by lightning, and burnt, Whiles these prodigious wonders were by others related, there was seen a wolf alo in the day time at Rome, which having entred at the gate Collina, after much couring and hunting, with much ado and noise of them that followed the chace, escaped away from them all, and passed through the Esquiline gate. In regard of these strange tokens, the Cost, killed greater beasts for facrifice: and for one whole day, a folemn supplication and prayers were made at all the Thrines and altars of the gods. These facrifices done and past, accordingly as it appertained, the Cofficast lots for their provinces: and to Claudius, befell Istria, to Sempronius, Sardinia.

After this, C. Claudius published a Law by vertue of an ordinance of the Senat, in favour of allies and proclaimed That these allies are all the proclaimed that the proc lies; and proclaimed. That those allies, and namely, of the Latine nation, who either themselves or their ancestors, had been enrolled mong the Latine allies, during the Censorship of Marcus Claudius, and Titus Quintins, or any time afterwards, should make return every man into his own City. before the first day of November next ensuing. And Lucius Mummiusthe Protor had in commission to enquire and fearch for those that returned not accordingly. To this Law and Edick above aid of the Conful, an act also of the Senat was adjoyned. That the Dichator, Conful, Interregent, Cenfor, and Lord chief Juffice in the Common Pleas for the time being, shoule endeavour and take order, that who foever were manumifed and made free, should take an oath. That he who manumifed or enfranchifed him, did it not with an intent, for roes 0 change the City whereinhe was: and look who would not thus sweat, him they thought not worthy to be manumited. But his charge and jurisdiction was afterwards committed to C. Chudi-

Whiles these affairs passed at Rome, M. Junius and A. Manlius, who had been Consuls the year before, having wintered in Agnileia, in the beginning of the Spring entered with an army imothe frontires of Istria. Where as they made waste and spoil far and near as they went, the A Infransentred into a commotion and took arms, rather upon grief of heart and indignation to fee their goods thus pilled and raniacked, than for any affured hope they had of their inflicience to make head against two armies. Having therefore railed a concourse of their able youth from all their Cities and States, they affembled in hafte a sudden and tumultuary army, which at the first gave battell, and fought more in heat of courage than with perfittance of resolution. In conflict there were flain of them to the number of four thousand; the rest abandoned all war, and fled here and there into their Cities. From thence they tent embaffadors first into the Roman camp to crave peace, and then the holtages which were demanded. After intelligence given at Rome of their news by the letters of the Pro-Confuls, C. Claudius the Conful fearing left this occurrence might put him by the government of his Province and the conduct of the army, without to-Rlemp prayers and vows made, without his Lictors clad in their coats of arms, departed inddeniv ingreat hafte (all of the head) by night towards his Province, and made no man privy thereto. but only his Collegue. His voyage thither was not to rath and inconfiderat, but his carriage there was more foolish and undiscreet: for being thither come, he assembled a general audience; where after he had very unfeasonably reproached Manliss for his running away out of the camp, (to the great discontentment of the fouldiers, who were the first that fied;) and with opprobrious terms (haken up M. Junius also for taking part in this diffionour with his companion: in the end he commanded them both to avoid out of the Province, Whereupon the fouldiers made anfiver again and faid, That they would then obey the Confuls commandment, when (according to the ancient custome of their fore-fathers) he had made his solemn vows within the Capitoll; Cand then taken his leave and departed out of the City, accompanied with his Ulhers in their rich coats of arms, warlike, Hereat he was so far enraged with anger, that he called upon the treaforers deputy belonging to Manlins, for chains and gyves, and menaced to lend Junius and Manlim both bound to Rome. But the deputy likewise made as little reckoning of the Consuls commandment: and the more animated he was to disobey the Consul, by reason that he was backed by the whole host round about him; who as they supported the cause of their Captains and Leaders to they hated the Contin at the heart. In conclution, the Conful being loaden and wearied with the continuelious and railing behaviour of every one in particular, and with the frumps and taunts of the multitude in general (for they fluck not over and besides to mock him and make a laughing stock of him) he went his waies again to Aquileia, in the same ship wherein he came. D From thence he wrote unto his Collegue by an Edict, to charge those new souldiers who were enrolled for Ifriasto meet at Aquileia: to the end that no business should keep him at Rome, but that with all speed he might depart from the City in his coat of arms, and after he had conceived and pronounced his vows accordingly, His companion in office was well content, and did all thele things requisit full willingly: and a short day was assigned for the assembling of the souldiers at the Rendezvouz abovenamed. But Claudius was at Rome well-near as foon as his letters; where, at his first coming, he made an Oration in the publike audience of the people, as touching the demeanor of Manlius and Junius: and having staid no longer than three daies at Rome, he set our with his Lictors formally in their coat-armour, when he had made his vows folemnly in the Capitol and so departed into his Province again with as much celerity and haste (if not more) as he

E came from thence. Some few daies before, Junius and Manlius began to affault by all forcible means the town Nefatum, into which the principall persons of the Hirians, and Epulo their King, were retired. Claudius, with his two new legions, presented himself before the town; and after se had discharged the old armies and their commanders, laid fiege unto it, and intended to force it with mandets and engins of battery. The course also of the river which ran along beside the walls, and not only empeached the affailants but yielded water unto the belieged, he diverted into another new channell, and bestowed many daies work thereabout. This mightily affrighted the barbarous people, to fee how they were cut off from water. Howbeit, they never thought of peace for al this, but fell in hand to kill their wives and children; and when they had to done (because they would F present to the view of their enemies, so horrible a fact and fearfull spectacle) they massacred them upon the walls openly in their fight, and then threw them headlong down. Whiles the filly women and poor infants (amidit their pirious and lamentable cries) were thus cruelly murdered the Roman fouldiers mounted over their walls and entred into the City. Their King when he once perceived (by the fearfull outcries of those who fled) that the town was lost; for fear he should betaken alive flabbed himself with his dagger to the heart. All the rest were either taken prisoners or killed. After this, two other towns, Mutila and Faveria, were won by affault and rafed. The pillage was greater than a man would have looked for in so poor a nation: which was beflowed every whit upon the fouldiers. Five thousand six hundred and two and thirty persons were fold our-right in port-fale under the guirland. The Captains of this war were first sourged with grods and then beheaded. Thus I fra by the ruin of three towns and the death of their King, was appealed and all the Cities and States thereof from every quarter, came in with their hostages, madesubmission and did fealty and homage to the Romans. The Idrians war was no fooner ended but the Ligurians began to complot for to take arms and enter into rebellion, T. Claudius the Pro-Cof. (who the former year had been Prætor) was governour and commander at that time of Pife with a garrifon of one legion. The Senat being advertifed thereof by his letters, thought good to lend the very same letters to C. Claudius (for the other Conful was already passed over into Sardinia:) and withall, a decree was granted out to this ef. H fect. That confidering he had performed his commission in Istria, so as there remained no more for him to do there, he should (if he thought so good) transport his army into Liguria, Moreover, pponthe Conful his letters, wherein he wrote what exploits he had atchieved in Illria, there was ordained a folemo procession for two daies together, Semblably, the other Contul Tib, Sempronius, managed his affairs as happily in Sardinia: he entred with an army into the country of the Sardinian Ilians, Great aids were come from the Balarans to relieve and inccour those Ilians; with both these nations he fought a battell in pitched field. I he enemies were discomfited and put to flight, turned out of their camp, and 12000 armed men flain. The morrow after, the Cof. commanded all their armor and weapons to be gathered together and laid on an heap; and this he burned as a facrifice to the honour of Vulcan. Which done, he retired with his victorious ar- 1 my into the affociat Cities, there to pass the winter.

The one and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

C. Claudius likewile, upon receit of the letters of T. Claudius, and the commission directed from the Senat, marched with his legions out of Istria into Ligaria: where, the enemies werecome downinto the plains, and lay encamped near the river Scultenna. In which place there was a battell fought: 15000 of them were put to the fword, and not fo few as 700 taken priloners, either in the conflict, or within the Camp ; for that also was forced and won: befides, 51 enfigns they loft, The Ligurians, as many as escaped the execution, fled on all sides to the mountains for refuge; and notwithstanding that the Consul spoiled and wasted their champain country, there was not one man made shew of arms. Thus Claudius having in one year vanquished and subdued two nations, and in one Confulfhip (a rare felicity in any other man) reduced other two Provinces into K

quietness and peace, returned to Rome.

Certain prodigious and monitrous fights were that year reported, to wit, in the territory of Crustumium, a certain foul, called Sangualia, with her bill pierced into a facred stone. In Campain a Beel foake: at Syracufa a bull that straied out of the fields from the herd, lept the brazencow there in the City, and did his kind. In the territory of Crustumium, there was a supplication and procession holden one day long in the very place of the foresaid prodigious sign. In Campain, the beefor cow alorefaid, was put out to be kept and fed at the charges of the City. Last of all the prodigy of Syracufa, was expiat by a purgatory facrifice, by direction from the foothfaiers to what gods, upplications & facrifice should be made. That year died M. Claudius Marcellus the Bishop, who had been Coff, and Cenfor, In his flead M. Marce dus his fon was confectated Bishop, Like I wise in the same year there was a Colony of 2000 Citizens of Rome planted at Luca. The Triumvirs or the Commissioners who had the conduct and placing of them, were P. Elius, L. Egilius, and Cn. Sicinius: one and fifty acres of land and an half was fet out for them apiece to occupy, out of the territory late conquered from the Ligurians, and which had been sometime the possession of the Tuscans before it was holden by the Ligurians.

Then came the Conful C. Clandins to the City of Rome, where after he had discoursed before the Senat, as touching the prosperous execution of his affairs, as well in Istria as Liguria, & thereupon demanded a triumph, he foon obtained that honour; and during his Magistracy triumphed at once over those two nations. In which solemnity of his triumph, he carried in shew 307000 Deniers and * 85702 Victoriats. He gave to every common [Roman] fouldier fifteen Denarii a- M peece, adouble proportion to the Centurions, and thrice as much to every horieman. But upon the allies he bestowed less by the one moity than to natural Civizens: and therefore as they followed his charit, they were filent and faid never a word: a man that had feen them would have faid they were malecontent.

Duinarius.

During the time of this triumph, the Ligurians perceiving that not only the Conful his army was brought home to Rome but the legion also at Psedischarged by T. Claudius: thinking nowall fear past and overblown, secretly levied a power; and having passed over the cross frontiers, by traverling the woies through the muontains, descended into the downs, and wasted the demains of Modena and by sudden assault surprised the very Colony. The news hereof was no sooner arrired at Rome, but the Senat commanded C. Clandins the Conful to hold the high Court for the lo- N lemn election, with all convenient speed that so soon as new annual Magustrates were created, he might return into his Province, and perforce recover this Colony out of their hands. Soaccoreing to the advice and ordinance of the Senat the faid affembly was holden: wherein wereclected Confuls Co. Cornelius Scipio Hifpalus, and Q. Petilius Spurinus. Then were the Praton afterwards cholen, to wit, M. Popilius Lenas, P. Licinius Craffus, M. Cornelius Scipio, L. Paprius Mofo. M. Alburius, and L. Aquilius Gallus. The Conful C. Clandius had his Patent fealed again for one year longer, to continue in command of the army, and government of the Province Gallia. And for fear left the Ilitrians likewife should follow the example of the Ligurians, he had commission to send those alies of the Latine nation, whom he had brought out of his Province for to tolemnize his triumph.

Upon that very day, on which the Confuls, Cneus Cornelius and Quimas Petilius entered their Magistracy, and sacrificed each of them an oxe as the manner was, in the honour of Jupiter In that beast which & Perilin cansed to be slain, theliver was found headless. When he had reported this accident unto the Senat, he was enjoyeed to facrifice another beef for to appeale the with of the gods. Moved then it was in the Senathouse as concerning the Provinces, and adecree paffed that both Confuls should be sent to Pife, and against the Ligurians : but order was given, a that whether of themhad the charge of Pife allotted unto him, he should (when the time came) pair to Rome against the election of yearly Maguirrats. Moreover, there was another branch of this decree, that either of them should enroll two new legions, and three hundred horsemen, and levy of the Larine alliesten thousand foot apiece, and fix hundred horse, And T. Claudius continued till in full command, untill such time as the Contul was arrived in his Province. Whiles these matters were thus debated and passed in the Councill-House, Cn. Cornelius was called forth by a beiliff or Usher. And within a while after he was gone out of the Temple, he returned thither again with an heavy and difmaied countenance, and declared unto the LL of the Senat that the liver of that one which he also had killed for facrifice, a beast of fix years old and well liking, was confirmed and come to nothing; and when he hardly beleeved the Minister attending upon the a facrifice who told him hereof, that himfelf cauled the water to be poured forth of the pot wherein the tripes and inwards were fodden, where he faw the rest of the tripes and entrales full and whole but all the liver wasted away, after a wonderful and miraculous manner, not to be spoken. The LL, were much terrified and amazed at this prodigious object: and the more perplexed were they, for that the other Conful likewise related unto them, how in regard that in his facrifice the liver wanted an head, he had killed three oven more, one after another, and yet could not procure the favour and grace of the gods. Hereupon the Senat commanded him still to facrifice these greater beates, untill such time as he had his desite, and the gods were pleased again. Now it is laid, that all the other gods were well enough contented, and their ire mitigated and appealed, only the goddes * Sains, Petilius could not be reconciled unto, for all that ever he might do. Then *Health. Cthe Coff, and Prators committed the disposition of their Provinces to the arbitrement of the lots, Pifefell to Cornelius, and Liguria to Petilius, As for the Prators, L. Papyrius Majo was Lord chief Inflice by lot appointed, within the City of all Citizens pleas, and M. Aburius had the jurisdiction over strangers: M. Cornelius Scipio Malaginensis had the charge to govern the lower Spain, and La Aquilius Gallus, Sicily. The two Practors behind, requested earnestly that they might not be fent into their Provinces, and namely, M. Popilius into Sardinia: alledging, that Gracehus was able to quiet that Island; and the rather, for that T. Ebutius the Prator was by the Senat adjoyned to him for affiftance: neither was it good to interrupt courses begun, the continuity whereof is the most effectuall means to exploit any great important affairs. For what with delivering up the (word by the old L. Deputy, and receiving it by the new successor (whom it were D more mess first to be trained up in knowledge of the State, than to be put to the managing of State-matters) oftentimes the good opportunities of archieving brave enterprises pass by and are loft. This excuse of Popilius was held for good, and so approved. Then comes P. Licinius Craffus, and he for his part made allegations why he might not go into his Province: namely, by occasion of the foleum facrifice, that he was to give his attendance upon. Now the higher part of Spain was allotted unto him. But commanded was he either to go into his Province, or else to take oath in a frequent and full affembly of the people, that the folemn factifice (as he pretended) was the thing that his dered him, and nothing elle. This order being fet down and thus passed in the behalf of P. Licinius: then flep's me up M. Cornelius, and required them to take an oath of him likewife, that he might not go into the nether Province of Spain, So both these Prators were p worn according to one and the same form of oath. Whereupon M. Titinius and T. Fonteins were commanded to remain in quality and place of Pro-Confuls within Spain, and retain fill the fame authority and power of command: and order was granted, that for to supply their forces, there should be fent unto them three thousand Citizens of Rome with two hundred horse, and also five thousand L atine allies, and three hundred horsemen, The folemnity, of the Latine holydaies began the "third day before the Nones of May: where- " 4.0f May in, because at the facrificing of one beaft the Magistrate of Lanwinm in his prayer left out these words [Populi Romani Quiricians] and prayed not for the good effate of the people of Rome, and the Quirits, it bred a scruple. The matter was moved in the Senat, and the Senat referred it over to the Colledge of the Bishops and Prelate of the Church, And they pronounced this award, That Foralmuch as those Latine feasts were not solemnized as they ought, they should begin again anew: and that the Citizens of Languism, by whole default they were thus to be renewed should be at the charges of all the beatts for factifice. Moreover, to breed more fearful icrupulofity in mens minds, it fortuned that Cares Cornelist the Conful as he returned from that folemnity out of the Alban mountain fell down in a fit of Apoplexy : which turned into an Hemiplegia or dead pilicall the one fide of his body, and to be was conveyed to the bath and hot waters at Cumes: where by occasion that his disease grew upon him still, he departed this life; from whence he was brought to Rome, and there carried forth, in all magnificence of funerall obsequies, and tight honourably interred He had been Bishop also as well as Conful. Q. Perelius the other Conful being commanded to hold an affembly for the furrogation of a Collegue unto him, (to foon as possie by he might be warranted by the suffices and approbation of the lacred birds) and withall, to eby he might be warranted by the suffices and approbation of the lacred birds) and withall, to proclaim and publish the Latine feel summoned the election against the third day before the Nones of Sexilis: and the Latine folemnity, the third day likewife beforethe * Ides of the fame month.

Whiles mens minds were much policifed already with religion, and fet upon their devotions, word was brought moreover of certain fearfull prodigies: to wit, hat at Tufculum there was ten a burning flame in thesakys, that at Gakes, the Temple of Apollo, and many privatemens houses: likewise at Gravisca the town wall and one of the gates were smitten with thunderbolts, H For the procuration whereof, the LL, of the Senat ordained that the Bishops should give order

according to their discretion. Whiles the Coniuls were thus staid, first both, by their own scrupulous holiness; then one of them by the death of the other; and afterwards by occasion of the new election and therenewing of the Latine feltivall solemnity: C. Clandins in the mean time approached with his armyto Modena, which the Ligurians the year before had won. He had not continued the fiege full three daies, but he forced the Colony: and having thus recovered it from the enemies, he reflored it again to the former inhabitants. Eight thousand Ligurians died there within the walls upon the fword : and immediatly he dispatched his letters to Rome, wherein he not only declared the simple news but glorified him and made his boatt, That through his fortitude and fortune, I both the Romans had not an enemy that durst shew his head on this fide the Alps; and that he had conquered so much land as might serve for to be divided by the poll, among many thousands. Tib, Sempronius likewise at the same time, fought many fortunat battels in Sardinia, and utterly tamed and subdued the Islanders: 15000 enemies he there slew: all the States of that nation which had revolted, were reduced to obedience under the people of Rome: the old tributaries had an imposition and exaction laid upon them of a double tribute, which they surely paid the reft were put to a contribution of corn. After he had fet the Province in quietness, and received out of the whole Island two hundred and thirty hottages, he fent certain Lieutenants as messengers to make report at Rome of all his proceedings: who also in his behalf should make suit unto the Senat, That in regard of the happy success in those exploits under the charge conduct, and some R of Tib. Sempronius, first, due honour, praise, and thanksgiving might be rendred to the immortali gods; and then, that himself might be allowed at his departure out of the Province, to bring away his army with him. The Senat gave audience to the messengers above aid within the Temple of Apollo: and upon their relation ordained a generall procession for two daies: commanding the Coff. to facrifice 40 head of greater beafts: and withall, enjoyned Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Conful to continue that year with his army in that Province. Then the election which had been published against the third day before the Nones of Sextilis for the substitution of one of the Coss. "The third of was the same day accomplished. And Q. Petilius the Cos, created for his Collegue, M. Valerius Lavinus, for to enter immediatly into his Magistracy. This Lavinus had been a long time desirous to be employed in some Province or other; and fitly it fell out for his longing defire that letters L came importing how the Ligurians rebelled and were gone out again in arms. So after he once heard the contents of these letters, he made no longer flay, but upon the very * Nones of Sextilis all goodly to be seen in his warriors coat of arms, he commanded the third legion (by occasion of this alarm) to go into France, to C. Claudius the Pro-Conful: also the Dunmvirs or two wardens for the ports and navy to go to sea, and with a fleet to make fail for Pifa. & from thence to coast about all Liguria, and thus by hovering upon the seas, to tertific the enemies that way alfo. Q. Petilius likewise the Cos, had appointed a day for his army to meet in the same place. Moreover, C.Claudens the Pro-Conful, advertised of the Ligurians revolt, over and besides those forces which he had about him at Parma, levied in hafte a firength of more fouldiers; and fo with his compleat army approached the borders of the Ligurians. The enomies upon the arrival of C. M Claudius by whole conduct they well remembred how late they had been discomfitted and put to flight near the river Scultenna, minding to feek for defence rather by the strength of advantagious places than force of arms, against that power of his which to their cost they had before tried, feized the two hils, * Letus and Baliffa, about which they raifed a mure also for their better safe-* L'Alpi del ty. But such as lagged behind and quit the champain plaines and lower grounds with the lates, were imprised and cut fhort, to the number of fifteen hundred. The rest kept within the mountains: who albeit they were in fear and danger of their own parts; yet forgot not their inbred cuelty; but ran upon the booties and prizes which they had taken at Modena, their poor prisoners whom they held captive they pitiously mangled, and killed most villamously: as for the beasts in the Temples every where they rather hacked, hewed, and cut in peeces butcher like, than facrifi- N ced in decent seemly, and religious manner. Thus being fatisfied with the bloud and maffacre of living creatures, they took all their breathless things they had, and reared and fluck them upon the wals; and namely, implements of all forts, made rather for nie and necessity than ornament and thew. Q. Petil us the Conful, for fear left the war would be ended in his absence, disparched his letters to M. Claudius, to haste away with his army into France, for he would attend his coming upon the plains called Macri, Upon the receit of which letters; Claudius dislodged out of Liguria, and delivered unto the Conful his army at the faid plains called Matri. Few daies after came Cains Valerius the other Conful thither alfo. There they divided their forces, and before they departed one from the other, they both together made a stirvey and review of their severall armies. This done, they cast lots into what quartersthey should either of them go, for that they O held it not good policy to charge the enemy both of them joyntly in one part. Now certain it is, that Valerius received his lot according to the anipices, in that he was within the precinct of the Temple or prospect by the Augur assigned. But Petilim herein made default (asthe Augurs

pronounced afterwards and namely the error was herein, because he being himself without the compais aforefaid, had put the lot into the casket, Which was carried afterwards within the citcuit of the faid Temple. This done, they went into divers quarters Petilihis encamped affront that bank and rifing of the hill between Balifia and Letus, which by a continual ridge uniteth and joyneth the one mountain to the other. There, as he was exhorting his fouldiers in open audience, he letfall (by report) an ominous word, prefaging his own death, never thinking of the ambiguity and duple construction thereofilaying that he would that very day * capere Letum, In two feverty and unperconduction of the hills. That regiment whereinhe was himself, advanced thus written applaces at once he beganto mount up the hills. That regiment whereinhe was himself, advanced thus written forward couragionfly: but the other was repulsed and beaten back by the enemies: whereupon with a capital the Conful rode full gallop to help that fide which went down; and in very truth reclaim his men L. fignifieth, the Commission lining among the micholic without good regard of his own person he kept before the hill Letter; but entiges in the forefront, he chanced to be shot through with a darr, and so fell down dead in the with the lide place. Now besides this evident issue and event which sell out upon so * Paterius Maheavy and deadly a prelage by the * omen aforefaid, the pulletier also was heard to say, that all simus reporwasnot well in the autipices of the birds; neither was the Conful himself ignorant thereof.

For which exploits atchieved in France and Liguria, under the conduct and happy fortune of the two Confuls, the Senate ordained that there should be publick procession for three dates, and commanded to facrifice forty greater beafts. And thus verily the tumultuous wars of the Fren. h and the Ligurians, which arole in the beginning of the year, were inshort time and without any great mastry dashed and appealed.

But now in lieu thereof, great care was taken for the Macedonian war, by occasion that Perfeus fowed the feeds of debate and quarrel between the Dardanians and the Bastarnians. Besides, the Roman Embaffadors who were fent into Macedan, to fee in what terms things there flood were now returned to Rome, and had brought word, That in Dardania they were up in arms. With them there came also from King Perfeut certain Orators to make excuse in his behalf, and to cleer him in the action, namely, that the Bastarnians neither were by him sent for nor entred into any execution by his motive. The Senat would neither acquit the King as unguilty, nor yet directly paccule himras culpable in that point. Only they required, that he should be advertised and admonified, to be very well advised and careful to keep that league and accord inviolable, which he would feem to entertain with the Romans.

The Dardanians feeing that the Baffarra were to far off from departing out of their countrey (asthey well hoped they would) that they endamaged and endangered them fill every day more than other, as bearing themselves bold upon the succours of the Thracians neer neighbours, and the Secretifes; thought it their best course in policy, to adventure upon some hardy enterprise, although it were rath and inconfiderate: whereupon they affembled all in arms, and from every quantit of their countrey shewed and advanced before the next Town, to the camp of the Bastarnians. Winter time it was, a leafon of the year which they made choice of, that the Thracians and the Secretifes might be retired home into their own countries: which when they were advertised of, and that there remained none but the Bastarna alone, they divided their forces in two parts: with the one-to march directly forward and openly to make head against them affront; with the other, to fetch a compass through by-waies and blind forrests, and foto charge upon their backs. But before they could wheel about the enemies camp, the battail was begun: wherein the Dardamians had the overthrow, and were driven to pur themselves within their City, which was almost (we've miles diffant from the camp of the Baffarne. The conquerors followed the train of victory, and incontinently invested the Town, making full account, that the next day either the enemies H would yeeld, or elle they should be able to win the place by mere force. In the mean time, the other regiment abovelaid of the Dardanians, which cast about, knowing nothing at al of their sellows delear, began to affail the camp of the Baftarnians, left without a fufficient guard for defence

* As the manner of the Kings was he fate in a stately throne of Ivory to hear pleas and decide controversies of the smallest and most trisling matters. So transported was he and caried away with an humor of levity and ipirit of inconflancy, so diffracted & wandering in all the course of his life, that he was never fettled and well contented in any condition or flate what foce er : in fuch fort, as neither he knew his own felf, nor any man elfe wift well what to make of him. He would not teem to speak unto his friends, and hardly was seen to laugh familiarly among those of his neerest acquaintance. He made a fool of himself, and mocked others likewife; such was his in- I ordinate and irregular munificence. To men of honor flanding highly upon their worth and reputation, his manner was to bestow childish trifles, as sugar-plums to eat or to play withal, toyes and gewgawes inflead of great and pretious prefents: others again that looked for nothing those he geniched. And therefore some deemed, that he knew not what he did: others gave it out that he did all in plain mockage, and there were again that let not to fay, how he was out of his right wits, and clean besides himself. Yet in two things, which were both great and laudable, he carried with him a Princely and Royal mind indeeds to wit, in adoming Cities with stately gifts, and honouring the Gods with divine worthip. He promited the Megapolitans in Arcadia to raise a wall about their City; and in truth the better part of the money to defray the charges thereof, he lent unto them. He went in hand to build a magnificent Theatre of marble at Tegea: at Cizicum, he K gave freely to the Prytaneum (a fair hall by it felf in the heart of the City, where at the common charges, certain had their diet offree-coft) by way of honourable reward, a cupbord of golden plate sufficient for the surniture and service of one table, As for the Rhodians, I cannot say, what one special gift singular above the rest, he bestowed upon them; so liberally minded was he to them-ward and his hand ever open to give them of all forts what foever they needed or required, Now, his magnificence in honoring the Gods, what it was (if there were nothing else) the Temple of Inpiter Olympius begun by him in Athens (to answerable every way to the Majesty of that great God, that the like to it is not to be found again in the whole world) may tellify inficiently. Moreovet, he beautified Delos with goodly fea-enfigns, and with a great number of flaturs and images, Likewife he promised to edity at Antiochia, a stately Temple in the honor of Supiter Capi- L talinus; not only arched above-head with a golden embowed roof, but feeled all over the wall fides with plates of gold: besides many other things in divers places, which by reason that he reigned but a very short time, he could not finish and perform. In magnificence also of playes, publick shews, and pageants of every fort, he over-went all the Kings his progenitors before him, as well in regard of Grecian actors and gametiers, whereof he had many about him, as of the reft who were acquainted with the fathions of his own countrey. He represented the fight of sword players at the sharp with unrebated swords, after the custome of the Romans; with greater terror and sear at first, than pleasure and delight of men, who were not used to behold such fights; but afterwards by often exhibiting the fame, in fuch manner, as sometime they drew blood one of another, yea, and otherwhiles gave not over to, but fought to the uttermost, even to death, he made it a familiar M exercise & a pleasant spectacleto the eye; and thereby set an edge upon the courage of many you gallants, and emboldned them to embrace chivalry and follow feats of arms. So as in process of time, he that was wont at the beginning to fend as far as Rome for these fensers, and to hire them for great wages and reward, now with his own * L. Cornelius Scipio (had the juridicities on) over forrainers. To M. Astilius the Pretor, the government of Sardinia by lot was fallen, but he was enjoyned to pass over into Corfica with the new legion which the Confuls had enrolled, confifting of 5000 foot and 300 horfe. And during the time that he should be employed there in the wars. Cornelius had commission to continue in his charge and place of command, within Sardinia. Unto Cn. Servilius Capio for low Spain, & P. Furius Philus for the higher, were affigned 3000 Roman footmen and an 150 horfe; but of Latine allies, 5000 of the one and 300 of the other. N As for I. Claudius, he was appointed to Sicily without any supply at all, Moreover, the Consuls had commandment to enrol two legions befides, with the full number as well of foot as horse and to charge the [Latine] allies, with the fetting out and maintenance of a 1000 footmen & 600 horle. This levy and taking of musters, the Consuls went through with, in more difficulty, by reason of a great mortality, which beginning the year before with a murrein of kine & oxen, turned this year into petilent epidemical difeates of men. Look who fell fick once, lightly they died before the feventh day: and those that overlived and escaped that crifit, lay long fick by it, and commonly of the quarran ague. The most that went of this malady were slaves, whose breathless carkasses lay ordinarily along every fireet unburied: and more than that, * men were not able to inter to much as the dead bodies of free perions they died to thick; in fuch fort, as they putrified and rotted 2-0 bove ground: for neither hungry dog nor greedy gripe, would once touch them, And for certain it was known and noted, that neither all that year nor in the former, during the morrality of man and beatt, there was not a vultur or gripe any, where to be feen. Divers Prelats and Priests of State dropt away of this plague, and namely, Cn, Servilius Capto a Bishop, the father of the Pretor: Tib. Sempronius Longus the ion of Titus one of the Decemvirs for facreed rices and divine fervice: P. Elins Patus the Augur: Tib Sempronius Gracebus, C. Atteliur Emplisis the chief superintendent of all the parish-priests, and M. Semp, Tuditand's Bishop. These were sublituted Bishops in place of the dead to wit, C. Sulpitini Galba in flead of Tuditanus. * . For Augurs were subordained. T. Veturius Craffus Sempronianus in the room of Gracebui Q. Elius Patus for P. Elius. Decemvirs over holy rices were elected, C. Semp, Longues and C. Scribonus furnamed Curio, Supplied the want of the grand superimendant aforesaid. Still continued the pellilence; wherepon the Senat ordained, That the Decemvirs thould have recourse to the books of Sibylla: by whose order and direction, publick inpplications held for one day long: and after a devour manner, the people conceived and made a folemn vow in the common place, according to that form of words which Q. Martius Philippus indited and prompted unto them to this effect: That if this malady and pettilent difeale, were removed out of the territory of Rome, they would for two daies space solemnize a feast go in procession and pour out their prayers with all devotion. In the Veientian countrey a manchild was born with two heads; and another at Sinneff a but with one hand. At Oximum a'maid child came into the world with teeth in the head and over the Temple of Saturn (flanding in the market place of Rome) there was feen in the skie a bow full bent all the day long, if the air were cleer and the weather fair: and at one time there shone out three suns. Also in one night, there evidently appeared many flaming lights and fire drakes shooting along in the air. The men of Lanuvium and Care affirmed plainly, That within their Town they faw a Serpent with a creft and mane, yea, and the fame marked all over with yellow spots like gold: and it was held for certain that in the territory of Capua an oxe spake.

Now were the Embaffadors returned out of Affrick by the * Nones of June, those I mean who went to Carthage, after they had been with King af mif , and fooken with him. But better & more certain intelligence they had by this King than from the Carthaginian themselves as touching the affairs that had passed in Caribage. Howbeit, thus much they reported upon their assured knowledge, that Embafiadors came from King Perfeus, and had audience in the Senat fecretly by night within the Temple of Afculopius. Also both the King affirmed flatly, and the Carthaginians themselves but faintly denied that Embassadors ükewise had been sent from Carthage into Mana don, Whereupon the Senat was of advice and refolved to dispatch their Embass, also into Macedony. And thefe three were lent, to wit C. Latius, M.V. lerius Meffala, and Sext. Digitius.

During this time, Perfeus, by occasion that certain Dolopian's offeied him not, and of some materials ters incontroverfy and difference referred the audience and decision to the Romans, and refused the arbitrement of the King led forth an army against them, and reduced the whole nation under his obedience and jurisdiction. From thence he passed over the Oetwan mountains, and upon certain religious motions arising in his mind the went up to Delphos for to visit the Oracle. Being thus on a suddain seen in the very heart and midt of Greece, he struck a terror not only into the cities next adjoining, but also the bruit of this tumultuous alarm was blown as far as to K. Eumenes, After hehad staied at Delphi nor above 3 daies he returned into his own realm, by the way of Phthiotis, Achaia and The flats, without any dammage done or wrong offered to the territories through which he passed. Neither thought he it sufficient thus only to win the love and favor of those Cities & flates through which he was to journey, but he addressed either Embasse ors or wrote his letters, praying them to bear no longer in mind the comities which had been between them and his father, for a smuch as they were not so bitter and deadly but they might well enough, yea, and ought to end and die with him: as for himself, he saw no let or hindrance in the world to empeach them for entertaining a faithful amity with him. But above all others he fought means to be reconciled to the Achaans, and to reenter into grace and favor with them. This nation alone of all Greece, together with the City of Athem, were grown into those terms of despight and malice against the Macedonians, that they debarred them from once setting foot within their confines. And hereupon it came that when certain flaves fled out of Achan, they retired into Micedony for refuge, and there remained: and because the Acharans had forbidden the Macedonians to come within their liberties, they durit not likewise for their parts enter into the marches and frontiers of his Kingdom to recover their bondmen. Which when Parfeus perceived he cansed all those sugiptive flaves to apprehended, and he dispatched his letters unto the Achæans, wherein he wrote, That he would right courteoully fend back their flaves home again, although they were run away from them unto him; advertising and advising them to beware and look well unto it, that there were no more any such escapes and runnings away of their bond servants hereaster. When these esters were read by Kenarchus their Pretor, who fought to curry some favor and to wind himself intograce with the King most of them that were present judged the letters to have been written right gracionsly and with great government and moderation, but principally those persons, who beyond their hope were to recover and receive their flaves whom they had loft. But Callicrates one of them who were fully perlivaded, that the fafety of their whole effate depended upon the loiall observance and inviolable maintenance of the accord contracted with the Romans, spake thus or to this effectfollowing, " It may feem to some here (qd, he) my masters of Achea, that we The oration of are in question ar this present of a fmall matter and of mean importance: but I for my part am Callicrates the "Of opinion, that we are not now in hand to treat but have already debated, and after a fort con- Achaan. The one and fortieth Book of T. Livius. " of them, the hearts of some among us might be sollicited and tempted to novelty and alteration we now are content to hear the King although ablent in perion, preaching in iome for to st us, yea, and more than that (God fend us good inck) approve and appland his Oration. And H es. whereas the very wild beafts refuse (for the most part) the meat which is laid for a bait to de-" ceive and hurt them, yea, and have the witto thun and avoid the fame; we, bind beetles that we stare, juffer our felves to be caught and fed with the vain apparence and colorable flew of a little "kindness, and for hope to recover tome poor slaves (a matter of small worth & reckoning) suffer "our own reedom to be undermined, and in danger of subvertion. For who seeth not, that the " overture is made, and the way laid open to rentrance into confederacy with the King, only to of violate and break ou affociation with the Romans, wherin standeth all our weal and weifare? Winless some man peradventure wil make a question, whether the Romans must levy waragainst I Se Perfemis no doubt therof now after Philip is dead which in his life time was expected and by 66 his death only interrupted? Two fons, ye know full well, K. Phil p had, Demetrius and Perfeut. se For noblenels of parentage by the mothers fide for verme, for wir, for the love and affection of "the Macedonians, Demetriut far furpaffed his brother. But for that the father intended ever & se meant, that whether of his two fons hated the Romans, he should have the crown after him for " recompence he canfed Demetrias to be murdered for no other crime in the world that could be & laid to his charge, fave only that he was entred into amity with the Romans: but Perfem he " made the King, whom he knew that the people of Rome judged more worthy to infler punishment than to inherit a Kingdom, And this Perfeus, what other thing hath he done elle afterhis "fathers de ease, but made preparation for war. First and formost, he projured the Bastarnians, to K the terror of al the world for to invade * Da danies who if they had settled there, Greece should the had more troubletome neighbors of them than Affa hath of the Galatians. And albeit he a gervie, 18 fome think. " was disappointed of this hope yet he gave not over to delign and plot for war; nay, if we will er fpeak a truth he hath already begun the war. Dolep at e hath subdued by force of arms & could of not abide to hear that the determination of certain provinces which were debatable and littec gions, should be referred to the award of the people of Rome. From thence having passed over the mountain O. tasthat all upon a fuddainhe might thew himself in the very centre of Greece, the ascended up to Delphi. And to what end, think ye, hath he taken this diswonted volage and of that cultomed expedition? After this he made his p. ogress all over Theff ly: And what it he anes noied and hurt none of them all, whom he hated in his heart ? I fear me to much the more this I. manner of dealing, and that it is a bart to catch them withal. Then for footh, he fendeth his letters "unto us, with a goodly shew of a bon-present, and willethus to think efficient how to prevent of from henceforth, that we never had need again of the like bounty of his, What is that, but to Ganul and repeal that edict of ours, wherin the Macedonians are debarred from fetting foot withto in * Peloponnessus? and to bring about, that we may have again the Kings Embassadors to come a unto us, that we may entertain mutual hospitality between their Princes and ours ? and anon et after, see the Magedonian armies, yea, and the King also in person to cross from Delphi(for a lmal sam of the Sea lieth hetween) (treight over into Peloponne Just and finally, that we band and com-" bine with the Macedonians, when they shall take arms against the Romans? As for me, this is mine advice, to make no new ordinance, but to let all alone in their entire order, as they now M 'Rand until such time as we are come to some certain terms. Whether we have cause to be assaid, or fear only our own shadows? If the league shal continue firm and sure between the Romans & the Macedonians, then may we have entercourfe of friendship, of commerce and traffick with them. But for this present to think & consider hereof in my simple judgment, is a nice and tick-" lish point & besides, out of season untimely and some what with the soonest. When he had thus "faid, Arco brother to Xenarchus the Pretor discoursed in this manner following. " Callicrates (qd,he)hath caused both me and all of us befides, who are of contrary opinion to him for tofind, of the more difficulty in speaking our minds to the cause in question. For whiles in maintenance 6 of the affortation which we have with the Romans, he faith that it is diffurbed and troubled, "(albeit there be no man about either to diffurb or trouble it) he hath wrought cunningly and N of contrived, that who loever feemeth to gainfay him, may be thought to oppose and fet himselfaes gainst the Romans. In the first place, as if he had been a man, not converting here among us but 66 one come irom the Senat of Rome or some inward secretary and of the privy councel to the KK. he knoweth forfooth and uttereth all that in great fecreey hath been done, Nay, he foretelleth "Ike a wife man, what would have enfued, in cafe Philip had lived longer. & namely, how it came s about that Pe fess thus inherited the crown: what the Macedonian defigns are: and what the "Romans intend to do But we, who know neither for what cause nor in what manner Demetrian " came by his death not yet what Philip meant to have done if he had lived fill, must accommo-"dat & frame our cc unfel to those occurrents which have openly passed in the view of the world. "We take knowledge, that Perfeus, after he was invested in his throne and crowned King, repair of "ed to the Roman Embassadors ; and we know likewise that he was intituled by the people of " Rome with the flyle of (King Perfens.) We hear befides, that Roman Embaffadors came to the "King, and were by him well received and graclously entertained. It I have any judgment, these "be all igns of peace and not of war neither can the Romans take offence, if, as we followed them when they bare arms fo we follow them now likewile, as the authors of peace. And verly I fee

"when they bare arms to we follow them now likewile, as the authors of peace, they was a no reason why we alone of all other Greeks, thould make to moral and inexpiable war against the they be no reason why we alone of all other Greeks, thould make to moral and inexpiable war against the they be not all other they be not all oth

" the realm of Macedony. What! is it because we are to neer unto the Macedonians, and by that "vicinity exposed to all dangers from thence? or that we are the weakest of all the rest, and like to "the Dolopians, whom Perfess of late hath fubdued? Nay I wis, it is far otherwise and clean cona trary. Sure enough we are for any harm they can do us, in regard either of our own forces (which 4 the Gods of their goodness have vouchlafed us) or of the distance of place fo far remote. But si fe case we be as much subject as the Thefialians and Ætolians: Say, we are of no more credit and stauthority among the Romans (albeit we have been atwaies their affociats and friends) than the " Etolians be, who were their open enemies but the other day: Then, what right, what privileds stand commerce, the Ætolians, the Theffalians, the Epirots, and in one word all Grecce bender, " have and use with the Macedonians, we also may have and hold the same, How is it then, that we B " alone like cursed and damned creatures, should thus practise to abandon the common law of "men, and (as it were) renounce all human fociety, Be it that Philip (when time was) did fomea what, and gave us just cause, armed as he was and ever warring upon us to pass this decree and "edict against him: what hath Perfeus deterved? Perfeus (I fay) the new King a harmless Prince that unever did us injury; nay, who is willing and teeketh by courtefies and good turns to cancel and " rafe out all former quarrels and enmities of his father? why are we the only enemies that he "hath in the world? And yet, I might full well & truly fay that from the former Kings of Macedony "we have received to great favors and benefits, that in regard thereof we should put up and forse get the wrongs of Philip alone (if haply he have done us any) at least wile now after he is dead "and his head laid. Indeed, at what time as the Roman fleet rid in the harbor of Cenchrea, and the Ca Conful lay encamped with his army before Elatia, we fat in councel three dates together, deba-"ting and devising, Whether we should band with the Romans or side with Ph I p. And albeit the " prejent fear of the Romans before our eies, might have made us in our opinions to encline "lomewhat and lean toward them: yet there was something in it doubtless, that it was so long ere " we could refolve; and to fay a truth, it was the ancient acquaintance and am ty that we had with "the Macedonians, and the great benefits which in old time we had received from their Kings, "Why then me thinks, those self same regards should be of some force and efficacy to move us if ont to be their special and best friends, yet at least wife not to be their principal and greatest ene-" mies, Let us not, Callierates, make semblance and shew of that which we are not in hand with-"alland is no point of this pretent question. There is no motive made of a new today's there is D " no períon about to draw any capitulations of a new alliance; wherein we should rashly enwrap "and entangle our felves, and be tied to any inconvenience. Only let there be a mounal commer e "between us, and an alternative intercourse of yeelding and demanding right to and tro, as ap-" pertainethilet us not by interdicting and forbidding them to enter and traffi k within our coun-"try debar our felves likewife from all negotiation and dearing with them in their Kingdom that "by this means our flaves may have no place of retreat and tefuge to flie unto. And what preju-"dice is this to the Roman confederacy? Wherlore make we thus of a small thing and evident, for " great a matter and fulpicious? Wherfore raife we fuch troubles of nothing? Wher one fiek wero "draw others into jeloufy and hatred with the Romans and all this to find means of courting &c "flattering them: If there will be war, Perfeus (ye may be ture) maketh no doubt but that we alto-E "gether will follow the Romans: yet to long as the peace holder in furreste and inspend we in some " for our malice and hatred for the while; if ended for ever it may not be. When the same men who had confented to the Kings letters before, gave their accord now also to this proposes tile chief and principal persons among them took great indignation and distain that P of as should feem to demand and obtain that by a few lines in writing which he deemed was not worth the lending an embassage. Whereupon the time was deterred and no decree p fled at this Session, Alterwards were Embaffadors addreffed untouthem from the King, at what time as a Diet was holden in Megalopolis : but the fide which was for the Romans and leared to give them occasion of dipleasure and offence, did what they could to debar them of access and entrance into the Conncel, And much about this time, by reason of these jars the Ætolians grew enraged among themkives, and by discharging their mutual fury in killing one another, had like to have becught the flatetoa final ruin and desolation. But being weary thereof, they in the end as well of the one nde is theother, sent their Embassadors to Rome, and also laboured at home to have the quirre taken spand to be made friends and reconciled together. Howbeit this was croffed by a new mischief that came between, which also rubbed the former galls and freited the old fores. For whereas certain Hypateans, exiled persons, and being of the laction of Proxenus, were promited liberty to riwith home again into their country, with fafe conduct also granted by Eupole nurone of the thie & principal men of the City : fo it was, that four core of them, men of mark and quality whom to merupon the way as they returned, Eupolemus himself went our with the multitude) after they had been friendly received with courteous greetings, falutations, and shaking of hands, had no Glooper entred within the gare of the City, but they were maffacred not withfranding they pleaded the faithful promile of protection and called the Gods to witness, but all in vain, Bethis occasion the civil war bet ween them waxed much hotter than before, and turned in the end to a light fire, Now there arrived C. Valerius Lavinus. Ap, Claudius Pulcher, C. Memmine, M. Popilius and I. Came time, as fent from the Senat of Rome, Before thefe commiffioners the Embaffadors from both tactions appeared as Delphi, and debated the matter with great earnessnes and vehementy where P oseemed to have the better hand as well in right of the caule, as through his eloquent tonimes Gggg 3

Proxenus (1 fay) who within few daies after, drank a cup of poison of his wives tempering, wherof H he died & the condemned therefore, departed into exile. The like madnels hanned the Candiots allo & diftracted them with intestine differition, But upon the coming of Q. Manim the Lieutenant General, who was sent accompanied with a fleet often fail, to appeale their debates, they sell to fome terms of peace and attonement. There had been a true also before of fix months but afterwards the war flamed out much more tetrible. The Lycians likewife at the same time, were infefted & plagued with war by the Rhodians, But my meaning is not neither is it any part of my purpole, to describe the wars of forain nations, nor to discourse of the circumstances how to proceeded for enough I have to do & more than I can wel discharge to write the acts only of the people of Rome. The Celtiberians in Spain, who being tamed by force of arms, had submitted to T. Gracehus, remained quiet all the time that M. Titinius the Pretor continued there in government, But imme- I diatly upon the arrival of Ap. Claudius they revolted and began to shew themselves in openaction of rebellion, by giving a suddain assault upon the Roman camp. It was about the break of day, when the lentinels upon the rampier and Corps de guard about the gates might discover enemies coming a far off and to they gave the alarm, Ap, Claudin; having put out the fignal of battail & in few words exhorted his fouldiers to fight and play the men led them torth at three gates at once. The Celtiberians made head and opposed their forces as they issued forth. At the first the skirmish was equal on both parts: for that by reason of the threights of the pastage, all the Romans could not fight: but after that one had put forward another, and followed till apace, they were all at length gotten without the trench, to as they were able now to diplay their battaillons & to confront their enemies from one point of their battail to the other wherewith before they were en K vironed: and then they made to forcible a fally upon them, that the Celtiberians were not able to endure their violence. For before the second hour of the day, they were discommitted and 1,5000 of them either died in the place or yeelded their bodies prisoners: 32 military enfigns they lost and were turned out of the camp the fame day; and here is an end of that war. For as many asekaped the conflict gat them home to their own towns & quietly afterwards bare the yoke of jubication,

That year were created Centors, Q. Futvius Flaceus & A. Posthumius Albinus who made a review of Senators and choic new. For Prefident of the Senat they elected M. Emplius Lepidus the Archbishop. Nine they put out of the Senat-house. The principal persons noted and disgraced, were thele, M. Corn, Maluginensis, who two years before had been Pretor in Spain; L. Corn, Scipio, Pretor for the time being, and L chief Justice of the common pleas, as well among citizens as aliens; and L L. Fulvius, who was whole brother to the Cenfor himself, & as V. Antias reporteth, equal in degree of calling, and his fellow every way. The Confuls also after they had made their vows within the Capitol, went forth to their Provinces. The one of them, (10 wir, M. Amylius) had in charge given him by the Senat to appeale the fedition of the Padoans in Venice, who as their Embassadors made report, by factious fiding and part-taking, were all on a fire with civil war,

The Embassadors who were gone into Acelia for to pacify the like troubles, brought word back, That it was not possible to bridle and refrain the surious rage of that nation. But the coming of the Conful made all whole among the Padoans and cured the malady: who having nothing elfe

to do in the province, returned to Rome. These Censors were the first that caused the streets of Rome to be paved with hard fiint and M pebble flone within the City and the high waies and causeys without to be raised with gravel. the fides therof to be well banked and kept in reparations: also bridges to be made in divers places: a scaffold besides for the Ædiles and Pretors to behold the games & plaies, Moreover the barriers in the race, from whence the horses begin to run, and the Ovales to mark and score up the number of couries * . * Overand besides the goles beyond * . * the iron gates and cages * . * and at the feafts in the mount Albane for the Confals. They took order besides all this feethe paring with flint of the cliff or descent from the Capitol, and from the gallery or porch before the temple of Saturn looking toward the Capitol, unto the place called Senaeulum, and the court Hoftila 2bove it. Also the merchants Hall or burle without the gate Tergemina they paved with stone, and senced it about with strong stakes and posts of wood. The gallery also Emplia they caused to be N repaired; and made an attent by stairs from the Tyber to the burge or merchants Hallaforefaid. Without the same gate also, they paved with pebble stone the gallery or walking place into the Aventine * , * from the Temple of Venus. The same Censors bargained for the making of walls about Calatia and Oxymum: and having made tale of fome publick edifices there, they employed the mony raised therof, in making of thops & stalls round about both the market places. The one of themsthat is to fay, M. Fulvius, (for P. fthumius faid plainly, that unless it were by venue either of an act of the Senat, or grant of the people of Rome, he would put forth no works to be made with dispense of their money) agreed upon a price for the building of a Temple to Impier at Pifar rum & at Funditalio make a conduit, for water to be conveighed to Palentia; and at Pijaurum for a way to be paved, and Sinue fa * Inthese colonies, he caused also a fink or vank to be made of about them, to carry away all filthiness into the river: also the market place to be enclosed with porches, galleties, and shops and three stately halls called I ani, with quarrefours or four throughfares, and as many fronts. For these works, one of the Confuls disburfed the money, and bargained with the Publicans and undertakers. In which regard, the inhabitants of those colonies above-named gave him great thanks. These Censors were likewise severe and precise in exercising their of fice for the redefing and reformation of mens maners for many Gentlemen had their horses of service taken from them, which were allowed them by the City.

A little before the years end, there was a folemn procession holden one whole day for the happy archievement of the affairs in Spain, under the conduct and good for une of Appin Claudin the Pro-conful; and twenty head of great beafts were killed in facrifice. And the morrow after they went inanother procession with implications, at the Temples of Geres, Liber, and Libera : for that there was reported from the Sabines countrey, a mighty earthquake, which over-turned many

After that App. Claudius was returned out of Spain to Rome, the Senat ordained, that he should enter the City with the pomp of an Ovation. And now approached the time for the election of new Confuls, Much ado there was and hard hold at this affembly, by reason of the multitude of competitors: but in the end, L. Post humins Albinus and M. Popilius Lanas were elected Confuls: R which done, the Pretors allo were created, to wit, Cn. Fabins Buten, M. Matienus, C. Ciccreius, M. Fur Craffipes, A. This business and solemnity sinished Ap. Claudius Cento entring with Ovant pomp into the City for his victory of the Celtiberians, brought into the common treasury 10000 pound weight of filver, and 5000 of gold. Cn. Cornelius was confectated the Flamin of Inpiter.

The same year there was set up a painted Table in the Temple of the goddess Materia with this inscription, Under the conduct and happy government of Tib, Sempronius Grace hus, Co-ful, the legion and army of the people of Rome, Subdued Sardinia. In which Province, there were flain and taken prifoners 80000 enemies, Which Gracchus (after he hadmanaged the affairs of state most fortunally, delivered many captives out of bundage, and recovered the tributes and outlomes to the Common-we 1) C brought home with him his army fafe and found, charged with an exceeding rich booty and reentered the City of Rome, in a second triumph. In memorial of which exploit she cansed this table to be fet up as a present in the honour of Jupiter. Now this table contained the portraiture o' the Iland Sardinia, and the picture also and resemblance of fundry battails. Moreover, in this year were represented to the people certain passimes and thews of fword-players, whereof fome were small and of no account : but one above the reft. exhibited by T. Flaminius, surpassed. And this he did in honour of his father de eased: with a dole of flesh among the people, a great publick feast bendes, and stage-playes for four dayes together. Burthe principal matter in this fettival folemnity, was this, That in three daies space there fought at interance with unrebated fwords, threescore and fourteen champions,

First that L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanas the Confuls had before all other things proposed unto the Senat as touching the government of the Provinces & conduct of the armies, ordained it was, that Ligaria should be the charge as well of the one of them as the other. Also that both of them should levy new legions, (and two a peece they (were allowed to have) therewith to defend the faid province and keep it in obedience befides tooog footmen and 600 horse of Latine allies. Moreover to enrol 3000 foot, and 200 horsmen of Romans for a supply in Spain. Last of all, commanded they were to press 1500 footines and a too horse of Roman citizens : with which strength, that Pretor unto whom Sard ninfell should Polisover into Corficastiere to war, and M. Cicerens Sardinia, 19 11302 Before that their Magistrats took their journey, the Senat was of advice that L. Polithamin the Conful should go into Campain, for to limit out the City-lands apart from the groupes of private perions: for that it was icen and known, that particular men letting out these bounds and encroaching by little and little upon the Commons, in process of time head a great past of it in their own possession. This Col. was angry and offenced with the Franchips for that upon a time when he went thither amongst them (in quality then of a privat person) to offer sacrifice in the temple of Fortunesthey did him no honor neither in publikener private. Wherupon, before he deputed now from Rome, he addressed his letters belote him to Pranesse, that the chief Magistrate should come and meet him upon the way provide him a lodging at their Cities charges, and at his departure from thence, to fee that there were sumpter horses and beafts of carrage ready for him, Now before this mans Confulfhip the Magittrats of Rome had never been chargeable to their allies nor put them to coff for any thing whattoever; and therefore allowed they were from the City their mules, tet out they were with tents and pavilions, and all other turniture and provision to the wars, to the end that they should not lay upon the allies any such burden. Privat lodging they had in friends houses, which they enterrained courteously & liberary with reciprocar hospitality. For at Rome likewife their houses were open to receive those holts of theirs, with whom they were wont before to have kind ulage and who had bidden them welcome, In like maner Emballacon (if they were tent by chance to any place of a fuddain) imposed upon the town. & cities through which they were to pais, one impress horse only to takher expense were no alies purtor any Roman Magistrats. In the beginning of this year, the Embassadors who had been sent into Actelia and Macedon, made report, I hat they might not come to the speech of K. In like fort they related that in Archa the civil diffention and fedition grew daily more ano more neither could the captains of these factions discords be repressed and held in awe by their countenance and authority.

As the City of Reme was amuled upon the continual expectancy of the Macedonian war before any erterprile thereof begun, thought good it was and require, that o der first should be taken for the expiation of prodigies and the pacification of the Gods by way of humbly praires, suchas were represented and delivered unto them out of the fatal books of Sibylla, For at Languism were feen, as the commen voice went; certain flews and telemblances of a mighty great navy. Aim, At Privernum there grew black wooll out of the earth. Also in the Veientian territory, neer a Town called Remems it rained flores. Moreover, all the country Pomptinum was overlast with clords of Loutis, and within the Land of G.: has, there were feen certain files to leap from under the clots of earth, that were turned with the plow as it took flitch and made futrow. For these first go and featful fights, the forefaid books were looked into and perufed, and out of them the Decemvirs de lared and pronounced both unto what Gods factifice (hould be offered, and what beatts were to be flain therfore moreover, that the one supplication should be holden, as propiilitory for those prodigious tokens as also the other, which the year before had been vowed for the health of the people, should now be performed, and holydaies kept therefore. So the facilities were accomplished according to the order and form fer down in writing by the Decemvits.

The very same year was the Church of Juno Lacinia uncovered, upon this occasion . Q. Falcing Flucens the Centor was building of a temple to Fertuna equestry, which he had vowed during the N war against the Celitibe lans, when he was Lord Pretor in Spair. His delite and earnest enderor was toffrain himself, that there might ret bein Romea temple of more flate and magnificence than this. And supposing that it would be a great leastly and exnament unto it, in cale the root were covered with tiles of matibe he went into the British countrey, & therethe was fo bold with the Church above faid of Juno Lacinia, as to untile the one half thereof, making full account, that io much would serve for to cover that temple which he was a building, Boats and Barges he had ready for to receive and carry away the laid tiles or sclates, without being empeached or convolied for this factiledg by the allies, whem he held in a we and righted by his Centorian authority Now after the Cerfor was required to Rowe, those maible felates were disbarked out of the foreland veffels and conveighed to the tem le. fool fort, and in manner laid it ruines, The lantern thereof was taken away and gone, the coof lefe bare and naked exposed and open to rem and foul weather, and thereby subject to rot that he being cholen Centor for to reform the manners of other : to whom it appettained by his office to fee that the Temples were close and covert; to call upon, that all publick places be kept wind-tight and water-tight, and in unfinitence repair that he (I lay) of all others should range over the Cites of allies & confederat States pulling down their Temples as he goeth & un overing the roofs of the faceed edifices, and in demolithing the Churches of the immortal Gods, commit that, which if he did but practile aponthe privat houses of allies, might feem an unworthy act and a great indignity; and finally, by gearing one Temple with the ruin or another, oblige the people of Rome with the very gails of highways ine; as it (I wis) the immortal Gods were not the same in all B places, but that we must honor and adorn some of them with the spoil of others. Now as it was apparent (before the matter was put to the commerce the Senate) which way the LL, enclined in opinion: formmediatly opon the proposing thereof, they all opined and gave one tentence, That order should betaken with the publicans of the City works, for the carrying back again of the same Clates to the former Temple, and that certain propitiatory facrifices should be offered for the pacification of lune. As for all ceremonies require toward the divine fervice aforefaid, they were with all complements performed accordingly : burthe farmers who had undertaken at a price to recary to recary thole ties, brought word that they had landed them in the churchyard and there left them, because they might not meet with any work an , who could devise with all the skill and cumping he had, how to bellow them as they were laid and couched before,

Of those Pretors who were gone into their Provinces. M. Fabius as he was in his journey toward high Spain died at Mafile by the way; and therefore upon intelligen egit enthereof by the Mafilian Embassadors, the Senat ordained that P. Furius and Cr. Servilius whom to increed others were to be fent should cast lots between themselves, whether of them should continue still in government, and have the charge of high Spain. And the lot fell out very well and fit that the faid P. Furius who had ruled the laid province before, should there remain.

The lame year, by occasion that a good part of the Ligurians and Gauls territory won by conquelt lay void and was not as yet in the tenure and occupation of any man there passed an Act of the Senat, that it should be divided by the poil. So, A. Attilus the L. chief justi e of the City of Rome, by vertice of a decree granted out of the Senat, created ten De emvirs or commissioners or D that purpole, to wit, M. Emplius Lepidus, C. Cassius, T. Ebutius Parrus. C. Tremellius P. Cornelius Cerbiguis, Q and L, both named Apuleius, M. Cacilius, C. S. lonius, and C. Manatius. To every

Roman citizen they fet out ten acres apeece: and to the Latine allies three,

About the same time that these affairs passed at Rome there arrived thither Emb stadors out of Esolia about their own civil distords and seditions Likewise there came others from thesi di reporting what was a doing in Macedony. For Perfeus (casting now in his mind how to compais that war which during his fathers life he deviled and thought upon) endevoured to draw and win unto him not only all the nations but the cities of Greece, by fending his embaffages among them. & promiting liberally more than he performed. Howbeit the hearts of the most part were nelined to him and favoured his defigus, yea, and much more affectionat than to K, Eumenes not withftan-Eding that all the States of Greece and most of the principal personages we enhiged unto Eumenes, and in fee as it were with him, in regard of many courtefies and gracious favours received at his hands & that he carried himselt io in his own realm that the cities which were subject unto him. were not willing to change their condition with any of the free States whatfoever. Whereas contrapwife the bruit went, that Perfeus after his fathers deceafe, killed his wife with his own hands and likewise severly murdered Apelles, whose ministry and service in former time he had wed in thing away the life of his brother Demetrinifor which cause he lived in exile, because Plut p made farch after him for to have him punished accordingly him (I ay) he murdered after he had tent for him upon his fathers death, and procured him to come unto him, with great promifes to recompense him highly for the execution of the foresaid sact. Yet as infamous as he was with these Flomeffical murders, and for no good part and worthy defert otherwise commendable; he was commonly better regarded of the States of the country than King Eumenes, a Prince fo kind and good to his kinsfolk fo just and righteous to his subjects so bounteous and espective to all mens whether it were that they, possessed aforehand with the same and majesty of the Macedonian Rings, despited the rising of this new Kingdom; or that they were desirous of novelties and a terahouse or lastly, that they wished and had a desire that he should make head against the Romans, Now were not the Ætolians only together by the ears among themselves by reason they were

dired to deep in debr. bur the Theffalians also : and this peffilent malady as it were by catching and McGion was fored as far as Perrhabia, But after that the Senat was advertised that the Theffalians had taken arms, they fent App. Claudius as Embassador to see and appeale those troubles: who having rebuked and chastifed the Captains of both fides, eased and firthen off a great part of the debt, which grew burdenfome and grievous by excelsive utury, and that with confent of the most of the creditors who had thus overcharged their debtors he parted the paiment of the due debt and principal, by even portions for certain years. The trobleiom state of Perrhabia likewise was reduced into good terms of quietnes, by the felf-fame Appins, and after the fame order. And at thevery fame inftant Marcellas viited the Etolians & took knowledg at D. Iphi of their troubles And commotions which proceeded from very hostile hears & minds, enemy-like, & were pursued with civil war. And when he saw that they contended and strove much to surpsis one another in H sails courses and audacious; he would by his decree he will be said and actions the would by his decree he will be said and action to surpsis one party. more than the other, but he requested them indifferently on both fides to abstain from was, to make an end of discord and diffention, and bury all that was past in perpetual oblivion. Wheremake an end of uncord and uncords, their attorichent was ratified with the allurance of pledges mpon they were reconciled. and accorded it was, they fifold meet at Cornett, there to be one interchangeably given: and accorded it was, they fifold meet at Cornett, there to be one interchange of the property of the case into Pelapsia. The case into Pelapsia. fur. where he had appointed and published a foleilin affeirible and domicel of the Achans, Wherein he highly praised and commended the whole hardon for objerving to fiedfally the old decrees whereby they debarred and excluded the Macedonian Kings out of their confines he declared evidently and prefented to the view of all the world; what make ind harred the Romans I bare to Petfers. And that it might break out the world into open wars, Ring Emphylicane to Romans I ligent teach and enquiry into particulars, he had gathered.

Mich about the same time the five Embassadors lent unto K. Foffil Tot to fee into the assure of Mucidony, were commanded to take a voyage as far as Alexandria for to rene w the old amior maccoony, who have been used the were the C. C. Levins, C. Lindarus, C. C. Beins ey with King Protomens, The names of them were the C. C. Levins, C. Lindarus, C. C. Beins ey with King Normalus, and M. Cacilius Device. Mid even there of not much after, there same Emballadors from King Annochus; and the chief and principal perion among them, one Apollonius, was admitted to come into the Senat, where he excuted the King his matter for many good and just reasons, in that he had not sent his tribute divided pathent to soon as he ought by K theday appointed; but now (he said) that he had brought it all, to the end that the King should be the had became the had been the had be to them beho den for nothing but the respite of time only. And besides that they were come with a present of certain plate of gold, weighing 300 pound. That the killight is perition was That the fociety and friendfhip which had been contracted between his fither and them, might be renued also with him: promiting, that if the people of Rome would impose any thing upon him to be done, which were meet to be laid upon a good and taithful ally he would not fail in his desoir to performall offices whattoever. For why, the Senat had to well delerved of him, ar what time as he fo journed in Rome, and such courtefy he found among the flour of the Roman yong Gentlemen, that of all degrees and forts of men, he was reputed and used more like a King indeed, than an hostage for the time. These Embassadors received a gracious answer and withat A. Anthin L the Pretor of the City was enjoyeed to renew the league with Antiochus, which had been concluded with his fat er. As for the tribute, the treasurers of the Ciry received it: and the Censors took all the golden veffels atorclaid, who had the charge to beffow the same in what Temples they thought good. Unto the chief Embassador was sent a present in money, amounting to the fum of one 100000 Affes: who also was allowed an house to odg in at his pleasure of free-coft: and all his charges were defraied by the City, during the time that he made abode in Italy. The Embassadors who had been in Syria, gave this report of him. That he was a man in great favour and highly honoured with the King: and befides, fingularly well affected to the people of Rome. Now concerning the affairs of the provinces for that year thus much as followeth.

C. Cicercius the Pretor fought in ranged battail with the enemies in Cafica wherein 7000 of M the I anders were flain: and 1700 and better taken priloners. In that conflict the Pretor had vowed to build the Chappel of Juno Moneya. After this was peacegranted to the Corfians at their own fuit and feeking but they were compelled two pay to hundred thouland weight of wax. Cicereins having thus jubdued Co fica. passed from the ce over into Sardinia. A field also was lought in Ligaria, within the territory of the Statellats, neer the Fown Criffin: for thither affembleda great army of the Ligurians. At first upon the arrival of M. Popilius the Conful they kept dole within the walls: but afterwards feeing the Romans at the point to give affault and to lay battery to the walls, they issued forth of the gates and embattailed themselves. The Consultor his part forflowed not to come to hand-fight, the only thing he fought for in threatning to give affault. The conflict continued above 3 hours, and the hope of victory hung in equalballunce; N which when the Cof, perceived, namely, how the Ligurian enfigns removed not and gave no ground; he commanded his Cavalry to mount on horseback, and to charge with all their force and piolence upon their enemies inthree feveral places: many of these hor emenpierced quite through the midft of the battail, and passed to far, that they charged the enemies upon the back as they fought. Whereupou the Ligurians were much terrified and began to flie from all parts: very few retired batk into the City, by reason that the hor emen made head against them that way most : beides, many of the Ligurians were left dead in the place; fuch was their resolute perfiffance in fight : killed also they were every where as they fled. Ten thousand (by report) fell upon the edge of the (word, above feven hundred taken prisoners in one place or other, and $2 military entigns were caried away. And yet was not this victors without effution of Roman o blood tor there died of them nor fo few as three thousand souldiers by reason that the formost of both sides fought so mansully in the forestront and while they would not give ground one to the other, were firiken down and flain without mercy. After this battoil the Ligurians rallied themselves into one place, out of all parts where they were scattered in the rout and seeing that more of their men were loft than le'r behind (for in all they were not above ten thoufand) they yeelded simply without any composition : howbest in good hope they were, that the Con'ul would not deal worfe by them nor in more rigorous manner than other Generals before him. Buthe difarmed them all, rafed their Town, fold their bodies & all that they had, and fent letnum. Benar of these exploits of his. Which when A. Artdins the Pretor had read in the Senar, (for the other Conful Posthumius was absent, by occasion that he was employed in the survey and vising of the Lands in Campania) they thought it a very hard and cruel course, that the Statellats, who only of all the Ligurians had not born arms against the Romans, who were then assailed firth, when as they began not of their own accord to make war, who also put themselves into the protection of the Romans, should be thus rigorously intreated, thus torn, dimembred and confumed in most cruel manuer: that so many thousands of frank condition, innocent persons, and imploring the mercy of the Romans, should be thus fold out-right, (a most dangerous example, R that never hereafter any one will venture to submit himself again:) and finally, that they should be diffracted and carried away into all parts, to live in flavery under them, who having been formetimesprosessed enemies of the Romans, now enjoy peace and repose, In regard hereos, there passed an areft or act of the Senat that M. Popilius the Conful should pay back the price unto the buyers, and reflore the Ligurians to their former liberty; to take order also that their goods (asmuch as possibly might be recovered) should be rendred unto them also that armour should be made in that nation with all speed possible, and that the Consul so soon as he had reestablished the Ligurians (upon their submission) in their former estate, should depart out of the Provinces for a smuch as the honour of victory confifted not in exercising cruelty upon the poor and afflicted, but in vanquithing the obstinat, But the Consulas he bare himself proud and rue against the Ligurians, so the shewed as great frowardness and disobedience to the Senar, And having sent away the legions to winter in Pile, he returned to Rome, carrying a fell and angry from ack against the LL, and as frightful and malicious a mind to the Pretor: where immediatly he assembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellona, and ratled up the Pretor in broad and gross terms. For that he, whose part it had been to have moved the Senat for thank (giving to the immortal Gods, in regard of the happy archievement of the wars, in flead thereof passed an act of the Senat against him and in favor of the enemies, for to put him by his victory and to give it away from him to the Ligurians; and finally, being no better than a Pretor, would have had the Conful yeelded in manner up into their hands, Whereupon he aid that he would be so bold as set a fine on his head: and withal, he required the LL. of the Senat to command and ordain, That the sreft deviced against him might be preverted; and to give order, that the processions which in his absence they ought to have decreed (upon his letters sent of his good success) might now be holden; in consideration first of the honour due to the immortal Gods, and then respectively in some measure for his own desert, But after he was checked by some of the Senators to his sace, and that in no milder tearms than he had been rebuked in his absence, he went his waies into his Province again, and obtained neither the one fuit nor the other.

The other Conful Posthumius having spent the whole summer in surveying the Lands only, and never formuch as feen his own Province, returned to Rome against the general assembly for election, and created Confuls C. Popilius Lands. Consequently were Pretors elected, to wit, C. Licinius Craffus, M. Iunius Panus, Sp. Lucretius, Sp. Cluvius, Cu. Sicinius, and C. Memmius, the fecond Etime. In that year was holden a review of the City and the number taken of citizens, (when as Q.Fulvins Placem and L. Posthumius Albinus were Ceniors:) wherein were found and enrolled of Roman citizens 26001 5. The number was somewhat the less, by reason that L. Posthumius the Conful had proclaimed in a publick audience, That no person of those Latine allies, who were to return into their own Cities (by vertue of an edick made when C. Claudius was Conful) should be escolled into the subsidy book at Rome, but every man in his several City. This Censorship was administred with concord and unity, yea and to the good and profit of the common-weal. What Senators foever they depoted from their place and dignity, and fo many Gentlemen of Rome as they took their Hories from, they made them all no better than contributaries to pay all fcot and lot, yea, and displaced them out of their tribes. And look whomsoever the one of them noted with digrace and ignominy, he was not relieved nor allowed again by the other. This Fulvius dedicated the Temple of * Fortuna equestris, now fix years after he had vowed the same in a bat - * The fortune till which hefought with the Celtiberians, at what time as he was Pro-conful in Spain: likewise of horse-figure he exhibited the stage-plaies for four daies together, and one day in the cirque or shew-place, Con, Lentalats (a Decemvir for the holy rites and facrifices) that year died; in whose room was fullituted A. Post bumins Albinus. There were such mighty drifts and clouds as it were of locusts, brought fuddainly at once by a wind from the Sea into Apulia, that with their (warms they overfpread all the fields far and neer. For the riddance of which notione vermine confurning the finits of the earth, Cn. Sicinius, Pretor elect, was sent with his full commission of command into Apulia, who assembled a mighty number of people for to gather them up, and emploied much

In the beginning of the year enfuing, wherein C. Popilius and P. Elius were Confuls, the remtime thereabout. mnt of the devates which arose the year before, was set on foot again. The LL of the Senat would have had the matter proposed & debated again as touching the Ligurians, and the ordinance of the Senat in that behalf renewed. Bur, as Elius the one Conful put up a bilther of to Popilius the other was an earnest suiter, & besought both his collegue & also the Senat in the behalf of his brother; nay, he proceeded to far, that he gave the house to understand, in case they went about any such decree prejudicial unto him, he would crofs and revoke the fame by which countenance of his he H affrighted his colleague; but the LL, were offended so much the more and stormed against both the Gonfuls, yea, and perfifted ftill in their enterprise, And therefore when it was debated in counsel as concerning the Provinces, albeit the Coff, made means to be fent into Macedom (because the war of Perfeu was so neer at hand) yet Liguria was assigned to both of them: for the LL, protested and faid, That they would not pals a decree for the government of Macedony, unless the case of Popilius were p: opounded, and an act thereof entred, Afterwards, when they demanded a warrant to enrol new armies, or at least-wife to levy a supply for making up the old, both the one motion and the other was denied. The Pretors also, who required to have a supplement with them into Spain, had a nay; and namely, M. Junius into the hither province, and P. Lucretius into the farther. As for C. Licinius Craffus, to him there fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City overcitizens, and I to Cn. Sicinius that other over forrainers, C. Memmins was allotted to Sicily, and Sp. Clavins to Sardinia. The Confuls for these causes being highly offended and angry with the Senat, caused the Latinefeasts and holydaies to be published against the very first day that possibly they might, with an intimation that they would go (traight into their province, and not attend the managing of any affairs touching the State, but only that which directly pertained to their government, Valerius Antias writeth, that in these Consuls year, Attalus the brother of K. Eumenes camein

embassage to Rome, to inform criminous matter against Perfeus, and to give the particulars of the preparation that he made for war. But the Annals of many other writers (more worthy of credit than he) deliver unto us, that K. Eumenes presented himself in proper person : where he was received with such honor, as the people of Rome thought not only meet & agreeable for his defens, K but also fit and surable to their own favours and benefits, which they had in ample manner conferred and in great number heaped upon him. And then he had audience given him in the Senate, where he shewed the cause of his coming to Rome what it was; namely, " (besides a servent de-

" fire that he had to see those gods and men, by whose grace favour he enjoyed so good estate, as "better he durst not wish) because he gladly would advertise the Senat by word of mouth, to " prevent and withstand the designs of Perseus. And beginning his speech with the platforms and ecepterprises of Philip, he recounted withal, how it cost his ion Demetrius his life, for that he "Rood against the war with the Romans: moreover, how he had caused the whole nation of the 66 Bastarnians to quit their own countrey where they were born and bred to the end that by their "aid he might pass over into Italy: but whiles (qd.he) these matters he projected and call in his L 66 head his time was come, and arrested he was by death: but he left his Kingdom to him, whom the knew to be the most spiteful enemy that the Romans had. And therefore Perseus having re-"ceived this war (as a man would fay) by way of inheritance left him by his father even together with the crown and scepter, from the very first day of his raign, doth nought else but enter-" tain, foster, and promote the same by all the means and devices that possibly he can Mighty and ce puissant he is besides in number of yong slusty, and able men for service, who during the time of 44 long peace have fprung up and multiplied exceedingly. In wealth and riches a great potentathe is, and belides in his flourishing years and the best time of his age, which as it is accompanied " with the very strength and vigor of his body, to his spirit and mind is inured and hardned with skilfull experience and long practife of martial feats. For from his very infancy nuzled hath he m " been in the field and camp, converting ordinarily within the royal tent and pavillion of hisfaer ther, acquainted with the wars, not only waged against neighbour nations, but also against the "Romans; and that which more is emploied by his father in many and fundry expeditions and "executions of service. But since that himself entred upon the Kingdom, and swaied the regal step-"ter in his own hand, he hath exploited & accomplished many things with marvellous felicity and " fuccels, which his father Ph. lip before him could never compass and effect, notwithstanding he "tried and assaied all means as well of open force as fecret fraud. To augment this greatness of his, et he hath purchased already that authority and reputation in the world, which others hardly in continuance of long time, and by many tavors and ample benefits attain unto: and namely, throughout the States of Greece and Afa, all men reverence his majesty. For what good turns, N " for what pleasures done for what bounty of his they should thus do and honour him so much, "neither see I, neither can I say for certainty; whether it happen by a special gift and fortune that " he hath of his own, or that (which I am my felf afraid to speak) it be the deep malice and hatted " which he hath conceived against the Romans, which is the cause that he is of that connenance "and so gracious among them. Nay, with the very Kings and Princes of other nations he is high-" ly esteemed and of passing authority. The daughter of Seleucus he hathtaken to wife, without " any suit of his own but being earnestly woed and requested thereunto. And to Prussa he hath "given his own fifter in marriage, after much seeking and instant intreaty. These two weddings "were solemnized with the exceeding joy and innumerable presents of infinite embassages: and alledged hard the leignory and empire of the Romans, it would have gone very hard but that he "hould have let forth even within Aches. Bur contratiwile I affare you my due and deferved thonors (unto whom it is hard to fay, whether they be more bounden and obliged for privat res or publick benefits) are either forlent through retcheffe dilule and negligence, or elle a somiled and abolified of wilfull malice and boltile hatred. As for the Etolians, who knoweth is not that in his civil broils, and feditions they lought to Perfeus for to reliefe and fuce ur, and " nor to the Romans? Being thus upheld with focieties, and amities, he hath provided such furnisince of his own, and made that preparation for war at home, as he needs none from abroad, Of whimfelf he is thirty thouland ftrong in foot & yooo in horfe. For ten years he is flored with corn "aforehand, fo as for that kind of purveiance he may spare his own territories, and allo forbeac et his enemies. As for mony in ready coin, he hath fuch abundance, that over and above the forces B cof naturall Macedonians, he wageth 20000 mercenary fouldiers, and hath wherewith to make as pay for as many years, belides the yearly cultomes & profits that arife out of their Kings mines. « Now for armour, he hath gathered together into his arcenals and armories, sufficient to furnish of three fuch ormies. What should I speak of the youth and serviceable men of war? Set the case " that Macedon failed him and were not able to find enough; all Thrace is subject unto him from " whence he may ferve his turn as out of his ever running fountain and living spring. The rest of his speech be knit up with a exhortation in this manner. " I relate not these things (ad. he) my "I.L. of Rome, as blown abroad and vented by headlesse heartsay and doubtfull rumors : neither schave I been fo ready to beleeve them, as a man defirous that fuch criminous imputations " should be verified upon my enemy , but as undoubted and certain reports upon my own knowa ledg, as if I had been fent by you of special purpote to be a spie: and declared that and no more, which I had feen with mine eyes and not other wife. Neither would I have left mine own realm " wherein (by your meanes and goodness) in glorious and magnificent State I fit warm enbugh, « forto fail, over fo large a fea as I have done and to carry vain rales and untruths to you therby to se crack my credit with you for ever hereafter. But I tell you thele eies of mine have leen the molt grenowned and nobleft Civies of Assand Greece discovering more and more from cay to day, "what they intend and what their meaning is: who if they belet alone and permitted to run on as is they begin, would be engaged to far, as they might not polsibly return again & fave themlelves so by sty repentance. Beheld I have Perfent (1 fay) how he containeth not within the realm of " Matedony, but one while feizeth upon this by force of arms, another while gaineth and getteth withit by favour and good will, which with violence he could never have conquered. I perceived and confidered well how unequal the match and condition is, whiles he upon you prepareth war, and you again perform to him fecurity of peace. Although in my conceit, and fotar as I a tould fee into it, he made no more any preparation thereof, but was already upon action and ecexetution. For he chated Abrapolis, a confederat prince and friend of yours, forth of his Kingis dom. And Arterarus the Illyrian, another of your aflociats and allies, he killed ourright, beweatle he found that he had written some letters unto you. As for Eversa & Callicrates, both Thece bans, & two principal States of that City, for no other reason, but because in a Parliament of the " Bzbitins, they had spoken their mind against him too frankly, and avowed that they would re-"peat into you what things had passed, he caused to be murdered. The Bizantines he suc-"coured against the order taken in the accord : upon Dologia he levied war : The flaty and Doris E a both he invaded and overran with his army, to the end, that in some intelline and civil war, by "the belp of molt parts be might afflict and plague the better. He shuffled all together, and made "a very confusion of the State in Theffaly and Perrhabia, upon the hope and cancelling all bonds "and croising out all debt books; that thus by a power and multitude of bankrupts, fuch as were "over deeply engaged, and whom he had obliged and bound to him(clf, he might depress and "oppresse the great men and principall personages. Having wrought these practises uncontrolled. "whiles you fit still looking on and juffring all, he seeing you to let him do with Greece what he "lift, making full account, that no man will put him on arms and make head against him, before he we paffed over into Italy. How fafe this may be to you, nay, how this can stand with credit, fee you "to that and be adviled. For my felt, I afsure you, I thought it meer fhame and very villany, that "Perfeut your enemy lhould enter into Ital) to make war upon you, before that I your friend and wallie, came to give your warning for to take heed and frand upon your guard. Now fince I have "in this maner performed my devoir, done that office which I was bound upon necessity, and in lone measure acquit my felf and discharged my bounden duty and obligation of fidelity; what re-"mineth behind for me to do, but to be your beadsman to all the gods & goddelses, to vouchiafe "jourhait grace, that you may provide for your own Commonweal, and allo for us your friends and "allies, who depend wholly upon you? In this last speech he came neer unto the LL of the Senat. But for the present no man might know any thing, but only that the K. had been in the Senat, fo filink were they al. & kept the councel-house close that with secretie. But after the war was brought to an end, then came sproad, both what the K, tpake, and what answer was returned to him again. Some few daies after, the Senat fet to give audience unto the Embailadors of King Perfeut: but having their minds and ears both, poisetsed aforehand by King Eumenes, all the defence that the Embalsadors made, and all the entreary they uled, was rejected. Belides, the ftoutness uled by Harparas (the principal person of the embassie) moved their patience and exasperated their ftomichs. Apology and and defence, that he neither had faid nor done any thing founding to holithty ; many if in cale he perceived and faw, that they came upon him thus, and would needs pick quarrels and give occasion of war, he would it and upon his guard, and defend himself with a resolute and va-ulant courage. For the hazard of the field was common, and the liftie of war uncertain. Now. all the Cities of Greece and Afia both, would rather then their lives have known what the Em. be baffadors of Perfens, and what Eumenes had done in the Scnat : for in regard of his coming molt of the states (supposing verily that he would stir coales and make some work) had sent their Embaffadors to Rome, presending colourably other matters in semblance, but indeed to liften after news: and among the reft, was the Embaffage of the Rhodians, and the chief thereof was one Satyrus, who made no queltion nor doubt, but that Emmenes had done their errand, and put their City and Perfens together in all their criminall matters laid to his charge. And therefore he made I all the means that possibly he could by the mediation of patrons, friends, and acquaintance, todebate the matter with King Enmenes before the body of the Senar : which when he had obtained. his tongue waiked at large, and overbold he was and too round with the King, in broad invectives and intemperat termes; namely, that he had follicited and firred up the nation of the Lycians againft the Rhodians, and was an heavier friend unto Afiathen Antiochus had been. Which speech of his as it was plaufible enough and pleafing to the States of Afia (for they likewife by this time inclined to affect and favour Perfeur) fo it was unfavory altogether and odious to the Senat, and nothing profitable to themselves and their City. But contrariwise, this banding and conspiracy against Emmenes, wan him the more grace and favor among the Romans ; to as they did him all they honour they could, gave him most rich and costly presents, and endowed him with a curule K

chair of eltate, and a staffe or scepter, both of ivory. After their embasinges had their dispatch and were dismissed, Harpalus returned into Macedon in all speed and haft possible, relating unto the King, how he had left the Romans not preparing as yet for war; but lo far out with him and to highly offended, that it appeared evidently it would not be long ere they begen. And Perfess again for his part, belides that he looked for no other, was well enough pleated ther with, prefuming upon the flour and firength of his forces, But above all other he maliced Enmenes most: with whole bloud he laid the first foundation of the war for he suborned one Evander a Candiot and captain under him of certain auxiliary fouldiers, and three Macedonians belides (whose service and ministry he had used in the like feats) to murder the King. He gave them letters addressed to one Prazo an hostesse of his, a jolly dame in L Delphi, and of greatest credit and wealth among them. For affured he was, that Eumenes minded to go up to Delphe, there to facrifice unto Apelle. Thele traitors together with Evanderlet forward; and to execute this their defigned enterprise, they looked all about and fought for nothing but the opportunity of some place or other. Now, as men ascend from Cirrha to the temple. before they come to any place much peopled and frequented with houses, there stood a mound or mud wal on the left hand of the path or way, rinfig tomewhat higher than the foundations and ground-work; along which wall there was paffage for one by one and no more; for on the right hand the earth was broken down and fallen, and breach made of some a good depth. Behind that mound aforefaid, their traitors had hidden themselves, and raised some steps like stairs; to the end that from above, as from the top of a wal, they might discharge their shot upon K. Eumenes as he M paffed by. Before him there marched from the fea, at the first a fort of his friends and followers. together with his guard intermingled one with another; but afterwards as the way grew more threight and marrow, the train waxed thinner. But when they were one come to the place where they could not go but by one at once, Pantaleon one of the States and princes of Atolia, with Whom the King had begun some communication, entred first into the narrow path aforesaid: With that the knaves that lay in wait behind, role up and tolled down two hage flones, wheref the one mote the King upon the head, the other aftonished his shoulder. And verily all the relief histriends and followers, leeing him fall with the blow, fled tome one way, fome another sonly Panta con staid behind all, searlesse, to protect and guard the King. The murderous villaines might have ferched a short compaisabout the wall, and soon run to the King to make sure work and dif- N patch him quites but they supposing they had done the deed already, fled to the pitch of the mount Parkaffin, and made such hall, that when one of the companie hindred and staied their running, because he dragged behind and could not keep pace and follow them hard at heels through those theep and blind wates, they made no more ado but killed him out-right, for fear left if he weretsken, he should be wray and ditclose the whole treason. The body of the King lay along on the ground and first his friends came running about him, then his guard and houshold servants. When they reared bin up, they found him aftonied with the stroke and altogether senseless in a trance: howbeit, by some heat remaining, and the beating of his heart, they pereceived there was some life but little or no hope they had that he could escape and live. Some there were of his guard and pen soners about him that made pursuit after these murdeters by their tracks; and when they had O held on their chale as far as unto the creft of Parnaffus, wearying themselves to no purpole, they gave over and returned as wife as they went. The Macedoniaus as they had begun an audacious enterprise inconfiderately, so they left it undone as fearfully and without advice, Now by this time was the King come again to himfelf. And the morrow after, his friends conveighed him to his fhipsfrom thence to Corinth & from Corinth along the fireights Ifthmusthey brought their valsels,& croised over to Egina : where his cure was caried to clofe & fecret, without admitting

h person to come unto him, that the rumor ran into Asia how he was dead. And Attalist his brother (by your leave) gave good ear thereto, it believed the news footier then was bescenning brotherly love and unity. For he entred into such talk both with his brother wife, and also with the earlies of the castle, last if he had been the undoubted heir and assured interior of the troown: All this gamers knew full well afterwards, who albeit he purposed to diffemble the natter, and to put it up at least wife with filence; at their first encounter and meeting together, be could not hold, but reproved and reproached his brother, for being so forward and over-hist to court and wook his wife. The stuit also was blown to Roma, and a report there was of the death of K. Emissie.

About the same time C. Valerius was returned out of Greece, who had been sent thither as East hallador to look into the flate of the country ; to mark allo and observe the plots and proceeding B of Perfess. He reported all things furable and agreeable to the intelligences given by King Eume-est, and withall, brought with him from Delphi dame Proxo, in whole house those villanous traitors were lodged and harboured : also one L. Rammus a Brundusian, who informed moreover and gave evidence as followeth. This Ramning was one of the principall citizens of Brundulining and used to lodg and entertain in his house, not only of the Roman captains when they came to town, but also the Embassadors of forrein nations, such as were of greatest mark, and principally those that were lent from any Kings. By this meanes, acquainted he grew with Perfeut, albeit they never had been one anothers face. And being invited by the King his letters, wherein he was promiled great hope of some neer and inward friendship above others, and consequently of great preferments thereby, he made a journey unto him. Within a short time lie was wound into very familiar acquaintaince with the King, and drawn into privat conference and discourse of secrets. C farther, I wis, then himfelf was willing or liked of. For the King dealt with him, yea, and importuned him with infant praiers and large behelts of rich rewards, that foralmuch as the Roman captains and Embaffadors uied to take his houle for their Inne, he would caule as many of them ashe writ for, to be poiloned. Now forthat he knew it was a right difficult and dangerous matter to come by fach a poilon and compaffe this project, especially if many were party and privy to him and belides, the eventuncertain, either in the effect of the drug it felf to be ftrong quick and foreible enough to do the feat : or in the fectet working thereof, left it should be found and spied ; he would therefore put into his hands such a poison, as neither in the giving, not after it was given, might be known by any fign whatfoever. Ramsins feating left if he refuled & denied, he should be the first man to make affay and make experiment of the poilon promised so D to do, & then departed. But return to Branda frum he would not before he had spoken with C Vas lerius the Embastador, who then sojourned (as he heard say) about Chalcis. First unto him he revealed this plot, and by his commandment came along with him to Rome: where being brought into the Senat, after audience given, hel, id abroad in every point all that had paffed. This new matter, over and besides those which Enmenes had reported, was the cause that Perfess was the fooner taken for an enemy, and to declared the father because they saw him not only shout to make open war war of a princely and royall mind, but also to practife and execute privily all kind of milchief, by way of covert brigandage, theevill ftealth, and lectet poilon . The mausging of this war was put off and referred to the new Confuls : howbeit for the prefent ordain ned it was, that Co. Cicinius the Pretor who had the jurisdiction between citizens and firangers. E should levy and enroll souldiers who being conducted to Brundusum, should with all convenient fpeed commit to fea, and fail over to Apollonia in Epirus, for to feiz upon the maritime Cities : to the end that the Conful unto whom the Province of Macedonia should be allotted, might artivethere with his veffels in fafety, and fet his forces on land with cafe.

Enument, after he had been kept a long while at Rgina, during the time of his hard and dangrous cure, fo foon as ever he might go fafely abroad, went to Pergamu; where, over and beaties the old hatred fettled in his breats, being pricked allo with this fet he and bleeding villand practiced by Perfout, he prepared war with all his power to the uttermost; and thither repaired unto him Embassadors from Rome, to testifie their joy for his evasion and escape out of to neer and

When the Macedonian war was delaied and put off for one year, and the reft of the Pretorsgone already into their provinces, M. Januar and Sp. Interestins (unto whom befell the government of Spain) after that they had importuned and we-ried the Senat, in iming fo long for one thing, obtained at the length a commission for a supply of soldiers to make up the army; by venue whereof they enrolled 3000 foot, and 150 horse for the legions: and levied 3000 foot and three hundred horse for the army of the allnes. These forces were transported into Spain with the new Pretors.

there came to Rome Embaffadors from Aria-kee, beinging with them the Kings fon, a very H child. The speech they made was to this purpose, that the King thier mafter had sent his son to Rome, thereto have his education; to the end that being there become and make from his infancy be acquainted with their falhions, and converte with the prople of Rome. His uite artificate of the with their falhions, and converte with the prople of Rome. His uite artificate of the was, that they would vouchtafe unto him not only the of the was entertainment and protection that privat persons afford to their guells but allo to talk the charge of publickmition, "and as it were the guardianage of him. This embling of the K. was well-taken of the Senat & pleased them highly. Whereupon they ordained that C. Litimal the Pretor thould see out a manfion houle with all the furniture, wherein the yong bilines and his train might keep their teliance.

The Thracian Emballadors like wife preferred the offelves before the Senar, to debate their own controversies in their hearing, and withall desired their friendship and amity. They obtained I their fuit, and befides there was fent unto them by way of prefent, the futh of sec o wifes a pecce, Glad were the LL of the Senat that their States were received into their lociety, by reason Thracia lyeth hard on the back fide of Macedony : but to the end that they might have perfect intelligence and notice how all things went in Afia and the Hands, they fent thither C C and in No. ro, and M. Decim: as in emballage : whom they commanded also to visit Grees and Rhedes, and withall, both to renew the amity, and also spie and observe whether the hearts of those sultes had been follicited and tempted by K. Perfeus.

As the City was thus in doubtfull suspence and expectation of the event of this new werbehold in a tempelt that role in the night, a certain column or pillar, garriffed and for our with the beak-heads of war fhips (which had been erected in the Capitola duting the first punick war by K M. Amiliar the Confut, who had for his companion in government Serg. Fullian) waster a clap of thunder and lightning rent and cloven from the very base to the chapter. This was taken for a prodigious token, and report thereof was made to the Senat. The LL gave order, that the Aruspices should be conferred with about it, and their advice taken : likewise they commanded the Decemvirs to look into their books of Siby #2. The Decemvirs for their part declared, that the City should be purged and hallowed, publick supplications and prairer made to the gods, and greater bealts killed for factifice, as well at Rome in the Capitoll, bas in Campain neer the promontory of Minerva. Also that with all convenient speed, there should be plaies solemnly exhibited for tendsies together, in the bononr of most gracious Jupiter. All this was done with diligence accordingly : but the Atuspeces atoresaid, made answer out of their learning, that this prodigy L portended good and fignified the advancement of their own territories : together with the delitaction of their enemies; for that those beak heads which the form overthrew, had been the spoils of thips won from the enemies. There hapned other occurrents belides to encrease the ferupulous religion & devotion of men: for reported it was, how at Saturnia within the town it rained blood three daies together. Item, at Calatin an affe was foled with three feet; and a bull together with five kine were ftrucken ftark dead with one thunderbolt and flash of lighting : last of all at Oximum there was a showr of very earth and nothing else in regard of these wonders also, facrifices were celebrated, supplications made, and one day kept holiday and all shop-windows shut-

Yet were not the Confuls departed into their provinces, because they neither would obey and condefeend unto the Senat in proposing the matter as touching Pepilius at the connectable, and M the LL. were as resolut for their parts to let no decree patte, before that were done. The spight and heart-burning they bare against M. Popilius, grew the more by occasion of his own letters, wherein he wrote and gave them to underliand, that being Proconful, he had now a fecond time fought with the Statellars in Ligaria, and put ten thousand of them to the sword, by reason of which hard couries and extreamities of war, the other nations likewife of the Ligurians were entred into arms, At which news not only Popilius was blamed behind his back of making was against all law and equity upon them that had yeelded, and thereby provoking those who before were quie, to go out and put themselves in action of rebellion; but the Confals also were checked to their faces in the Senat, because they fet not forward to their charge and government. M. Martin Serme and Osintius Martius Serils, two Tribunes of the Commons, recing the LL, of the Senst thus N drawing all in a line, took heart unto them, and both menaced the Confus to fine them, unless they made more half unto their province; and also recited in the Senat alaw which they had drawn and framed, and were upon the point to promulge, as touching the fortsid Ligurises who had inbmitted. The tenor whereof ran in this form, That what perfon feever of Statella had yelded himself and was not restored to Liberty and freedom before the calends of " Sextilis next ensuing, the Senat upon their oath fould ordain one special commissioner to make in quision by whose fraud covin, and notice he was in willewage and panish the party accordingly. Then by authority and approhation of the Senat they published this for a law. Now before that the Confuls took their journey, The Senata flembled in the Temple of Bellona in regard and favour of C. Cicereius ithe Protor of the former yeer. Where and tence was given him : and after he had declared what exploits he had performed in Corfica, thereupon demanded triumph : which when he could not obtain, he made no mbre ado, but rode triumphant in the Albane hill , fornow it was taken up and grown for a cultome foto do, and aske the authority and the State no

Andeltion in the Senat, Whom they would have fit upon their inquifition according to the form of the faid law. And the LL, ordained himfelf to be the inquifitor. Then at length and not afore, the Confals put themselves in their way toward their province, and received the charge of the army from M. Popilius. This Popilius durft not yet return to Rome, forfear he should be called in queflion and put to his answer before that Pretor and supreme judg, who had required the advice of the Senat as touching that enquelt framed and drawn of purpole against him t knowing full well how the Senat was not well affected to him, and the people much more maliciously bent and fet against him. But the Tribunes of the Commons thought they would prevent and meet with this finching of his and ablenting himfelf, by intimation of another act and law provided in that behalf namely, that if he entered not into the City of Rome before the * Ides of November immeà diaty following, it should be lawfull for C. Licimus to proceed in judgment, and give sentence against him in his absence. This cord towed and haled him to Rome with a witnesse; and when he was returned and entred into the Senat, they were upon his top, and gave him such a welcome thither, as testified their displeasure and hard conceit of him. After he had been well baited and haken up among them, an act of Senat was entred in this wife, that to many of the Ligurians as had not been edemies, after the time that Q. Fulvin: and L. Marlins were Confuls, those the Pretors, C. Licinius and Cn. Sicinius, should restore and establish in their former state of treedoms and that the Conful C. Popiliss should fet them out lands to occupy and possesse beyond the Po. By vertue of this arreft, many a 100 were let free and enfranchifed, who being transported over the river Po, had land affigned unto them accordingly. Now M. Popilins upon the law Martia (promulged by the two Martii, Tribunes of the Com.) answered for himself judicially twice before C.C. Licinius. At the third time, the Pretor overcome with a respective grace and tavour to the Col. ablent, and the earnest praiers of the whole name and house of the Popilii, adjourned the defendant to make appearance into the court upon the * Ides of March: on which day the new magillrats were of enter into their offices: and this he did, because himself by that time should be 15, of Martes a privat person again & therfore not to fit upon the bench as judg to hear pleas and to determine.

Thus the aforefaid at as touching the Ligurians, finely thifted and cunningly avoided, came to

At that time the Carthaginian Embaffadors were at Rome, with Guluffa the fon of Malaniffa; between whom hard hold and much debating there was in the Senat. The Carthaginians complained, that over and befides the lands (about which there had been fent commissioners from D Rome before time, to view the place and to enquire into the caule) Mafaniff a within the laft two yeers and by force and arms possessed himself of more then threescore and ten towns and castleswithin the Garthaginian dominion and territory, and an easie matter was it for hin to to do, who midereckoning of nothing nor had regard of any person; whereas the Carthaginians were so tyed and obliged by their capitulations to the good-abearing, that they held their peace; for, inhibited they were to bear arms without their own countrey. And albeit they knew affuredly, that they fhould war within their own confines, if they dissiezed the Numidians of those peeces, yet scared they that one express article of the accord, where they were debarr d in plain terms, to, wage sgainst the associats of the people of Rome. Howbeit, the Carthaginians could no longer endure this pride. cruelty, and avarice. Sent therefore they were unto the Senat as humble orators that it might please them to grant one of these three requests : to wir, That either they might debate with indifferent audience before them (being allies to both alike) as touching the right of the one and the other; or that they would permit the Carthaginians to defend themselves by just and lawfullarms, against unjust and ungodly force : or elle finally (if partial favour swayed more with them then the truth of the caule) to let down at once what their pleasure was should be given away: outoftheir own, to Mafaniffa. For they yet, would have some gage of their hand, and knowwhat they gave ; whereas he himfelf had no fray, nor would ever fee to make an end ; fo untatiable wishis lult and appetite. But in cate they might obtain none of these points, and that there could befound any fault or trespats of theirs, committed fince the peace granted unto them by Scipio; then, that they rather then any other would chaltile them. For rather they had to live in ferviude under the figenory of Romans with lafety, then enjoy such a liberty as should be exposed with injuries of Majaniffa. And better it were for them to periff and die once for all, then to live and languish under the yoke of a most cruell and bloudy butcher. At which words the terrs trickled down their cheeks, and down they fell at their feet. Lying thus profitate upon the the ground, as they moved pity and compassion to themselves, for they procured despight and maliceagainst the King. Then thought good it was to demand of Guluffa, what he had to an (wer as touching thele matters ? or elfe (if he had to rather himfelf) to declare before, for what cule and upon what occasion he was come to Rome. Guluffa made answer, that neither it was exfistor him to deal in those points, wherof he had no commission from his father a nor for his father: to give him any such charge, considering that the Carthaginians, shewed not unto him of what business they would treat; not yet made him so much as privy of their coming to Rome, This only was known, that there was a close councel holden for certain nights, by the principal Seates of Canhage within the Temple of Afenlapins, from whence Embassadors were dispatched to Rome: with hidden messages. And this was the cause that his father had lent him to Rome, to beseech the Senat not to give credit to the flanderous acculations that should be preferred against himby thoughtet wete common enemies as well to them as him; who hated him for no other cause bus Hbbb 3

for that he had continued to conftant in his fealty and allegeance to the people of Rome. The Se-H nat it ushaving heard what they could fay of both fides, ist in connecli as touching the demands of the C rthaginians : and at length commanded this answer to be returned, how their advice and pleasure was, that Gataffa should pretently depart and go into Numidia, and give his subertounderstandrom them, that with all ipeed he fend his Embassadors to the Senar, as concerning thole complaints which the Carthaginians had made of him a alfo to give intimation and knowledg unto the Carthaginians, that they repair like wife thither to debate their controverfies & differences between them. And if it lay in their power to effect ought for the honor of Majaniffa, they would be as willing to do it hereafter, as they had been ready heretofore. Mary, to miniter jultice for favour and affection, that they would not do it in any wife. Willing they were that every man should know and hold his own, and keep him within compasse; neither minded they to let out I new limits, but to observe the old bounds. Indeed they bad granted to the Carthaginians, after they were conquered, both towns to inhabit, and territories to possesse; not to this end, that in time of Pauce they should pluck that away by wrong and outrage, which during the wars they could not take from them by martial law and force of arms. Thus was the yong prince, together with the carthaginiens, dismiffed. Pretents were given both to the one and the other, according to the order, and other courtelies of hospit lity were friendly observed. Much about the same time Cn. Servilius Capio, App. Claudius Centre, and T. Annius Luscus, Embassadors sent into Macedony, for to demand amends and restitution, and withall to discisin and renounce the Kings amity, returned to Reme. Who having related in order what they had ken and heard, enflamed the Senat more against Perfens, who were alreay of the mielves enkind. K led enough. They made report, "That through all the cities of Macedony they (aw prep ration " for war in all forcible manner; that when they came to the court, for many dates they could " find no means of accesse to the speech of the King; and in the end, after they were departed " from thence homeward (as being past all hope of parley with him), then and not afore, they were " called back again out of their way, and to brought unto his prefence : that the fum of their em-66 baflage and speech unto him was this, namely, to put him in mind of the league first contracted with Philip, & afterwards renued with himfell fince the death of his father, wherein by express " words he was inhibited to bear arms without his own frontiers, and likwife debared to levy war upon any confederat allies of the people of Rome : after this, that they had recounted and 16 laid abroad from point to point those specialties, which they themselves had lately heard King L " Eumenes to declare and discourse, which were all apparent truths, upon his own affured knowledg. Moreover, that the King held a lecret councel for many daies together, with the Embas. " lages of the Cities of Afa: in regard of which injuries, that the Senat thought it reason and e-"quity that he should make satisfaction, yea, and restore back both to them and also to their aflociats, what loever he held contrary to right, cont ined in the accord. That the King bere-"upon at the first fell into a fit of choler and indignation, and gave them hard terms, reproaching " at every other word the Romans for their coveronnels and infolency. And as for their Emballa-"dors that came unto bim one after another, he faid they were but spies, to listen and see what he did or faid; & no marvel, for they thought it meet that he should conform and same himself in "all his words and deeds, according to their beck and commandment. At the laft, when he had in M this wife discharged his cheler with high words & broad speeches for a long time, that he com-" manded them to repair again unto him the next morrow, for that he would give them their " anliwer in writing : and then he delivered unto them a script to this effect as followeth. First, as "touching the accord & covenant concluded with my father, that is nothing to me at al. If lintered it to be renued, it was not for any liking or approbation therefibut because theing new come to the crown, and lately pollefled of the Kingdome, I was to bear and endere all things what-"loever. But in cafe they will enter into a new league with me, aquifit it is that a treaty and a-" greement paffe fift of the conditions. And if they could be content that a covenant were drawn . with equall and indifferent espitulations, yet I will fleep upon it and be well advised what to do "for the beft, as I don't not but they like wife will have a good regard to the profit of the Com. N "monweal. And herewith, that he fuddainly flung away from them, and we all began to avoid "out of the pallace. Whereupon we proceeded according to our commission to abandon and "duayow his amity and lociety. At which word of ours, he staied in great wrath and lury, and "with a land and shrill voice, warned as upon our own perili and hazard, to be gone out of the "marches of his realm within three daies . finally, in this maner we departed and put our felves " in our journey, and found neither friendly welcome at our full coming, nor any courteous entertains ent while we were there, nor yet a kind farewell at our departure. When they had once done, the Theffelian and Ætolian Embaffadors had audience. The Sense, to the end that they might know out of hand, what captains and commanders the commonwest was to employ, thought good to write unto the Cost, that the one of other of them of (who first might) should repair to Rosse for the creation of new magistrats. And no great matter to speak of, as concerning the state, was that yeer done by the Coff, But more expedient a was thought for the commonweal, to suppresse and appeale the Ligurians, whose bloud was up and charted against them, confidering that the Macedonian war was in daily expectance.

Moreover, the Embaliadors of If a gave occasion, that Gentum allo King of Hyricum washed in jealouite : who at one time both complained of him, that now twice he had waited to A their country : and also made report, how the Macedonian and Illyrian Kings were all one. and logrest together, that with once confent and common counsel they prepared to war upon the Romans: finally, that the Illlyrians were now at Rome in thew and femblance of embaffage, but indeed and very truth, no better then fpies, addreffed on purpose by the motive and advice of Perfeut to hearken and learn whereabout they went at Rome. Thefe Illyrians were fent for into the Senat houle, and when they had faid, that they were emploied in emtassage from Kirg Gentins, to answer unto those accusations which it might be the Isleans framed against him : it was again demanded of them, How it hapned that they went not directly nor thewed themselves in such fort to the magiltrat, that according to the maner and cultome, they might have had their lodging provided and prefents given them, with the ordinary allowance of the City, meet for them during B their abode, that thereby knowledg might have been taken s well of their coming, as also of their bulinelle and errand? But being taken tripping and failing in their antwers they were commanded to void out of the Councel chamber. For thought it was not meet, to give them their disparch as Embaffadors, fince they made no means to prefent themselves unto the Senat : but rather they were of advice, to dispatch Embassadors of their own to the King, to fignific unto him, which of his affociats had complained unto the Senat, how he had burnt their villages within their territories : yes, and to tell you it plainly, that it was not well done of him, that he could not forbear but do wrong to his own allies. In this embassie were fent, A. Terentus Varro, C. Pletorius, and Likewife those Embassadors, whose commission was visit the associat Kings, returned out of 64, and reported that in the laid Affa they had communication with Eumenes; in Syria with An-C tuches, and in Alexandria with Ptolomans: who all of them had been follicized by fundry embalfies of Perfem, howbeit they perfitted firm and falt in their professed fealty, and promised to perform whatfoever the people of Rome would command them. Alfo that they went to the confederathates, whom they found true and loiall enough, excepting the Rhodians only, whom they perceived to be floring & wavering, as altogether infected & portoned with the counted of Perfeut

Now were the Rhodian Embafiadors cone to answer those things which they knew were commonly bruited aboad touching their City : howbeit the Senet w s not of mind to give them andience, before the new Confels entred into their office. But they were all of advice to delay no longer the preparation for war. C. Licinius the Pretor had in charge, out of the old Quinqueremes which were laid up in the docks and harbors, to repair as n any as might ferve at fea; to Dig also and prepare a fleet of sotail. But if he could not come to make up that full number, then to write unto his colleague C. Memmins in Sicily, for to repair, calk and trim those thips which were in Sicily, that with all speed possible they might be sent to Brundusium. The laid Pretor C. Licinius was commanded to enroll of Roman citizens (and thole, Libertins, fuch as of bondmen born, had been enfanchifed) for mariners and failers, as m ny as might lerve 25 fhips: and Ca, Licinius had commission to levy as n'any of Latine allies for the like number of ships; sito the Pretor was enjoined to charge the Latine affices with 8000 foot, and 400 borfe. A. Actilius Serrans, who had been Pretor the yeer before, was cholen to receive thele totees at Brunduff. nm, and to conduct them over into Macedony : and Cn. Sicinius the Pretor was appointed to have the army in readiness for to be transported. As for C. Leciniar the Pretor, he by authority from the Senat, wrote to C. Popilius the Conful that he should command the second legion, which had been longest emploied in Liguria, and conflitted of the most experienced louidiers, together with four thouland footmen and two hundred horse of the Latine allies, to be ready at Brundue fam upon the * Ides of February. With this fleet of ships and torces of fouldiers, Cn. Sicinies 13 of November was commanded to keep Macedony, untill one were appointed to fucceed him; and for this purpole his charge of command was continued for a yeer longer. All thele directions of the Senat wereput in execution with great diligence and expedition. Eight and forty Quinquereins were in affore out of their docks : and L. Porcins Licinius was ordained to conduct thein to Bundusium : the other 12 were fent out of Sicily. Three Emballadors were dispatched into Apulia and Cala. bia, to wit, Sex. Degitius, T. Inventius and M. Cacilius, for to buy corn to ferve the fleet and thearmy. Now when all things were provided and in readiness, C. Siein us the Pretor departed from the City in his warlike coat of arms, and arrived at Brunaufum. A rout the end of the year C. Replanthe Conful returned to Kome, lome what latter then the Senat had ordained; who was commanded to take the first time, and withall speed to creat new magistrats, considering that so great awar approached to neer. And therefore when the Confull discourfed in the temple of Bellona as touching his exploits in Ligaria, the LL of the Senat were nothing well pleased to hear him. hain stead thereof, they muttered every where, and asked him oftentimes, Why he had not reflored to liberty those Ligurians, who were oppressed through the wicked proceedings of his sther? The election of the Contals was holden upon the twefth day before the Calends of March scording to the writs that went out: wherein were created Confuls, Pub. Licinus Gracebus and Cains Caffins Longinus. The morrow tollowing, the Pretors were elected, to wit, Caises Salmus Galba, L. Fursus Philus, L. Canilius Dives, C. Lucretius Gallut, C. Caninsus Rebutius, and LVilling Annalis. To thele Pretors the provinces were affigned in this manner : that two of them Mould it as LL chief juffices in Rome for civil jurisdiction: three other to have the government of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia: to as the fixt only should remain not allosted to any place, te to be emploied wherefoever the Senar would think good and findein. The Confuls elect were commanded by the Senat, upon the folemn day when they were to enter into their magi- H firsey, after they had facrificed greater beafts, as it appertained, to pray in this form, that the gods would vouchfafe the war which the people of Rome intended now to enterp onful flouid well and come to happy iffue. The fame day the Senat decreed, that C. Popilius the fet out plaies for ten daies together in the honor of Inp. Opt. Max, and the offcings should be made at all the shrines and altars, it so be commonweal continued for ten yeers, in the lame good eflate as now it flood. And as the Scnat ordained, the Conful vowed into the Capitoll, that the faid plaies should be exhibited, scofflings were presented of as great value as it pleased them to see down. This yow was pronounced by the Conful in the prefence of no lewer then 150 Senstors, and according to that form of words which Lepidus the high-prieft or loveraign Bilhop indited. That yeer died certain Prelats of State, to wit, L. Emplem Pappus ene of the Decem- I virs or superindents over the holy rites, and Q. Futerns Flacens a Bushop, who the yeer before had been Cenior. This man had a il end. It fortuned that news came unto him of his two fons, who then ferved in the wars of Illyricam, how the one was departed out of this life, and the other lay fick of a grievous and dangerous malady. The forrow for the one, and the fear for the other, hapning to just at one time, brake his heart and oppressed his spirits a informach as the next morning, when his tervants entred betimes in to his bed-chamber, they found him hanged by a cord, and firangled. It was thought abroad, that he had never been his own man, fince he was Cenfor, and commonly it was spoken, that Juno Leeinia in wrathfull displessure against him for spoiling her temple, bereit him of his right wits. In the room of Amplius, M. Valerius Maffala was fobilituted Decemvir : and in itead of Fulvins there was elected Archailhop, Cheus Dominis K

Enobarbus, who to fay the truth was very yong to be made a priest.

In the year wherein P. Liemms and C. Cafrins were Centuls, not only the City of Rome, and the whole land of Isaly, but all the Princes and States of Europe St. Afia, were amuied repedively upon the war between the Macedonians and Romans. Eamenes (King of Afra) not only earlied an old cankred malice against Philip, but also was pricked for ward with new despite and anger upon a tresh occasion, in that by the wicked practite of Perfeus, he had like to have been factificed at Delphi. Pruffas King of Bubynia, was refolved not to enter into arms, but attend the iffue of the war. For he thought it not reason and seemly for him to take arms in the defence of the Romans against his wives brother; and this account was made, that if Perfens hapned to have the better, he might foon obtain pardon at his hands by the mediation of his filler, driarates King L of the Cappadocians, over and besides that he had promited aid to the Romans in his own name, ever fince that he had linked in affinity to Eumenes, drew the fame way which he went, and joyned with him in all his counfels both of war and peace. As for Ansiechus [King of Syria] uis teeth watered verily at the Kingdome of Agypt, as he, who despited as well the childhood of the yong King in his nonage, as the weaknesse and negligence of his guardians; and considering there was some controversic about the title of Caleforia, he supposed that he should have good occasion to levy was, to manage also and exploit the same without emperchment, whiles the Romans were buffed in the Macedonian war; howbeit as well by his own Embaffadors fent unto the Senat, as allo unto theirs addressed unto him, he promised flowly to be for them. Proloma-" [the yong King of Ægypt] being yet under age, was at the disposition of others : his tutors and M protectors, as they prepared to wage war against Assischus for the recovery of Califyria. so they promifed the Romans withall to do their devoir in the Macedoman war. Maffaniffa [King of the Numidians] was altogether for the Romans ; he furnished them with com, and intended to fend his fon Mafagenes with aids both of men and elephants in that fervice. Howbeit he to difpoled of his deligns, as might ferve his turn which way foever the world went for if the viday fell to the Romans, he ordered that his affairs should temain still in the tame sate; and better he was not to look for, because the Romans would not suffer any violence to be offered unto the Carthaginians; but in case the Romans went down and had the overthrow (who then protected the Carthaginians) then he made tuil reckoning of Affato be his own. Gentini [King of llyricum] had to demeaned himfelf, that he was inspected of the Romans ; yet was hence fully refol- N wed which fide to take unto and it feemed he would joyn to one or the other, more upon a fit as ittook him in the head, than with any diferetion or advice. Coiss the Thracian, King of the Odryfians, took part evidently with the M cedonians. In thefe terms (I fay) flood the KK, as touching this prefent war. As for the free Cities and States befides, the common people every where (as al water lightly it is feen enclined to the worle part, and ram with the K. & the Micedonians: but the principal persons and men of quality, a man might perceive affected diversly. Some went with the Romans all upon the head, infomuch as they greatly empaired their authority in excessive favour to them : few of them were induced by the just and apright government of the Romans, but the most part were carried away with the strong conceit, that the more they emploied themselves for them, the greater men they should be at home in their own Cities, Another fort there were of the Kings flattering favorits, who being deeply drenched in debt, anddefpair of bettering their fortune (it the present flate held flill) abandoned and gave themselves over to entertain all changes and innovations. And fome there were befides, possessed with a vain humor of their own, because Perfeus feemed to have more favour of the common people. Athird for there were (and those of the best and wifest of all other) who if it had lyen in their hands to deA they would have to be greater lord, wiffied to have been under the Romans rather then the K. Mary if they might have had their liberty to be chulers simply of their fortune, by their good will they would not have had the one part advanced by the depression and subversion of the other : but that the forces and puillance of them both remaining entire and unfoiled peace therby might be entertained and to between them both, the frate of the Cities should continue in the best care. when as the one part might ever protect the weaker fide from the injuries of the mightier. And thole that flood affected thus held them quiet & faid not a word; but being fafe themselves beheld the behaviour and deportments of thole that were the partakers and favourers of either fide.

The Confuls that day, wherein they entred their government, when they facrificed (according to the ordinance of the Senar) with greater bealts in all the temples and chappels, wherein (for s most part of the yeer) the facred beds and couches for the gods were prepared; and thereby had preliged by good tokens, that their praiers were acceptable to the immortall gods, made report unto the Senat, That their facrifices were as they ought to be, as also their prairies, which they conceived as touching the war. The Bowell-priers like wife by their learning declared, that if they went about any new enterprife, they should make speed; for why? alldid prognosticate vi-Boty, triumph, and enlargement of their feignory. Whereupon the LL of the Senat commanded the Confuls to propole to the people the first day of the general assembly of the Conturies in this maner: In the name of God, and to the welfare and happine fe of the Commonwealth: whereas Perlenuthe fon of Philip K. of Macedony, (against the accord and covenant concluded with his father first, and after his death renemed with bim) hath levied war upon the allies of the people of Rome. walled their territories, feized their Cities, complotted to enter into arms against the people of Rome, and te that end bath provided armor, fouldiers and a fleet : unleffe he make fatisfaction, pleafeth it jouthat war be enterprised and waged against him. This bill passed by all the suffrages of the people. Then was there an act of the Senat likewife entered, that the Confuls fhould either agree. together, or elfe cast lots for the provinces of Italy and Macedony : and look whose lot fell to Macedens, he should persecute with fire and sword K. Perseus, and all that sect and faction which took his pirt, unlesse they made amends to the people of Rome. It was concluded also, that four legions should be newly enrolled, for either Conful twain: with this preheminence and advantage to the province of Macedony, that whereas to the legions of the other Conful (according to the arrcient custome) there went but five thousand foot and two hundred horse speece, there should be enrolled for Macedony fix thousand foot and three hundred horse equilly to a legion, Alfo for the one of the Confuls in the army of the silies, the number was augmented, to as belides those fix hundred horimen which Cn. Sicszins had conducted already, he should of those allies transport over into Macedony, fixteen thousand footmen and eight hundred horie. As for-Italy, twelve thouland footmen of allies and fix hundred horse were thought sufficient. Moreoverthis prerogative had the Province of Macedony, that for Centurions and fouldiers the Conjul might enroll of the elder fort whom he thought good as many as were not above fifty yeers of age. In thoofing of Tribunes military and colonels, the old maner was this yeer changed, in regard of the Macedonian war; to wit, that the Confuls(by advice and authority of the Senat) thould move unto the people, that the faid Tribunes might not that year be elected by voices of the people, but that their elections should be referred to the judgment and discretion of the Confuls and Pretors. The charge of command was thus divided among the Prevors as followeth That Pretor whose lot fell to go whither it pleased the Senat to send, was assigned to take his journey to the fleet at Brundusium, and there to survey and revise the sea-servitors, and look how miny he thought not meet for fervice, them to discharge, & to make up the number with chosen Libertines; and in any wife to order it fo, that two third parts conflitted of Roman naturall citizens, and the other third of allies. Item, That provision of victuals for the navy and the army. should be brought out of Sicily and Sardinia. And the Pretors of those two provinces had in tharge to exact a double tenth of the Sicilians and Sardinians, and this grain to be converghed into Macedony for the army. Now Sicily fell to C. Caninius Rebulus, Sardinia to L. Furius Philus. and Spain to L. Canulesus. C. Sulpitius Galba was L. chief suffice for the citizens of Rome, and L. limins Annalis for the strangers: but C, Lucretius Gallins his lot was to go where the Senat would employ him. Between the two Confuls there was some jur and wrangling, rather then any great debate about their province. Cassius for his part faid, That he was by the right to war in Macedeny without any casting of lots for the matter, for almuch as his colleague might not enter into lot with him, and fave his oath. For he being Pretor, had fworn folemnly in a frequent affembly of the people (because he would shift off and not go into his province) that he had occasion to celebrate facrifices in a certain place and upon fet daies, which could not be performed (as they ought) if he were at ica. And the lame (as I take it) cannot be well done during his ablence now. that he is Conful no more then whiles he was Pretor. Howbeit, if the Senat be of opinion and log, that more confideration is to be had to latisfie Caius Licinius his will now in the Confulhip, then regard of the oath he took before in the Pretorship, yet will I not with sanding accommodat my felf to the pleasure of the Senat. The LL, were consulted with hereaubout, who lidging that it were a proud part to deny him the government of a province, noto whom the people of Rome had granted the dignity of a Confulfhip, commanded the Confuls to cast lots. Thus, Macdony fell to P. Licinius, and Italy to C. Cafsius. Then they put to lottery also the conduct and emploiment of the legions: whereby the first and third were to be transported into the Macedony, the second and fourth to remain in Italy. In the must sering and choise of out-diers, the Consal went more neerly and streightly to work by fax, then customably they used at other times. As for Licinus, he enrolled the elder fortals, as well for soldidity as centurions 3 and m ny there were who voluntarily entred their names, because they as the host chirdred well and grew rich, who had served either in the former Macedonian says how those thrived well and grew rich, who had served either in the former Macedonian war, against Antiochus in Asia. Now when as the marshale Colonels called forth the centurions by name one after another, and the principal sins, there happed to be three a not twenty centuring by name one after another, and the principal sins, there happed to be three and twenty centuring the same of the sins and best place, and

* The Ceasuri ons of them, who beforetime had been Primipalares, had led in the chief and belt place, and ons in the iere, when they were cired, they called unto the Trib. of the Com. for to be relieved by their lawfull ward over the affiftance. But two of that fellowship and society of Iribunes, namely, M. Fulvina Nibility, and I Triarii who are M. Fulvinin Marcellus, referred them to the Confuls, alledging, that by right, the knowledged called allo Picalled allo ". thele marrers periaining to those who had plenary commission to take multers, and to manage lost, For to befider many or the war-affairs. But all the reft of the Tribunes avowed that they would affume it into their own the, witnesseth hands, and determine of that for which they were called unto as competent judges; yea, and it Oold, 38 24, injurie were offered to their fellow-citizens, they would not fail but help and incour them. All intuite veries, they was M. Poblikks, a Confular man, called to the In these verters, this was debated in the Tribunes court. Thither was M. Popilike, a Confular man, called to the tum dens fe- hearing of this matter, and thither repaired the centurions and the Conful allo. And when the crevit in a be Conful required that the case should be heard and decided in a generall assembly, thereupen the Rosenias, Har people was immoned to meet in publick together. In which folemn congregation M. Popilius who had signified to the confidence of the confidence part decen : Er had been Conful two years before spake in behalf of the centurions to this effect, "These marriall K que accom : es men (quoth be) have accomplished their full time of service required by law; they carry about 1.1.dem Pillanus them bodies as well fpent and crafte for age, as broken by continual travels : ho wheir refule they habebat Corpora et will nothing, but are ready to do their devoir unto the Commonweal. This only they hambly leg time quifque "crave and requelt, that they may not be affigned to bafer places of command, then wherein they "have been emploied already when they bare arms. Then P. Liemius the Conful commanded, was the chief the act of the Senat to be openly read : wherein it was ordeined full to levy war upon Perfem ; the nto enroll as many as they could of the old experienced Centurions for that war, and aft of all of Centurions exempt none from fouldiery but fuch only as were above fifty years of age. When he had thus faid, the Confuls highly commended him, and from before the people brought him into the Senat. And there also by the advice and authority of that honorable house, thanked he was, and the Marshal-Colonels, in regard of his vertue, appointed him tobe the principall Centurion of the Pilani in the first legion. So the rest of the Centurions renomeing their appeal to the Tribunes, yeelded obedience in the muster and levy above faid.

To the end that the Magistray's and great commanders might go more timely into their governments, the Latine fealts and holydries were published to be holden upon the Calends of Jane. C. Decimina, and A. Licinius Nerva.

At the very same time therefarived Embassadors from King Perseas. But suffered they were not to enter into the City; confidering that both the Senat had ordained, and the people affented altedy to make war upon their King and the Macedonians. So, admitted they were into the Temple of Bellows before the Senat, where they delivered their message in this manner : That King Performarvelled, why there were armies transported over into Macedony? And if the Senat might be intrested to much, as to recall them home, the King would make fatisfaction for the wrongs done unto their allies, in such fort as the Senat in their discretion would appoint. Now there was in the Senat-house at that time Sp. Carviline, Sent back for that very purpose out of Greece from Ca. Siemius. He made report and remonstrance, how Perrhabia was forced by arms, and certain Cities of Theffaly won: with other exploits that King Perfens had either performed, or elle was in hand to enterprise. To which challenges the Embassadors were commanded to make answer, But therthey were leen once to falter in their speech, saying they h d no farther commission then that heyhad delivered already; they were willed to relate unto the King their mafter, th t P. Lieiniwite Conful would shortly be in Macedony with an army, unto whom the King might address his Embassadors, if he minded to do as he faid and to make amends. As for fending any more to lans, there was no need nor cause, total much as they would not suffer any of them to pass through lish. When they were dismissed with this short dispatch, P. Licinius the Conful had in charge, to mmand them to go out of lealy within 11 dajes, and to fend Sparins Carvilius for to guard them white way to the fea-fide untill they, were shipped. These occurrents passed in Rome before this Confuls were gone into their provinces.

Now by this time Cu. Sicinius (who ere that he left his migistracy), was sent before as far as to Banadasium to the sect and the army) having put over not Epirus 3000 foot and 300 horte; was encamped before XI, map banum in the territory of the Apollonius, From thence before certain colonels with 2000 fouldiers, to feet the forts and castles of the Dassarctians and Illyrians, by occasion that they of their own accord made meanes and sent for garrisons, to the end they made the bester garried & secured from the violence and invasion of the Macedonians bordering upon their

Some few daies after, Q. Martini, A. Attiliut, P. and Str. both Cornelii and Lentuli, together with L. Decimins, who all had been fent in embassic into Greece, brought them to Corery a one bouland footmen: where they both patted between themselves their feveral quarters whither they would go, and also their fouldiers. Decimins was fent to Geneius King of the Hyrians, with the manadment, If he faw him any waits coming on and enclined to entertain a mity with the Ro-Rus, to found him and give the assay, yes, and to draw him into the association of this war.

The two Lentuls were fent into Cephalenia, from thence to traverie and croffe over into Pela-H ponnefer, and before winter to fetch about and compate the coult of the Well-les, Maring & Artins were assigned to vifit Epirus, Esolia and Theffalis, From thence they were enjoyned to have an eye into Bestia and Entera, and to to fail into Peleponnefut where they appointed to meet with the Lensuli. But before that they departed from Coregon letters were brought from Perform, wherin he demanded what reason the Romans had either to transport shy feeces into Greet or to feiz upon the Cities? thought good it was to return him no answer by writting, but only by word of mouth thus much to fay unto the meffenger that brought the letters, That the Romans did it for the defence and fateguard of the said towns. The Lentuli as they rode their circuit villing the Cities and rowns of Poloponne fus, exhorting the States and commonalities thereof ind firently one as well as another. To aid the Romans at this prefent against Perfent, with femblable courage of and like fidelty as they had flood with them first in the war against Philip; and afterwards in that with Antochus; might here in their publick affemblies much muttering and grumbling therest. The Achains (who from the very beginning of the Macedonian war had been lingether for the Romans, and during the war against Philip, enemies to the Macedonians) took it in dildsin that they were reputed in the same ranke with the Messeni ns and Eleans, and no better then they who had both arms against the people of Reme, for Antiochus their enemierand who but the other day, being enrolled into the commonality and counfell of the Acharas, complained that they were delivered unto the victorious Achaens, as the tecompence and guerdon of their corquelt. Mars. ms and Attilus as they went up to Gitana a town of Epirus, ten miles from the lea, in a general Connecl holden there of al the Epirots, had audience with great-contentment of them al. Four hun- K dred of their yong and able luby men they fent into the Oriftians countrey to lie in gerrifon for defence of thole Macedonians who by them were fet at liberty. From theme, they held on their progress into Ledia; and after they h. d tojorned there tome few daies (whiles a new Pretor was elected in the room of him that was deceated, and Lycifeus appointed the governor, a man known for certainto favour the Romans) they palsed over into Theffaly. Thither repaired the Embassadors of the Acarmanians and the banished persons of Listia. The Acarmanians wereen-Joyned to utter and declare before them what they had committed and done against the people of Rome, being inveigled and deceived by the promifes of the two Kings Philip and Antischus during the wars against the one and the other; fince occasion was now presented unto them, for to make amends and talve all that was amils. For if upon their ill demerits towards the people of Rome, they had made triall and tafted of their elemency, they might now by good deferts prove their boundy another while. As for the Bootians, they were reproved and upbraided for entring into association with Perfens : and when they seemed to lay the whole fault upon I finenias a captain of one of the two factions, and certain Gities and States which being of a different opinion were drawn to the fide; Say ye fo? (quoth Martins again) and that fhall foon appear, for we all permit every commonalty and City to aniwer apart and leverally for themlelves the bell they can.

Now was the Diet of the Theis lians holden at Lariffa a where, as the Theis lians took good occasion and found ample matter of thankigiving the Romans, for the liberty which by their goodness they had obtained : so as the Roman legats had as copious an argument to render them thanks, for that first in the war with Philip, and afterwards of Antischus, they had been so mightily aided by the Thessalian nation. Thus by this muruall reheartall of pleasures and good turns M given and taken, the hearts of the multitude were enkindled with a fervent zeal to decree and ordain whatsoever it pleased the Romans to desire. After this councell was distolved, there came Embaisadors from K. Perfeus unto Martins, upon a speciall affiance of the privat friendship and hospitality which had passed between his father King Philip, and the faid Martin [and his father.] These Embaisadors began the speech with a commemoration of the said familiar and inward acquaintance, requesting him to permit the K. for to have access unto him, and to comman together. Martius antwered, that he also had heard his father speak of the amity and mount bolpitality between him and K. Philip : in regard and remembrance of which neer bond of lamilisty he was the more willing to take upon him the charge of that embassage and commission. At to the party, he would not have deterred it at all, if he might commodically have wrought it? & now for this prefent he promited (to foon as he polsibly could) to fend his countriers before to advertise the King, that they might come to the tivet Penius, whereas the passage lieth from O molium over to Dam. And verily at that time, Perfeus was retired from Dimminto theinland quarters of his realm, and had gathered some prety gale of hope, in that Martist had given out, how for love of him he had undertaken this embassic. After some few dates they repaired to the place appointed. This King accompanied with a great train as well of his friends, as his counters and pensioners which guarded his person. The legats likewise were attended upon with no less a troop, by reason as well of many that followed them from Lariffa, as also of divers embassages from the States which assembled at Lariffs, and were defirous to carry home with them certain news of the sequel, which they should hear. Every man had an inward defire selled in his hear to see the maner of the meeting of this noble K. & these high commissioners from the soveraign ftate and mightieft people of the whole world. Being come to the enterview one of another, they Rood ftill on either fide of the river, which only parted them alunder. For a while there paised entercorriers between whiles they made it ftrange on both parts; who should part the river find, for the Macedonians flood fomewhat upon the totall majetty of a King; & the Romans were at

A respective to the reputation of the people of Rome, considering withall, that Perfeus sought the means & made first motion for this parley. Whereupon, to end this controverse, Martins cast out a merry word, What needs all this (qd.he) let the younger come to the elder without more ado, and the fon to the father: this he spake, for that himself also was surnamed Philip. The K soon condescended thereunto. But then arose another doubt and difference, namely, with what number he fhould pass over. The K. thought it meet & convenient to come with his whole train : but the legats would have had him either to bring over with him three persons, and no more; or else if he were minded to pass with so great a company, to put in hostages for assurance, that during the time of the parley no outrage should be committed. So Perfeus sent as pledges, Hippias & Pantanchus, the principal and most especial friends that were about him, whom also he had employed Bin the embaffage. Now were these hostages required not so much for a gage & pawn of security, as that it might appear unto the allies there prelent, that the K in meeting and communing with the Roman Commissioners, should not keep state comparable with him, but abate somewhat of of the port and majecty which they carried. Their mutual greeting and falutation was nothing frange, as between enemies; but kind and amiable, as among familiar friends. Which done, they far them down upon their chairs fer ready for them. After they had thus fitten a while in filence andfaid nothing, Martius began in this manner: "You expect (I suppose qd,he) that we should The Oration "answer to your letters which you sent to Corcyra, wherein you demand, Why we are come in of Maritim Phi-"embaffie and commiffion after this manner with armed fouldiers, and plant garrifons as we do "in every City? "to see again hereaster. I must (torsooth) give account for the Thebans, who as it is well known, H "perished by shipwrack: as also for the murder of Arterarus; and yet therein I am no deeper " charged than thus, that the murderers of him lived in exile & were shadowed within my realm. "Now furely this hard conclusion and unreasonable condition I will not refuse to undergo, in case or you also will be content to take upon you and avow all those crimes and facts, for which they " fland condemned, who as banished persons have fled either to Rome or into Italy: but incale 66 both you and all other nations will dilayow that, I also will be one among the rest. And in good 6 faith, to speak uprightly, to what end should any man be banished from one country, if he may " not find a place in another, and be permitted there to live in exile? And yet (fo foon as ever I " found by advertisement from you that they were within Macedony) I for my part made diligent " fearch untill I had them, and then I commanded them to depart out of my kingdom, yea, and ex. I or pressely forbad them for ever setting foot again within my dominions. And thus much verily concerning the criminal matters objected unro me as a defendant pleading at the bar. Now let " us argue and debate the rest, inforced and laid against me in quality of a King, namely, which "concern and touch the accord contracted between me and you. For if the words run in this fort and are thus written in the foresaid covenants of accord, That I may not be suffered to defend "my felf and my realm, no, not if any enemy of mine levy war against me; then I must confess "indeed, that the league I have broken, in that I flood upon my gnard and defence by force of arms against Abrupolis, an affociat of the people of Rome, But if it were lawfull for me fo to do "by warrant of the accord, and allowed also by the law of nations, by force to repell force; what " fhould I leis,nay, what could I elie have done I pray you? When Abrupolis had laid waste the K "frontiers of my kingdom even as far as to Amphipolis, led into captivity many persons stees born, carried away a mighty number of slaves, and driven before him many thousand head of cattell; should I have sitten still and suffered him untill he had come armed to Pella, evenunto my royall palace? But some man may haply say. You did well indeed and justly in making head and purfuing him by force of arms, mary, vanquished he should not have been neither ought he to have inffered those calamities which follow men vanquished. Why? if I have endured the force tune therof, provoked as I was to war, how can he justly complain of tasting the like, being himes felf the cause and first motive of all? I will not use the same manner of desence (O Romans) to this, that by force of arms I have repressed the Dolopians: for if I have not done by them accoret ding to their demerits, yet I am fure I have dealt by the vertue of the right I have over them be-L er ing as they are of mine own kingdom, under my obeyfance, and made subjects to my father even "by a decree of your own drawing, And yet, were I to render a reason of my proceedings against "them, I fay, not unto you nor unto my allies, but even to those who like not of any cruel com-"mand fo much as over bondflaves; can I be thought to have exercised more rigor against them, "than equity and reason would bear? For, Eupbranor, whom I deputed governor over them, they "killed in such fort, that death is too good for them, and the least punishment of all others that "they have deferved. And as I marched forward in my progress from thence to visit the Cities of Lariffa, Antron, & Pylleon, I ascended up to Delphi, there for to facrifice, to the end that I might "discharge my conscience & pay those vows which I had of long time owed Now to aggravate "matter in this also against me, it is said moreover, that I was there with my army, and intended M " (no doubt) for to feiz Cities into my hands, and put garrifons into fortreffes; for which at this or present I complain of you. Call the States and Cities of Greece together to a generall affembly, " through which I passed. We fent indeed garrifons to the Ætolians and Bizan-"tins, yea, and with the Bootians we contracted amity. But these things, in what sort, & for what or purpose they were done, my embassadors have not only declared, but also excused oftentimes before your Senat: where I found fome Umpires to hear and decide my cause, although not so "indifferent and fav ourable to me ward, as your felf are, O Martin, my fathers old friend and fa-" miliar. For as yet Eumenes my accuser was not come to Rome, who by falle suggestions, wretting N "at his pletfure every thing to the worst, to make all suspicious and odious unto you, went about to make you beleeve that Greece could not possibly be restored to freedom, & enjoy the fruit of " your gracious benefit, so long as the kingdom of Macedony stood entire and upright, Well, the "world you shall see, will turn about; and anon one or other will be here, to make remonstrance "and prove, That to no purpose Antiochus is removed and confined beyond the mountains of "Taurus; that Eumenes is become much more grievous and unsupportable to all Asiathan An-"tiochus ever was : and that your allies cannot be at rest nor live in quiet, so long as he keepeth " his royal court in Pergamus, a Cittadel(as it were loverlooking and commanding all the neigh-"bour Cities bordering thereupon. Right well I know, O Q. Martius, and you A. Attilius, that "what soever either you have objected against me, or I answered for my defence & purgation, is O "fuch as the ears and affections are of the hearers; neither what I have done, nor what mind and "intention I have carried in mine actions will be so much regarded, as how you take everything "either done orintended. Mine own conscience beareth me witness, that willingly I have not "faulted; now, if for want of knowledge and forefight I have been overfeen and done somewhat " amils it may be corrected and amended by this present chastisement. This I am sure,my trespass "is not incurable, neither have I committed ought that you should deem worthy to be purined

which hardly are worth the complaint and the reasoning about, you be ready to enter into arms wand levy war upon your confederat Princes. Martins for that time accorded to his freech, and moved him to address embaffadors to Rome, being of advice and opinion himself to try all means to the very last point, and to let flip nothing whereof fome hope of good might arise, It remained only to be debated in conneill, how embaffadors might pais in fastry. And to this purpose, when it was necessary for the K-to request a surcease of arms, albeit Martins himself was willing and defirous thereoff for that his drift was to nothing else by all this conference and parley yet he seemed to make a hard matter and difficulty of it, and to do a speciall favour and pleasure unto Perfecial Beganding his petition. The truth was, the Romans yet were not ready, nor throughly appointed at this present for the war: they had neither army puissant enough, nor captains sufficient: whereas Perfect (but that he was a blinded in all his coincils with a vain hope of peace) had all things prepared and in readiness, and might then have begun to wage war, as in the best and most opportune season for himself; so the worst and unfitted of all other times for his enemies.

After this parley and the abstinence of war assured faithfully on both parts, the Roman Commissioners were appointed and resolved to go into Babata, where there was begun already some trouble and commotion, by reason that certain States of the Bocotians were departed from the society of the common Councill, ever since it was reported back, how the Roman Legats made asswer that it should appear and be seen, what Cities they were indeed which took no pleasure Cohave any association with the King. And first the embassacors from Cheronea: afterwards from Thebas encountred them upon the way, who assured them that they were not present in that Thebas encountred them upon the way, who assured them that they were not present in that they were some the safeciation was concluded. To these embassages no asswer that they were only to give their attendance and sollow them to Chidesa.

At Thebes great variance there was, which arose by occasion of another strife and debate. In their folemn affembly for the election of the Prator of the Bottians, that part which had the repulle, in revenge of that in jury and diffrace, affembled the multitude and made a decree at Thebes. That the Bocotarches should not be received within their Cities: in such fort, as like banished menthey retired to Thespium: from whence for received there they were incontinently without any flay) being called again to Thebes upon better advisement and change of mind, they made D an ordinance, That if to the number of twelve privat persons held any conventicle or publike meeting together, they should be condemned to exile. After this, I fmenias the new Prator, a noblepersonage and of great puissance, by vertue of a decree adjudged them in their absence for to lole their lives. To Chalcis they were fled, and from thence to the Romans at Lariffa they went : where they declared that Ismenias was the cause of their affociation with King Perseus, Upon that forelaid difference, they grew to hot contention, yet embassadors from both parts came to the Romans, as well the banished persons and accusers of Ismenias, as also Ismenias himself. But so foonas the Roman Legats were come to Chalcis, the States and heads of other Cities (who every one by a speciall decree of their own had renounced association with King Persens) joyned with the Romans; whereat they took exceeding great contentment and joy. Ifmenias thought E it meet and reason that the Bocotian nation should be committed to the protection of the Romans. Whereupon arose a tumultuous fray & but that he fled into the Tribunall of the Legats to fave himself, he had escaped narrowly from being killed by the said exiled persons, with the help of their supports and favorits.

Also the City of Thebes, which is the capitall place of State within Bassia, was in great trouble and uproar; whiles fome drew to the K.others enclined to the Romans. Befides, there was a multitude of Coronzans and Haliartians gathered together to maintain the ordinance and decree as touching the affociation with the K. But fuch was the resolute persistance of the principall and this men, who shewed by the late calamities of Philip and Antiochus, how great the forces, and how happy the fortune was of the Roman empire, that the same multitude relented, and being F overruled, passed a new decree, to reverse and cancell the former consederacy with the King; sent those that were the motives and perswaders of contracting that amity to Chalcia for to satisfie and content the Roman Legats; yea & to conclude, were of advice to recommend the City to the faithfull patronage of the faid Commissioners. Martins & Attilius took great pleasure to hear the Thebans fing this note, they perswaded with them severally apart, and gave them counsell to send embaffadors to Rome for the renewing of this amity: but before all things they took order for the reforing of the banished persons: as for the authors of the confederacy contracted with the K. they by their own decree condemned. Having thus by this means infringed and made frustrat the Diet of the Bootians (the thing which above all they most desired) they took their journey to Pelopounefus, together with Ser Cornelius, whom they had fent for to Chalcis. For their fakes a 6 Councill was holden at Argos, where they demanded nothing elle of the Achean nation, but onto furnish them with 1000 fouldiers. This garrison was sent to the desence of Chalcis, untill the Roman army were transported into Greece. Martins and Attilius having thus dispatched all the affairs that they had to do in Greece, in the beginning of winter returned to Rome.

Then was there sent from thence about the same time an honourable embassic to the siles in Asia. These Embassadors or Legats were three in number, to wit, T. Clandius, P. Posthumius, and M. Junius, They in their circuit and visitation exhorted all their allies to take arms against Perseus, for the Romans. And the mightier and more wealthy any City was the more earnestly travelled H they there; became the interior States were like to frame and fort themselves surable to theexample and authority of the greater and superior. Now of all others the Rhodians were reputed of most import and consequence every way, for that they were able not only to favor with their countenance, but also aid and maintain with their forces this war: and by the perswasion of Hargefilus they had got together a fleet of forty fail, "This Hergefilus their foveraign Magifirate (whom they call Pritanis) had by many reasons prevailed with the Rhodians, to abandon the "hope they had by entertaining thele KK. (which they had found by often experience how vain " it was) and to hold themselves to the society and alliance of the Romans, the surest hold of all "others at that time in the world, as well for ftrength of forces as trufty affurance and fidelity. "There is intended war by them (qd,he) against Perfeut, and no doubt the Romans will require I of us the same provision and furniture of thips and lea-forces, which they have seen in their war "lately against Antiochin, and beforethat, against King Philip: and then you will be to feek, and " forced in great hafte to provide a fleet, when it were more time it should be let out and lent "forth, unleis ye begin betimes to repair and rig your ships unless, I say, you let in hand to surnish the same with failers and mariners. And with so much more endeavour, ought ye thus to do, "that by your deed and effectuall employment, you may refute and diffrove the falle imputations " where with Eumenes hath charged you. By these remonstrances induced they were insomuch as at the arrival of the Roman Legats aforesaid, they were able to shew unto them an armado of 40 thips ready rigged and well appointed, that they might know and see, they looked not for to be exhorted thereunto. And this embassage was of great moment and importance also to gain the K hearts of the States in Afa. Only Decimius returned to Rome without any effect of his errand and commission, nay, he ran into an ill name and obloquy, upon suspicion that he had received certain bribes of the Princes in Illyricum. Perfus upon the conference and communication had with the Romans, retired into Macedony and sent his Embassadors to Rome, to treat about the conditions of peace begun already with Matius: to other Embassadors also of his he gave his letters to carry to Byzantium and Roder: the tenor of which letters was one and the same directed to them all: namely, That he had communed with the Roman Legats, but he had so placed and couched as well what he heard as what he spake, that it might seem he gave not one foot unto them but gained the better hand in that dispute & debating with them. These Embassadors added moreover, and said unto the Rhodians, L "That they hoped affuredly there would be a peace, for that they by the motion and advice of " Martin and Attilius were addressed in embassie to Rome. Now if the Romans, say they, against the covenants of accord proceeded to levy war, then the Rhodians were to endeavour with all "the credit and power they have, to reunite the peace again; but if with all their prayer and entreaty they might not prevail, then they were to look about and labour this one point, That the " might and puilfance of the whole world were not devolved into the hands of that one people. 4 And as this imported and concerned all the reft, fo the Rhodians especially, who surmounted 60 other States in dignity and wealth, both which should be obnoxious and enthralled, if there " were regard and respect made of none but the Romans. The letters of the King and words of the Embassadors, were entertained with friendly audience, other effect they took none to change M their fetled minds : for now the authority of the better part began also to carry the greater Iway. But this aniwer was returned to them, & that by way of decree, That the Rhodians wished peace with all their hearts: but if it should come to war, their King and Master was neither to expect, rery, too exact any thing at their hands, to disjoyn the ancient amity which they held with the Romans, and which they had acquired by many and great deferts, as well in war as in peace. In their return f. om Rhodas, they went to the Cities of Baotia, and namely, to Thebes, Coronea, and Haliartus, from whom it seemed a thing extorted forcibly against their will, that they were difbunded from the King & clave to the Romans. The Thebans food firm and immoveable, although they were lomewhat discontented with the Romans, both for condemning their chief and principall Citizens, and also forrestoring the banished persons. But the Coronwans and Haliantians N upon an inbred and feeled favour by kind un o the Kings, fent Embassadors into Macedonia, requesting a garriton for their desence again? the excessive pride of the Thebans, To this embassiage the Kingthus answered. That a garrison he might not send, by reason of the truce made with the Romans: howbeit, he advertised them to maintain and guard themselves against the injuries of the Thebans all that ever they could: but yet fo, as they gave the Romans no cause to be their heavy friends, and so to proceed in rigour against them.

Marries and Attilies being come to Rome. made report of their embaffie within the Capitoll, in such manner, as in nothing they gloried more, than in deluding and deceiving the K, by means of a cellation from arms, and a pretended hope of peace. For so well appointed was he and surnished with all provision for war, and they contrariwise so unprovided every way, that he might O easily have possessed himself of all places of opportunity and advantage, before that their army could pass over into Greece. But now having this respit and time of the truce, as the King would come nothing better provided, so the Romans might begin the war, more fully furnished with all things convenient. Moreover, they related how they by their coming distracted and set a jar in the generall Council of the Bootians, io as by no means any more hereafter they can be rejoyned to the Macedonians by content and accord. The greater part of the Senat approved this service of

A theirs as performed with fingular diffretion and dexterity: But the old Senators and those that held in remembrance the ancient manner and custome of the Romans, said plainly, . That in all "the course of that embassie, they could see no Roman practice and dealing at all. Our ancestors " (fay they) were wont to war not by wait-laying and fecret ambushes, nor by skirmishes in the " night-feason, noryet by false semblant of running away and studden turning their sace again at "unawares upon their unprovided enemies; neither lought they to glorifie themselves by subtill "flights more than by true vertue and valour: Their ufe and manner was to intimate and publiffs "wars before they made any : yea, and to denounce and proclaim the same; otherwhiles also to "allign and appoint the very place where they went to strike a battell. According to this plain and "faithfull dealing, they detected and disclosed unto K. Pyrrhus, the Physician that would by poy-B" sonhave taken away his life: by the same they delivered bound unto the Faliscians the villarious "traitor that would have betraied the children of their K. These are the Roman fashions (124) "they)not to use the cunning calls and slie shifts of the Carthaginians, not the crasty policies of "Grecians, who ever reputed it more glorious and honourable by fraud to compais than by force "to furpais the enemy. Indeed other whiles for the present time, more good is done and greater "matters are effected by guile and policy, than by valour and vertue : but to fay a truth the cou-" rage of that enemy is for ever conquered, who is forced to confess, that he was vanquished not "by cunning nor by venture, but in just and lawfull war by main strength and close fight at handy "gripes. Thus spake the ancients, who had no great liking to the new-tound devices of these posttiding Howbeit, that fide of the Senat which made more reckoning of profit than of honefly, car-C ried it away and imported so much that not only the fifth embassie of Martius was approved, as well performed, but also himself was sent back again with certain Quinqueremes, with a mandar allo & commission to deal in the rest according as he should think to stand with the good of the Common weal. They dispatched likewise And. Artificus to seiz Lariffa in Theffaly; for sear lest if the term of truce were expired, Perfeus should send a garrison thither, and hold in his hand the capitall City of Theffaly. The faid Attilius had a warrant to receive 2000 footmen of Cr. Sicinius for to effect uat that er terrife. A fo P. Lentulus lately returned out of Achea was allowed the conduct of 300 fouldiers of the Italian nation, to the end that at Thebes he should endeavour to bring all Be tiaunder the obedience of the Romans. When all things were let in this forwardness. albeit they were at a point and fully refolved to make war, yet thought good it was to give audipence unto the embassadors of Perseus in the Senat; who rehearled and related in manner the fame reasons which were delivered by the Kingin the late conserence and parley. Much ado they made and laboured hard, to acquit the King of the imputation laid to his charge, for feeking the death of Eumenes; but with small probability or none at all: for the thing was too too apparant, In thrend they fell to prayer and intreaty: howbeit, no ear was given unto them, with any fuch mind and heart, as could be either instructed or inclined. Instead thereof, warned straightly they were to depart immediatly forth of the liberties of Rome, and within thirty daies out of Italy. After this, P. Licinius the Gol, who was charged with the Province of Spain, had commandment given him to affign unto the army the foonest day that he could, for to meet in one certain place. C. Lucrelius the Prator who had the conduct of the fleet, took his leave of the City with forty E Quinquetemes: for advited it was that the rest of the ships which had been repaired, should be flaid athome for to be employed otherwise about the City And the Prator sent his brother Lucretius before with one Galeace or Quinquereme & commission to receive of the allies that shipping which by covenant they were to find; and with them near the Island Cephalenia, to joyn with the rest of the armado: to wit, from the Rhegins one trireme ga"ly, from the Locrians twain, from the Utilis 4. With which he coasted along Italy, and having doubled the utmost point of Calabria within the Ionian sea, he arrived at Dyrrhachium. There he found 19 gallions or barks of Advisite. the Dyritachians, 12 of the Islans, and 54 belonging to K Gentius: which he took all with him along, making semblance that he supposed they were provided of purpose for the service of the Romans: with this fleet by the third day he fell with the Isle Corpbu: and so forward he made sail fand arrived at Cophalenia, C.Lucresius the Prator, having loosed to sea from Naples, crossed the straights of Sicily, and on the fiftieth day cut over likewife to Cephalenia. Then the fleet struck anchor expecting as well the arrivall of the land-forces, as also that the hulks and vessels of carriige which were scattered upon the seas from the rest of their company, might overtake them. It happed about this time, that Pub. Licinius the Cof, having conceived and folemnly made his vows within the Capitoll, departed in his coat of arms from the City. A folemnity at all times verily this is, done with much dignity and ma jefty : but especially with exceeding great pleasure and contenument of the beholders; when the Col, is accompanied with a stately train at his first serlingforth, to encounter some great and famous enemy, tenowned as well for vertue, as quality and forume: for at such a time men assemble and gather together, not only in regard of duty to acquire themselves of their devoir, but also upon a desire they have of the very shew and sight presented, motheir eyes; namely, to fee their captain to whose conduct and counsell they have committed the manging and defence of the Common-weal. Moreover, they took occasion thereby to this is, of the hazard of war, how adventurous is the event, and how doubtfull the juice of bartell in the field. They call to mind the alternative confe of good fortune and bad; and namely, how by the blind ignorance or the unadviled rathbels of leaders, many foils and overthrows have happed;

and contrari wile by politick wildom and Hardy courage, great matters have been effected, and happy victories archieved. And what mortall man is he that knoweth, of what mind and certiseell good or bad, how fortunat or unlucky the Cof, is, whom they fend forth to war: whether he be like foon to be feen again, in triumphant wife with his victorious army mounting up the Capitoll unto those gods, of whom now he taketh his leave: or shall give occasion to the enemies in the fame manner to rejoyce? As for Perfess the K. (against whom this expedition and journey istaken)a Princehe is, highly renowned both by the Macedonian nation (fo famous for fears of arms,) and also by his tather Philip) who among other fortunat atchievements of his, was ennobled by his war against the Romans, Moreover, the very name of Perfeus himself (fince timethat first the diadem was set upon his head) was in every mans mouth, and no talk continually but of him and the expectation of this war, With these and fuch like cogitations (I say) a mighty number of men of all forts and degrees attended and accompanied the Col, at his departure. With him I were fent two Colonels or knight-marshals above the rest, who had been Coss, namely, C. Claudins and Q. Mutius: also three brave and lufty young gallants, to wit, P. Lentulus and the two *This M Man Manlii, both furnamed Acidinis, the one fonto M. Manlius; and the other to L. Manlius. The lim feemen to Col thus accompanied, first went to Brundusium to the army, and from thence passed the leasto Nymphaum, and so encamped in the territory of Apollonia.

Perfins some few daies before, upon the return of his embassadors from Rome, who had clean put him out of all hope of peace, held a councill; wherein for a good while the matter was debated with great variety of lundry opinions. Some were of mind, that in case the Romans enjoyned them either to yield a tribute, or to forgo some of their lands; yea, if they imposed upon them some fine by way of amends and satisfaction: in brief, whatsoever else they set down and K ordained, to do and suffer all for to redeem their peace, and not to refuse any condition were it that there were never so hard but to take heed and provide in any wile, that Perfeus put not himself nor the realm Martin utrinife upon the dangerous hazard of so great a jeopardy. For if he held still the main point and continued in quiet possession of his kingdom, in time and space much good might happen; by means whereof he should be able not only to lick himself whole and recover his losses, but also become hereafter dread and terrible even unto those of whom now he standeth infear. But the sargreater part carried with them a more couragious spirit and gave advice accordingly. For they affirmed, "That if Perfeus parted with ought and yielded never to little, he must make account withall to " quit the free-hold of his whole kingdom foon after. For, it is neither money nor land(fay they) that the Romans want ; but this they wot full well, That as all thingselfe in the world, so espe- L cially great monarchies & empires are subject to many accidents and casualties: right well they know also, how they have quelled and bruifed the puissance of the Carthaginians, and for to yoak their necks and hold them down, have fet up a mighty King to be their neighbour and commandthem; yea, and that Antiochus and all his race is removed and chased beyond the mountain Taurus. There remaineth only now the realm of Macedony, which is both feated in a near region, and also (if the fortune of the people of Rome should hap to fail) seemeth able to give heart and courage to her Kings at this day, answerable to that of their noble progenitors in former times, And therefore whiles the State Handeth entire and unfoiled, Perfent ought to " resolve, whether he had rather by forgoing one thing after another, strip himself in the end of all " his goods and lands, & to turned clean out of his kingdom, be driven to request at the Romans M 6 hand either Samothracia or some other such petty Ille, where, in quality of a privat person he may survive his royall estate, and live to old age in base contempt and needy poverty or else, to take arms in the desence and maintenance of his royall place and dignity, like a Prince of valour " and courage; and either abide all hazards whatfoever the fortune of the field thall plunge him into; or after victory atchieved deliver the whole world from the dominion and imperious 66 feignory of the Romans. And no greater wonder and miracle is at to hunt the Romans out of 6: Greece, than it was tochase Annil al out of Italy: neither see we ingood faith (say they) how by any reason it can well stand, that he who resisted with all his might and main his ownbro-"ther, that would have made himself K. against all right and law, should now to strangers and allens render the possession thereof, which he came so well and truly by, and wherein he is so right-" inly invefied? Finally, in war and peace howfoever men make quettions, disputing and arguing to and fro, yet this conclusion they all grant and agree upon, That as there is nothing more "firamefull and dishonest, than to abandon and lole a kingdom without battell, sothere is nothing more glorious and honoprable than for the maintenance of Princely dignity and regal ma-" jetty to hazard all fortune what foever. This Councill was holden at Pella, the ancient Palace wherein the Macedonian KK, kept their toyall contt., Why then (qd, he)on, Gods name, fince you are of that mind and resolution let us take arms & to the field: whereupon he sent his letters into all parts to his gallants and captains, and affembled & drew all his forces to Citium, a town of Mucedony, Himself in person after he had performed a magnificent, facrifice (like a K. Jof 100 head of beaftsto the honour of Mineron, furnamed Alcida, he departed accompanied with a number of his courtiers, penfioners, and yeomen of the guard to Crium. To which place were gathered all his forces, as well Macedonians as auxiliary firangers. He pitched his camp before the gown and embarrelled all his armed men in the plain. He was in all forty thousand drong where of one half well-near confifted of those whom they call Phalangue, and those were commanded by one Hippias of Berrhas. Besides, there were two choice companies store the slower of see and firengthofbody) selected out of the whole number of targettiers, called Certai, This regiment, themselves called by the name of The legion; and the same was under the conduct of Leonains and Thrasippus both * Eulyestanes. The rest of the targettiers to the number of three thousand or + Or. En men! very near, were led by Antiphilus of Edeffa. The Paonians, those also of Pacoria and Poffrinsonia according to (places subject to the Thracian) and the Agrians, together with some inhabitants of Thracia in- Torneb in termingled among them, amounted also to the number of three thousand. Didas of Pania had le- Adversaria; vied and armed them, even the man that murdered young Demetrius. There were befides two thouland Frenchmen in arms under the leading of captain Afelepiodorus. From Heraclealike wife one of the Sintians country, there were three thouland Thracians, free men born, under a leader of their own, The like number well-near of Cretenfians followed their Commanders, Sulus of Phalafarna, and Syllus of Gnofos: also Leonides the Lacedamonian, had the charge of five hundred Rout of Greece, but a mixt company they were of divers nations. This Leonides was faid to have been of the bloud royall, a banished perion, condemned in a frequent affembly and Councill of the Achains, for cettain letters which he sent to Perfeus, and were intercepted. The Ætolians and Bootians, who in all made not above five hundred, were conducted by Lyco an Achaan. Thele auxiliaries or aid-fouldiers of fo many states and nations mixt and blended together, grew tast upon the number of 12000 armed men. As for the Cavalry, he had levied out of all Macedony 3000 horse or thereabour. Cotys King of the Odrysians, the son of Seuthes, was thithet come with 1000 cholen men of arms, and almost as many footmen. In turn, the whole army arose to the number of 39000 foot, and 4000 horsemen. And this was held for certain that the like army was never raised by any King of Macedony, unless it were that again, with which Alexander the Great C passed over into Asia. Twenty years now and six were come and gone, since time that peace was granted unto Philip at his own fuit and request : during which space between, Macedony being in reff and quietnels, had brought forth a goodly fry of fresh youth: a great part whereof was of sufficient age to bear arms; and by the continuall skirmishes which they maintained with the Thracians their neighbours, were rather whetted than weakned, and more enured than wearied; and, in one word, lived ever in practice of martiall feats: whereby it came to pass, that all things wereprest and in readiness for the war, which Philip first, and Perfess afterwards projected to weee against the Romans,

This army flirred and advanced alittle, not in manner of a full march as to a present battell; but only for this that they would not be seen to have sood still in their arms: and thus armed as D the fouldiers were, Perfess called them to an audience, intending to make an Oration unto them. Being mounted up to his Tribunall, he flood there with his two sons about him, one of either hand, whereof the elder (named Philip) he adopted to be his child, whereas indeed by nature he washis brother; but the younger (whom they called Alexander) washis own naturallion. Then andthere he exhorted his fouldiers to fight manfully, and laid before them what wrongs and injuries the people of Rome had done both to his father and also to himself, "As for my tather (qd. Poseus 10 18 "he) forced he was by all kind of indignities to enter into arms and begin war again; but in the fouldiers." "very preparation thereof, he was fuddenly furprifed and flrucken with death. To my felfat one "time were embassadors from them sent to treat of peace, and armed souldiers also for to seiz upon the Cities of Greece: Afterwards, by a deceitful shew of a parley under colour o' reconcilia-E tion and peace making, we were born in hand and drawn out a whole winter, to the end that "they might gain time to prepare for war. And now is the Cos. coming with two Roman legions, 4 having either of them some 300 horse besides, and with a proportionable number (and that is "the most of allies, as well foot as horse, And say that the KK, both Eumenes & Masariffa joyn "with their aid-forces, yet can they not amount above the number of 7000. Now that ye have heard what the strength is of the enemies regard and compare your own army, namely how far both in number, as also in goodness and quality of fouldiers, you surpass them; being your selves "from your childhood and infancy warriors trained in practice of arms and warfare wrought, "framed, and hardned in fo many battels: where as they be new & raw fouldiers taken up in hafte, sandenrolled now the first time against this present service. As for the auxiliaries of the Romans, "what are they but Lydians, Phrygians, and Numidians? but we to let against them have to aid us Thracians and Gauls the most couragious nations under heaven. For harnels and weapons, they "have no other than fuch as every poor fouldier is able to provide for himfelf: but the Macedo-"nians are futnished out of the Kings royall armory and arcenal with such armors of proof, as my father in many years caused to be made with great caretse to his no small expense. The Romans be far from their provisions, and the same exposed to all the casualties of the leas but we besides theregenues and iffues our of the mines of metal, have laid by both coin and corn sufficient to ferre for ten years. The Macedonians have flore and plenty ingreat abundance of all things ne-"cellary, & be provided as well by the gracious favour of the gods, as the careful diligence of a K. *It remaineth now that ye carry that mind and courage with you, which your nob e progenitors bare before you, those I fay, who after they had conquered & subdued all Europe passed into Afraind by force of arms made way & discovered that part of the world that was never heard of belote and gave not over to win ground fill and make more conquests, untill they were barked "by the red lea, & could find no more land to conquer. But now believe me, fortune hath denoun-"ted a triall by war, not for the purchase of the utmost bounds & marches of India, but for our free "hold and possession for our inheritance even of Macedon, These Romans, when they warred awill my father, pretended a goodly title & made a glorious thew to the world, as though they would deliver Greece, and establish it in freedom : but now in open and plain terms they should at Macedon, intending to bring it into servitude; to the end there might be no K, near neighb bor to the Roman leignory, nor any nation renowned for martiall prowels, permitted to bear "arms and have weapon in hand. For these things and no less forced shall be to part with and 66 deliver up these proud LL, together with King and kingdom, in case ye surceasewar; and to do st what foever they will command you. All the while that he delivered this speech, there might be heard fecret fucclamations oftentimes, fufficiently testifying the general affent of them all but at thefelast words they lift up their voices and cried out aloud part for anger & indignation menacing the enemy part for courage and resolution, exhorting the King to be of good chear and take a good heart; infomuch as he was constrained to give over, and make an end of his Otation; only he commanded them to be ready for the remove, & to put themselves in the journey against the I enemy : for by this time advertised he was that the Romans were distodged from Nymphaum, Mfter this affembly was dismissed, he gave audience to the embassages from the States of Macedon: for come they were to make promise and offer both of money & grain to maintain this war every one according to their ability. Thanked they were each one, and released of all that charge, with this answers that the Kings provision was sufficient. Only he commanded them to find wains and carts for carriages of the pieces of ordnance, the engins of battery, the darts, quarrels and other shot, whereof a mighty deal he had provided; and in sum, all the instruments & surniture of war. Then he fee forward with his whole army marching toward Eordea, and near unto the lake which they call Begarites, he encamped. The next morrow he advanced to Elymea upon the river Haliacmon, After this, having passed over the mountains named Cambunit through a straight and narrow K paffige he delcended to those that inhabit Azorus, Pythous, and Doliche, which quarter is called Tripolis. These three towns staid some while in suspence, by reason that they had given their hostages to the Larissans: but in the end, overcome with the sear presented before their eyes,were content to yield themselves into his hands. Perfew used gracious words to this people making this account that the Perrhæbians would do the like : & in very deed he entred upon the City(which furrendered at his first arrival) without any doubt or stay at all made by the inhabitants within, As for the town Cyretia, he assaied to batter it, and the first day he was repulled in a sharp skirmishat the very gates made by the townimen that put on arms, drew to an head, and made relitance. But the morrow after, when he had affailed the City with all his forces, they submitted all to his mercy before night. The inhabitants of the next town to it Myla prefuming upon their fortifica- L tions, and standing upon this, That their City was impregnable, were so proud and lusty, that they could not be contented to shut the gates only against the King, but most rudely and malapertly spared not to cast out reproachfull taunts and gibing terms against his own person and the Macedonians. Which manner of dealing, as it envenomed the enemies and edged them the rather to enforce and follow the affault, fo it kindled themselves the more (upon despair of all pardon & mercy) to maintain and make good their place & fland more refolutely in their own defence. Whereupon for three daiestogether the town was assailed by one part, and defended by the other with mighty courage right valiantly. The Macedonianr were so many in number, that by turns they relieved the affault without any difficulty, and entred one in the place of another, But the townsmen who evermore day and night guarded the walls, without any change & new supply, were not only M over harged with many wounds, but also wearied and enseebled with continuall travell and want of fleep. The fourth day, when at one instant the scaling ladders were reared against the wals in every quarter and the gate affailed with greater force and violence than before, the inhabitants being driven from the curtain and battlements ranall to ward the gate and made a judden fally upon the enemies: which proceeding more upon inconfiderat and blind anger, han any true and affured confidence of their own firength, caused them (few in number and wearied) to be discomfited 32 put to flight by the enemies trefh and in heart, who entred pell-mell with them into the faid gate standing wide open. Thus was this City taken and ransacked. The bodies also of thefree born perfons, as many as remained after the bloudy execution, were told in market. Perfeusafter he had rased, rained, and burred a great part of the town, dislodged and departed from thence to N Phalanna, and the next day following went onward, and marched to Gyrtone. But being advertifed that T. Minutius Rufus and Hippias the Prator of Theffaly were entred thither with a garrison, he passed besides the the town, and never made offer of any assault. But he surprised Elatia and Gonnus, by reason that the townsmen were strucken with exceeding fear upon his sudden arrival. These two towns are situat upon the very straight which leadeth to Tempe, but Gomus especially, And therefore he left it guarded with a strong garrison both of foot and horse, as also sortified with a trebble trench and rampier, Himfelf in person went onward stil to Sycurium, minding there to attend the coming of the enemy: and withall he commanded his army to forrage and purvey corn every way all over the territory of the enemies lying under him. For Sycurium is seated upon the hanging of an hill toward the very foot of the mountain Offa, having upon the South fide the O plain champian of Theffaly under it, but behind on the back Macedony and Magnesia. Over and above these commodities, the place is very healthfull and plenteous of all good things, watered also with many quick and running springs round about.

The Roman Conful having his army on foot about that time marching toward The fal, at the first found good way and ready passage through Epirm : but afterwards, when he was passed over once into Athamania, he met with a rough country & rugged foil & in manner insuperable: A fo as with exceeding great difficulty and by short journeys he had much ado to reach unto Gom phi. And if at that time, whiles his men and hories were encumbred and tainted, the King had made head in battell arranged, taking the vantage of time and place against him, leading as he did in holf composed but of rude and untrained novices, the Romans themselves cannot deny, but it would have gone very hard with them, and a great overthrow they must needs have received in that conflict. But when they were come once to Gomphi without any skirmish, besides the joy which they conceived, for that they had eleaped and overcome that dangerous paffage, they began also to contemn their enemies, for that they knew not their own good, and were so ignorant of the opportunities which they had. The Confol after he had duly facrificed (as it appertain ned) and diffributed the allowance of corn among his fouldiers, to journed there forme few dies for the rest and repose both of man and beast : where, hearing that the Macedonians ranged and over ran the country of Theff.ly, wasting and spoining the territory of the Roman allies, he led his fouldiers now infliciently refreshed unto Lariffa. And having marched from thence within three miles of Tripolis (which they call Scea) he pitched his tents, and lodged upon the river

At the same time Eumenes arrived by sea at Chalcis together with two of his brethren, Artalus and Athenaus leaving at Pergamus a third brother Philetarus for the defence of his Realm, From thence, accompanied with Artalus and a power of four thouland foot and a thouland horse he came to the Conful, and left at Chalsis two thousand footmen commanded by Atherans. Thither also repaired other aids which came in to the Romans from all the States of Greece. but most of Cthe particulars were fo small as now they are grown out of remembrance. The Apolloniats fent 3 hundred horsemen, and a hundred footmen. From the Ætolians there came a Cornet of horsemen, even the whole Cavalry that the faid nation could make. Likewife all the Cavalry of the Theffalians which exceeded not the number of three hundred that served in the Roman amp & quartered apart. The Achains fent one thousand men of their youth armed for the mon part afterthe Candiot manner. And much about this time C. Lucretius also the Prator, who had the conduct of the thips that anchored in the tode of Ceptal mia, after he had given charge to M. Lucretist his brother, to make fail with his fleet beyond the Cape of Males, & fo to pals to Chalais, himself went abourd unto a triteme galley, & failed toward the gulph of Coronth for to be leized first of the country of Bania, and to prevent all matters there He made way but flow y because postheinstmity and weakness of his body, M. Lucretius being arrived at Codess, and advertised that P. Lentilus lay against the City of Haliartus, Sent a mession service commanding him in the name of the Prator to raise the siege and dislodge from thence. The lieutenant not with standing he had fer into that fervice with the help of the youth of that part of Baoria which took part with the Romans retired from before the walls. The levying of this fiege gave occasion of a new enterprise : for incontinently M. Lucretius befieged and in effed Haliartus with his own fea-for es to the number of 10000 fighting men together with 2000 fouldiers from K, Emmenes where it is him and had the charge; and as they were now upon the point to give an affault, the Prator came in unto their from Creufa. And very near to that time there arrived also at Chalcis certain ships from the allies, namely, two Quinquereme galeaces of Carthage, two trireme gallies from Herael a in Pontus, glour from Chalcedon, as many from Samos, and five quadrireine gallies of Rhodes. All these veffels the Prator fent back again to the allies, and eafed them of that charge because there was no seafervice to be performed in any place. Q. Martins also came by sea to Chalcis, after he had won Halops, and affaulted Lariff a called Cremafte.

This was the State of Baotia, when Perfeus (as hath been faid before) lay encamped at Sycurium: who after he had from every coast thereabout got together all the grain that he could come by fent certain companies to give the waste unto the territory of the Phocasans supposing the Romansmight be furptiled, when they should be drawn far from their own camp to the succouring of their diffressed affociats. But perceiving that they stirred never the more for all that tumult: hedealt among his fouldiers all the prey, but only of men and women; now the booty flood molt Fupon cattell, where with they made good chear. After this, but near about one and the same time, the Col & K. Perfeus both debated in their councill, how and where they should begin the war. The K, had taken great heart and courage by occasion that the enemy suffered him to make such havo kand do his pleasure in the Phermans territory. And therefore his resolution was to march directly against the Roman camp without giving more time and making any further delay. The Romans likewise for their parts were of opinion, that all forflacking now would greatly prejudice their reputation among the confederats, who took it exceedingly to the heart, that they had not fuccoured the Phera ins. As they late confulting what to do, (now Eumenes and Attilius both Were present at this Council Jthere came a messenger in post halte with news that the enemy approached near at hand with a mighty army. Whereupon the Councill brake up, and prelently the Gignall was given to arm. And advised it was in the mean while, that there should go forth 100 horie, and as many darrers and foot out of King Eumenes his companies.

Perfeus about the fourth hour of the day, being come within a mile and somewhat more of the Roman leaguet commanded the enfigns of the footment to fland Himfelfin person with the men of arms and light armed fouldiers advanced forward, and to together with King Corys and the Captains of the other auxiliaries, they two marched before. Now when they were within half a mile from the camp, they might discover the horsemen of their enemies. Two Corners they were most part Gauls, under the conduct of Caffignatus; besides the lobse and light armed forlorn B hope, to the number well-near of a hundred and fifty, and those were partly Mysians and partly Cretenfians. Hereat the King made a stand, not knowing well the number of the enemies: and a. non out of the regiment that he had with him he drew two wings of Thracian horie, and as many Macedonians; likewife two Cohorts of Cretenfian, and as many Thracian footmen. Hereupon ensued a skirmish: but forasmuch as they were marched even in number, and no succour came in to rescuestrom the one part or the other, it ended like wife in doubtfull ballance of victory. Of Eumenes his part there died about thirty: in which number Cassignatus the Commander of the Gauls was flain, So for that time Perfeus retired his forces to Sycurium : but the next monow the King marched with them again to the felt-fame place, and much about the foresaid hour, Certain carts and wains laden with water followed after: and by reason that for a dozen miles space, all I the way was waterless, and full of dust withall, hardly bestead (as it should seem) they had been for very drought and thirst, in case they had been charged and put to skirmish, at the time when they were first in fight. But confidering that the Romans kept quiet, yea, and had reduced their corps de guard within their rampier, Perfeus likewile retired with his forces into his camp. This did the enemies for cerdain daies together, hoping ever that the Roman Cavalry would charge upon the tail of the rereguard in their retreat: and when by that occasion the skirmish was once begun and that they had trained and drawn them far from their camp; then they might with ease wheresoever they were, turn upon them and make head, having the odds of them inhorsemen and light armed fouldiers. But the King seeing this would not speed, encamped nearer unto the Romans, and fortified the compass of half a mile. From whence betimes in the morning by the K break of day, after he had embattelled his infantry in the usuall place, he led all his Cavalry and light-armed men toward the camp of his enemies. The Romans feeing a greater dust raised by more in number, and the same nearer than ordinary it had been, were mightily affaid within their camp. But at the first they would hardly believe the messenger that brought the news: for that continually all the former daies the enemy used not to be seen untill the fourth hour of the day, and now the sun was but newly risen. Howbeit, afterwards (I say) when about their gates there were this ker alarms given and more and more running from thence, and that now there was no doubt at all of the matter, there grew an exceeding trouble & hurliburly. The Marshals Colonels, Captains, and Centurions, betook themselves into the quarter about the Prætors pavilion: and the fouldiers ran every man to his own tent. Perfeus had embattelled his men less than half a mile L from the rampier about a little hill which they call Calicinus. King Cotys had the charge of the left wing, with althoic or his own nation. The ranks of the cavalry frood marshalled asunder one from the other by reason that the light armed souldiers were bestowed between. In the right wing were placed the Macedonian horsemen, and the Cretensians likewise intermingled among them. Milon of Berrhaaled these light armed souldiers : but Meno of Antigonia commanded the horsemen, and the whole regiment of that part, Next to those wings the Cavalry of K. Perseus was arranged together with the selected aid-souldiers of many and sundry nations: and the same were conducted by Patrocles of Antigonia, and Didas the governour of Paonia. In the midft of all was the King himself : having about him a band called Agema, and certain corners of horsemen named [The facred wings] Before him he planted the flingers and darters, who both together amounted M to the number of 400:and overthem he appointed for to be their leader one Ion of The falonica, and Timanor the Dolopian. In this manner as is beforefaid, stood the Kings forces embattelled. The Cos having put his Infantry in order of battell, sent out his Cavalry likewise with the light armed companies, who were set in array before the camp. C. Licinius Craffus the Confuls brother had the leading of the right point, with all the Italian horsemen and the sootmen lightly appointed intermingled among them, M. Valerius Lavinus in the left, commanded the horiemen of the greek affociats, together with the light armed fouldiers of the same nation Q. Mutius conducted the battaillon in the midst with certain extraordinary chosen men of arms. Before their Guidons, 200 horsemen of the Gauls stood in ordinance: and of the auxiliaries of K. Eumenes, 300 Cyrtians, and 400 Thefalian horie. Not far from thence were ranged, somewhat above the left point N King Eumenes himself and his brother Attalus, with all their power were planted behind, even between the rereward and the trench. Thus flood both battels much after this manner arranged, and having of either fide a like strength in manner of horsemen and light-armour, theyencountred and charged one another; and then the conflict was begun by the forlorn hope of loofe that to wit, the flingers and darters that went before. And first of all others the Thracians, faring like wild and lavage beafts, who had been long pent up within some grates and cages, with a mighty cry advanced forth and ran upon the Italian horsemen in the right wing, to the end that they might trouble and amaze them; being otherwise a nation searles, as well by nature as for long experience and practise of war . The sootmen with their swords affaied to cut The footmen with their swords affaied to cut long experience and practife of war off the heads of their pikes; and one whiles they hought their horses, and another whiles they O ran them into their flanks. Perfeus rode into the midft of the battell, and at the fift shock forced the Greeks to turn slide and give way: and when the enemy pressed moreover hard upon them behind, behold, the Theffalian horsemen who were placed in the rereguard for succour, and flood somewhat apart and severed from the left wing, who at first were beholders only of the fight (as keeping without the danger of the charge) afterwards flood them in very good flead, even as they were at the point to go down & have the worfe. For as they retired leifurely without

A breaking their ranks, after that they once joyned with the aids of Enmener, they both yielded the opportunity to their allies who were disbanded in the rout, to retire in fafety within their ranks; and also espying their own vantage, when the enemies puritied not so thick in troops, they adventured to put themselves forward beyond, and so staid many of those their allies whom they encountred and received in their flight. Neither durst the Kings men, being now also difarrated and dispersed here and there in following the chase, come to hand-fight and joyn battell with those, continuing so well in order as they did, and marching firm and strong together; whereas the matter had been dispatched and the war brought to a finall end, in case the King who won the better in horse-fight, had never so little come in with help and succour. For as heencouraged his souldiers to fight, there came in place very fitly and in passing good time, the 'Phalanx, which Hippins A firing Band Leonaton (because they would not be behind-hand in this hardy enterprise) brought of their barteilles. own accord in great hasteso soon as ever they heard of the winning hand of the Cavalry. And footness, whiles the K. wavered in doubtful suspence, between hope and fear of this so great an adventure, " Evander the Cretenfian, whole service Perfeus had used in the await laid for K. Eumenes at Del-"phi, leeing that main battell marching heavily armed under their entigns, ran anto the King and "earneftly advertised him to take heed, left that presuming too much and bearing himself over-"confident of this good speed of his, he brought not unadvisedly the main chance of all his estate, "into a needlels and unnecessary hazard. For if (quoth he) you can be content with the happy "fortune of this fair day and fo rest, either you shall have the means to make an honourable "peace, or elfe (if you had rather profecute the war) to win exceeding many allies to bear arms C" with you in the field; who, no doubt, will follow the train of your good fortune. To this way flood the Kings mind ever and thither he foon enclined. Therefore having commended Evander for his good advice, he commanded the enfigns to retire, and the footmen to return into the camp: likewise to sound the retreat unto the Guidons of the men of arms, In this battel 200 Roman horkmen thanday loft their lives, and no fewer than 2000 footmen, and near upon 200 of the Cavalry were taken prisoners. Of the Kings side, there died not past 200 horsemen and forty

After that the victorious enemies were upon their return into the camp all were jocund & glad in general, but above the rest the Thracians shewed themselves in joy for this their victory, over infolent; for they returned finging full metrily, and carried the heads of their enemies fixed upon Dtheir spear points, But the Romans were not only sad and heavy for this unfortunat journey, but fearfull also lest the enemy should forthwith affail their camp. Eumenes gave counsell to dislodge and remove to the other fide of the river Peneus, that it might serve them instead of a desence and bulwark, untill such time as the amated souldier's had recovered their spirits and taken heart again. The Col, was ashamed and abashed to bewray his fear; howbeit, over-ruled with reason, helethis army over the river in the dead time of the night, and encamped on the farther bank. K. Perfeus the morrow after advanced forward to bid the enemies battel, but perceiving they were lodged in safety beyond the river, he confessed that he had saying dindeed, for that he had not followed his victory the day before; but more overleen a good deal he was in lying fill and taking repose that night: for with out troubling any else of his own men, he might have sent out the light armed fouldiers only to fet upon the enemies as they passed over the river in haste and fright, and so defeated a great part of their forces. Now the Romans shook off their fear for the present, confidering they were encamped in a fure place: but among other damages, the blot especially of their honour and name grieved and troubled them. And as they fate in Councill before the Conful, every man for his part laid all the blame upon the Ætolians, who first began to be affraid and run away; and whole example of fear the other allies of the Cities of Greece followed: for it was faid, that five principall men of mark among the Ætolians, were seen and noted first of all other to have turned their backs. But the Thessalians were praised in a sult assembly of the whole army; and their Captains for their vertue and valorous service were honoured with presents. The spoils of the enemies were brought before King Perfeus; out of which he bestowed freely upon some, brave and gorgeous armours; upon others goodly great horses; and finally, certain were rewarded with the prize of good prisoners. Targets there were above a thousand and five hundred, cuiraces and corflets not to few as a thouland; besides, a far greater proportion of murrions swords, "and shot of all forts. Great matters these were, considered in themselves; but much more amplified and fet out by the King himself with a speech that he made in a frequent audience of his army affembled together, after this or the like manner, "You fee already by this (quoth he) "what you may judge before-hand of the finall iffue of this war: discomfited ye have the bet-"ter part of your enemies, to wit, the Roman Cavalry, wherein they took themselves to be in-"vincible. For their horfemen are the very gallants and bravest of their youth; their Gentlemen of arms (I say) are the seminary and nurse-garden of their Senat. From them they chuse their "Nobles and Peers to make Contals of, yea, and Generals of the field another day. And the spoils of these we have erewhiles divided among us. Neither is the victory less which ye have gai-"ned of the Infantry and legions, who although by night they made an escape from you, yet in "halling to pass over the river, they resembled a sort that had suffered shipwrack at sea, and in "fearful hafte for their lives have from & overspread the river every where with their bodies. Soo-"net shall we & with greater ease I trow, get over Peneus, to chase them thus already overcome, "than they did, making fuch hafte for fear: and being once fet on the other fide, we shall out of

" hand affail their camp, which we might have forced and won this day, but that they took them H " to their heels and fled But if they will come to a field and try the quarrel by the swords point. "look ye for no other iffue of the conflict with footmen, than was before of the other with 6 horsemen. These words, both the horsemen (who bare upon their own shoulders the spoils of their enemies lying flain before their eyes in open view) heard with great pleasure and contentment, as measuring the hope of the suture speed by the fortune passed; and also the footmen enflamed now with the glory of others (and namely, those that were of the Macedonian Phalanx) wished with all their hearts to have the like occasion offered unto them, wherein they might not only shew their valiant service before the K, but also win semblable glory of their enemies, Thus the affembly was diffolved, and the morrow after the King marched forward and encamped upon Mopfelm, which is an hill fituat in the mid way between Tempe and Larifa. The Romans remo- 1 ved their camp into a place of more security, howbeit, not far from the bank of Penew. Thither repaired Misagenes the Numidian, with 1000 horse and as many foot, besides 22 Elephants, Now as K. Perfem during these daies, lat in Council what course to take as touching the main conduct of his affairs, when his courage was now well abated and not so lufty for his late victory, some of his friends were so hardy as to advise him to use this good fortune of his for the obtaining and compassing of some honourable peace, rather than upon a vain hope to carry his head alost, and engage himself and his whole state into some hazard & jeopardy, out of which he should not be able to recover and retire into safety. For to keep a mean and moderation in prosperity, and not over-confidently to trust upon the present flattering fortune, is the part (fay they) of a wise man indeed and truly happy. And therefore the best course is, to send certain men of purpose unto the K Cof, for to renew the league woon the same conditions, with which your father Philip had accepted peace heretosore of T. Q. limitus the conqueror. For neither (lay they) can the war be taken up with greater honour and reputation, than after so memorable a battel thor ever will there be presented more firm and affured hope of a peace to continue for ever, than upon this occasion, which will work and mollifie the Romans as a man would have them, to come on and affent to any accord, confidering they are well tamed with the infortunity of this battell. But incafe the Romans upon an inbred peevishness and engraffed pertinacity of theirs, should not hear reason but resuse an indifferent end, then both God and man shall be witness, as well of the moderation of Perfeu, as of their pride & infolent frowardness. The K, was willing enough to give ear to this, and indeed never missiked such discourses; and therefore the advice was approved by the affent L of the most part; whereupon embassadors were sent to the Coi. & in a frequent Council assembled, had audience given them, Peace they demanded, and promifed that Perseus should pay unto the Romans as great a tribute as Philip had covenanted for; and like wife quit the same Cities, coasts, and territories, which Philip had given up and surrendred. To this effect spake the embalfadors; who being retired afide, the Romans debated in Council, and in the end Roman constancy imported and had the upper hand: for in those daies the manner and use was, in time of adversity to bear all out and set a good countenance, but inprosperity to nold an even hand and to use governance. So agreed it was to return this answer, That peace might begranted with this condition, That K. Perfeus should permitfull and free power to the Senat of Rome, for to dispose both of his person and the kingdom of Macedony at their good pleasure, When the Embassadors M had made relation hereof, this constant resolution and invincible persistance of the Romans made them to wonder again, as being not acquainted with their manners and fashions: and most of them forbad to make mention any more of peace, saying, That the Romans would be glad shortly to feek for that of their own accord, which now at this present they loathed & rejected when it was offered. But Perfeus mightily feared, that this arrogant spirit of theirs, proceeded from the confidence they had in their own forces; infomuch as he gave not over fo, but affaied to tempt the Cof. if haply by augmenting the fum of money, he might buy peace at any price & reckoning what foever. But feeing him nothing to come down, nor to alter one jot from the first answer; in despair now of all peace, he returned to Sycurium from whence he came, purposing once again to try the hazard of the field. Now the fame of this late fight of cavalry was flown over all Greece and discovered the minds and affections of men: for not only they that took parr with the Macedonians rejoyced to hear this news, but also very many of them who were obliged and beholden unto the Romans for benefits and favours received at their hands, and some likewise who had taffed of their violence and proud government. And this they did for no other reasonat all, but only upon a foolish and perverse affection like to that wherewith the common people ordinarily is carried away in the beholding of disports and triall of masteries, even to favour evermore the weaker and him that taketh the foil.

At the same time Lucretius the Prattor had with most forcible means assaulted the City of Halintus in Bastia: and albeit the besieged defendants within were relieved by no fortain aid-but only the youth of the Coronaxins who at the beginning of the segeented the City) nor hoped for any to come; yet they stood out and made resistance with courage of heart more than with strength of hand; for they issued forth many times, and fallied upon the fabricks and engins of the enemy, yea & when the ram approached hard to the wall, they let fall thereupon a mighty weight and counterposise of lead and so depressed and draw it down to the ground. And if shaly the enemies who ran with the ram against the wall, avoided the device of theirs, laid battery, and shook had once other place; the townsmen within, railed presently with great speed another mure,

A piling up hastily the stones one upon another, which they found lying among the very ruins of the breaches. The Conful feeing this manner of fervice by way of ordnance and battery, to become flow and redions, commanded to divideladders amongst every company, and purposed to invest the City round about with the Escalado: supposing that the number which he had would be sufficient to exploit this enterprise, because on that side whereas the Town is enclosed with a marish, it was bootles (or rather unpossible) to assault it. Himself in person presented 2000 elect fouldiers before that part, whereas two turrets, and all the wall between was beaten down and overthrown to the end that in the very inflant, whiles he affaied to enter at the breaches the townsmen should run all thither to repulse him, and in the mean while the walls void of delendants might in some part or other be scaled and won. But they within bestirred themselves lustily to Bgive him the repulle. For having piled in the very open breaches a mighty number of faggors made of drie vine cuttings and such small brush, they stood ready with flaming firebrands and burning links, threatning ever and anon to kindle the fame and fet all on fire, to the end, that being defended from the enemy by the means of fire between they might have time to oppose an inner countermure against them. But by mischance this device and enterprise of theirs was empeached. For there poured down on a fuddain fuch a mighty shower of rain that the fewel would noteafily take fire, and look what was fet a burning, it foon was quenched again. By which means not only the passage was made open between the smoking saggots drawn apart one from another here and there, but whiles they all intended wholly the defence of that one place, the walls were taken at one instant by ladders reared up against many and sundry parts thereo'. In the first heat C upon the winning of the City, old and yong fuch as chanced to ome in their way, without any respect at all of age were put to the sword. The armed souldiers and into the Castle and the next day being past hope o make good the place, they yeelded and were all fold under the garland in portiale, to them that would bid most, to the number of 2500 men or very neer. The ornaments and beauties of the City, as statues, images, painted tables and pictures, and what sever was sound in the pillage to bear a better price, was caried to shipbord, and the Town it self rated from the very foundations, and laid even with the ground. From thence the army was conducted to Theless. which being won without any refistance he put into the hands of the banished persons, and those that took part and fided with the Romans; but those of the contrary faction, such as favoured the King and the Macedonians, he fold by whole families in open market to the best chapmen. Having D performed these exploits in Baoria, he retired himself to the Sea fide to his ships.

Whiles these affairs passed thus in Bastia, Perfeus lodged for certain daies in camp at Sycurium. Where being advertised, that the Romans made great hast to inn the corn newly resped down. and to cary it from all parts of the fields unto the leaguer, and that every fouldier before his tent cut and shred off the ears as they lay bound in sheaves, to the end they might thrash and drive on the cleaner corn, by which occasion they had made great heaps of straw throughout all parts of the camp, he supposed it was an easy matter to set all their tents and pavilions on fire. Wherupon he commanded to provide torches, links and balls made of tow befine ared with pitch and tar: thus provided and furnished, he set out at midnight, that by the dawning of the day, he might put this device in execution without being descried before. But all came to nothing for the for-E most corps de guard although they were surprised with this suddain coming by their trouble and affright awakened and raifed all the reft, and immediatly the alarm was given; fo as at one inftant the fouldiers were ready and well appointed at the gates, and upon the rampier bent and preft for to defend the camp. Perfeus likewise incontinently turned about with his entigns, putting his fardage and carriage before, and then commanded the infantry to march after: himself with the cavalry and light-armors stated behind to fortify and guard the rereward, supposing (as it fell out indeed) that the enemies would make after to charge upon the tail of the march. His light armed foundiers had some short skirmishing especially with the forlorn hope and loose avant-courriers. but the horse and sootmen both, retired without any impeachment into the camp. Thus when all the corn was cut down about those quarters, the Romans dislodged and removed into the terri-Ftory of Crannon, which as yet was not endammaged. Whiles they lay encamped in security and milituiting nothing (because the enemies were so far off, and by reason that the way between Sycurium and Crannon was so difficult for want of water;) behold all on a suddain early in the morning by day light, the Kings cavalry and light armed fouldiers shewed themselves upon the hills that overlooked them from above, and put them into great trouble. Departed they were from Sycurium at noon the day before, and had left the infantry behind about the break of day upon the plain next thereto. For a while he stood upon those said hills, hoping that the Romans might be trained forth to an horse-fight. But perceiving them not to stirat all, he sent one on horsehack to command the sootmen to retire again to Sycurium, and himself in person followed fleight after. The Roman horsemen made after a prety distance off, if haply they could spie any & vantage in one place or other to charge upon them, disbanded and stragling asunder. But when they faw that in their diffnarch they kept close together following their guidons and keeping their ranks they also returned into the camp. After this, the King weary of making so long journies dilodged and removed to Mopfium. The Romans for their part likewise having mowed down all the corn of Crannon, passed into the territory of Phalanneum. The Kinghaving intelligence by a megate revolt, that the Romans were scattered all over the fields and reaping the standing corn without any guard of armed men, made a rode with 1000 horse, & 2000 Candiors & Thracians who marching with as great hast as possibly they could, set upon the Romans at unawares all un- H provided; where he took a thousand carts or thereabouts, together with their teams, moft of them laden, and upon 600 men bendes. The guard and convoy of this booty into the camp he committed to the charge of 300 Cretenfians. Himfelf having rallied his cavalry dispersed here and there bufy in execution, and reunited withat the rest of the footmen led them to the next corps de quard or garrison of the enemies, supporing that with little ado they might be surprised and vanquished. L. Pompeius a Colonel had the command of them, who fee ng his fouldiers affrighted with this fuddain coming of the enemies, retired with them to an hill neer at hand, for to defend himfelf by the vantage and strength of the place, considering that otherwise in number and forces he was too weak. Where after he had call his men into a ring, for to ward against the shot of arrows and darts by a roof and sence of targets conched close together over their heads: Perseur having emi- I roned the hill round about with armed men, commanded some to mount up and assay to win the place on all parts, it possibly they could and then to fight crote hand to hand a others he charged to lance their darts and shoot their shalts thick at them a far off. The Romans were beset with a double fear; for neither could they maintain skirmish and fight close together because of those who laboured to climb the hill: and fay they had broke any ranks with excursions and outrodes upon them, yet were they exposed and lay open to the shot of arrows and darts. Most hurt they had by certain weapons called Ceftrosphendone [sling-darts.] A new kind of dart this was and lately deviled in the time of this very war. It had a sharp head of iron the length of two hands breadth, and the same set fast in a steel which was half a cubir long, and about the thicknes of a mans finger: for to flie direct and threight, three teathers it had about it in man of a shaft: the K fling from the middle part had two cords of an unequal fize: now when as the flinger fwung it about, as it lay even poised in the greater capacity of the leather thong out flew the dart and was driven with violence like a buller. Many of the fouldiers being very fore wounded as well with this weapon as all other forts of thot fo as now for wearines they were fear, eable to bear their own armour the King was earnestly in hand with them to yeeld and submit, affuring them upon his faithful word their lives, yea, and otherwhiles promited them rewards and recompences, But there was not a man whose heart enclined once thereto. Now as they stood thus stiff and resolut to die there shone upon them a little comfort and some hope of er asion beyond all their expectation. For certain of the forragers and corn purveiors, who hapned to flie for refuge unto the camp, brought word unto the Conful that the corps de guard aforefaid was befieged round: whet- L upon being moved with the jeopardy wherein io many citizens flood (for about 900 they were, and all citizens of Rome) he went forth of the camp with the cavalry and light armed fouldiers, and unto them joyned certain new fuccours of the Numidians as well horse as foot, together with the Elephants: and gave commandment to the martial Colonels, that the enfigns of the legions should follow after. Himself in person marched before toward the hill atoreiaid taking with him a certain number of skirmishers, for to strengthen the light armed auxiliaries. Eumenes Attalus, and M. Jagenes also the King of the Numidians, flanked the Co., on either fide. When as the befieged Romans had a fight once of the formoltenigns of their friends and fellows, they took comfort and courage again upon their former extream despair. Perfess, who had purposed in the first place not to spend any long time in laying siege to this corps de guard but to content himself with M the fortunat fuccels which at a venture hapned, in that he had taken and flain some of the fortagers: lecondly (when he was in some fort entred into that action) to depart (whiles he had means thereof) without any damage received, as knowing that he had no strength, to speak of. about him : yet puffed up and carried as it were above the ground with the conceit of his late good hand, both staid in person to attend the enemies coming, and also fent out in all hast for the Macedonian] Phalanx. Which coming later than the prefent necessity required falbeit in great hast they harried) it tell out fo, that they were to encounter (troubled and disordred as they were in minning) their enemies that were well appointed and provided aforehand. And the Cof. who had prevented them presently welcomed them with battail. At the first, the Macedonians made resflance; but afterwards being in no respect equal unto the enemies after they had lost three hun- N dred footmen, with four and twenty of the most forward and bravest horsemen out of that comet which they call Sacra (amongst whom Animachus also their leader died) they endeavoured to retire and be gone. But the way by which they were to pals, was more troublelome to speak of, than the skirmish and battail it self. The Phalanx being sent unto by a messenger in half, and conducted as hallily, encountred affront in a certain fireight a troop of prisoners, and likewisethe waggonscharged with corn. Who being laid at to give way, thereupon arole a great trouble as well of the one part as the other; whiles no man took heed how to march in order: but the armed ionidiers cast down and overthrew the heaps of sardage and baggage. for otherwise there could no way be made: and the draught-beafts being pricked and provoked forward, raged and made foul work in the press and throng. Hardly and with much ado were they disengaged and o rid of this confused and disordered company of captives, when they met with the King his company and the horsemen discomfited. In which place, the noise which they made crying unto the Phalanx. Back again Back again made a fright among them as if there had been something ready to fall upon their heads: in such fort as if their enemies durst have entred into the streight and purfued farther after them, no doubt they had received a great overthrow. But the Conful contenting bimself with a mean good hand, in that he had rescued and recovered his corps de guard from of

he hill, retired with his forces into the camp. Some write that there was a great battail fought that day, and how 8000 enemies were flaiti, and aiming them Sopater and Antipater two of the Kings Captains. Alfo that there were taken priforiers about 2400: and military enfigits 29 caries days, Neither was the victory eafly gotten but bold blood, for not to few as 4300 whee flain of the Cotiol his army and five guidons of the left wing loft. This journey, recomforted the Romans, but datted and qualled Perfam in fuch fort; as after he had staid a few daies at Mopfdam especially about enterting the bodies of his dead souliders, and left a sufficient gatrison at Gonnois, here cited his army into Macedon; leaving also at Phila one of his own Captains named Timothers, with some smallforces; whom he comminded to assay the Magnesians and the borderers adjoyning. When he was come to Palla; he dimissed this army out of the field; and sent them to their R winning harbors, but himself together with King Corps went to The staining.

Thither news came, that Atleibius a pery King of the Thracians, and Corragus a Caprain under King Eumener, had invaded the marches of Corresand where matters of the country which they call Marene. And therefore in pooling that he must need sdictiange Correction to the defence of his own realm, he bestowed rich prefents upon him at his departure: and gave him 200 talents for in months wages of his cavalry, whereas at the beginning he purposed to be at the charge of a

The Conful after he heard that Perfens was gone, approached with his army neer to Gonnbs, and there lodged; if haply he might force and gain that also. Situat it was over against Tempe, at the very mouth and guillet of the fireights, and is the very frontier Town, yeelding both a most affired G defence and firength to all Macedon; and also a commodious passage for the Macedonians to enterinto Theffaly. And being a place impregnable, as well for the natural fite thereof, as the firong garison therein planted, he gave over the enterprise. So turning and bending his way into Perrhabia; after he had forced Mallanat the first assault and put it to the raniack; and received Tripolis with the rest of Perrhabia, yeelded by composition he terrined to Lariffa. And then having ient Emmenes and Assalus home into their own country, and bestowed Mifagenes and the Numidiam in divers Cities of The fal, neer at hand to remain there for the winter time; and distributed part of his forces throughout all The fat, in such fort, that not only they had all commodious winning, but also served in stead of garrisons to the Cities, Q. Matus his Lieutenant he sent with aregiment of 2000 men to guard Ambracia and keep it in obedience. All the confederars of the D Greek Cities, fave only the Acharans he licensed to depart. With one part of his army he went into Theffaly in Phthia, where he rafed down to the ground Pecleum abandoned of the inhabitants. But Antrona he won with the good will of the Townsmen. Then afterward he approached before Lariff a with his forces. The City was left defolat, for all the people were retired into the formels, the which he began to affault and first the Kings garrison of Macedonians quit the place: of whom the Townsmen being for sken and left to themselves, submitted incontinently. Then he floodindoubt whether he should assail Demetrias first, or have an eye and look into the troubles and flate of Bustia. For the men of Thebes being grievoully molested and annoied by those of Gronas, had fent for him into Baotia: at whose praiers, thither he conducted his army; and besides, Bastia was a country more commodious to winter in than Magnesia.

Divers Pretors were judicially condemned, for demeaning themselves with cruelty and avarice in the administration of their Provinces. P. Licinius Crassius the Pro-consul, won by force many Cities, an Cittee, and cruelly risled them. For which rigour of his, the captives whom he had sold under the seriand in open market, were by an order directed out of the Senat, restored esterward to the former spain. The Admirals of the Roman selects committed many outrages and conventies against their alliest spains, there are comprised in this book, the prosperous affairs of King Perseus in Thr. cerafter he had smanished the Dardanians and subdued Illyticum, whereof Gentius was King. The troubles, which is an in Spain by means of Olonicus, were appeased by his death. M. Emylins Lepidus, was by the constructed president of the Senat.

He fame furnier, wherein the Romans wan the victory with horse-fight in Thessay, the Lieutenant being sent into Miricum from the Consul, compelled by force and arms two rich Towns to yields unto which nevertheless he gave all their goods again, to the end that by an opinion of this clemency, he might win the hearts of the inhabitants of Carnus, that ftrong City. But when he faw that he could not confirm them to render, no more! than force them by fiege; because his fouldiers should not feem to have been wearied for nought in the befieging of two Towns, he fell to rifle and ranfack that, which before he left unrouched The other Conful C. Coffin neither performed any memorable exploit in Gaul, which was his Province by lot : and having endeavoured to conduct his legions through Myricum into Macedony, all his designment came to no effect at all. That the Consul was entred upon this journey, the Senat was certified by the Embassadors of the Aquileians: who complained that theis colony newly erceted was feeble, and not as yet well fecured among those fierce nations of littins and Illyrians: and withal they made fuit, that the Senat would provide and take order; that the faid colony might be fortified : and when the question was put unto them, Whether they would be content that commission should be directed unto C. Cassim, in that behalf? they answered, That I the faid Caffins, having affembled his army at the Rendez vons in Aguileia, was departed through Sclavonia into Macedony. This at first was thought incredible, and every man supposed veniy, that he had been gone to devy war, upon the Carnians haply or the Istrians. The Aquilcians were able to reply no fatther, nor affirm more upon their knowledge than this, That allowance of com was made for the fouldiers to ferre thirty daies, and that guids were fought and brought out, who knew the waies out of Italy into Macedony. Hereat the Senate (ye may be fure) took great fouff and was highly displeased, that the Consul should be so hardy as presume to leave his own province for to pass into that which belonged to another, and to lead his army an unknown and new way, and the same dangerous, through strange and forrain countries, thereby to open pasfage as it were, for fo many nations to come into Italy. Whereupon in a frequent affembly of g the Senators, there passed a decree, That C. Sulpitius the Prator should nominat three Emballadors out of the body of the Senat, forto depart out of the City shat present day, to make all the haft they possibly could to overtake the Conful wheresoever he was, and to give him warning to levy no war against any nation without direct warrant from the Senat. And these Embassadors went, namely, M. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Fulvius, and P. Martius Rex. The present fear as touching the Conful and the army, was the occasion that the care of fostilying Aquileia was deferred

After this, were the Embassadors of certain States in both Provinces of Spain admitted to come into the Senat: who complained of the covetouines and pride of the Roman Officers and Governors among them; humbly beleeching the Senat upon their knees, Not to fuffer them (being L allies and confederats) to be more shamefully pilled and spoiled than the very enemies. Among other indignities for which they shewed themselves aggrieved, notorious it was, that the said Magistrats hadraken bribes, yea, and used extortion in wringing mony from them. Whereupons commission was granted to L. Canuleius the Pretor (unto whom Spain by lot was fain) to ordain five judges or commissioners (and those out of the rank and degree of Senators) for every person of whom the Spaniards claimed to recover such monies; and likewise to permit the plaintifs to take unto them what Advocats and Counsel they would. Then, after those Embassadors were called again into the Senat, this decree and act of the Senat was read unto them, and willed they were to nominat their Advocats ; who named four, to wit, M. Porcius Cato, P. Cornelius Scipio the fon of Cnius, L. Emplius Paulus the fon of Marque, and C. Sulpitins Gallus. And first they M took commissioners to proceed against M. Titinius, who had been Pretor in the hither Province of Sp.in, when Au. Manlius and M. Janius were Confuls, Twice was the cause of the accused party adjourned to a farther time, but at the third fession he was quit and found unguilty. Then arole some variance and dissention between the Embassadors of those two Provinces, The States of this higher Spain, took for their patrons and Advocats, M. Cate and Scipio they of the latther and lower Spain, made choice of L. Panins and Gallus, Sulpains. They of high Spain convented before the delegate judges, P. Furius Philus; the other of the bale Spain, M. Matienus, Philushid been L. Deputy there three years past, when Sp. Posthumius and Q. Mutius were Consuls; but this Matienus two years before, during the Confulfhip of L. Pofthumins and M. Popitius. Charged they were both of them with right grievous matters and imputations, and a farther daygue. N ted of a final judgment: but when they were to answer judicially again, they made default; and for excuse it was alledged, that they were both our of the country; and so they departed into voluntary exile, Furius to Praneste, and Matienus to Tyber. The voice went, that the partons of the plaintis would not suffer them to follow process still against such noble and great performances. nages: and the suspition hereof was more pregnant, by reason that Canulcius the Pretor let this matter fall, and began to take musters and levy fouldiers for the war; and so forthwith directly went into the Province, to the end that no more men should be brought into question and troubled by these Spaniards. By this means, all former matters past were buried in silence and nomone speech made of them; but for suture time, the Senat took order and provided for the Spaniards so well, that they obtained an immunity, That no Roman Magistrate should have power and an 0 thority to let the price upon any grain, nor force the Spaniards to fell the Kies figures at what rate he pleased to set down: also that there should be no commissioners appointed within their Towns for the gathering and receiving of the revenues and mony issuing from thence, Besides, there came another embassy of a fort of people out of Spain, after a new and strange manner : forther were above four hundred persons, avouching themselves the children of Roman souldiers and Spanish women not joyned in wedlock: who appeared before the Senar and belought them, to

A to allow them a City to inhabit. Wherupon ordained it was, That they should enter their names and be matriculated before their Pretor L. Canuleius: and look whomsoever of them he affranchised and made free, those they thought meet to be sent to Carreia neer the Sea side, and there planted: also that those Carreians, who were willing still to keep home and remain there, should be priviledged as Coloners and so enrolled, and to enjoy besides a portion of Lands affigued unto them. This was a Latine colony, and was called the Colony of the Libertins.

At the same time there came as Embassador out of Africk, Gulussa the son of Majanisa, and likewise the Carthaginian embassage, Gulussa first was brought into the Senat; who declared what his father had fent unto them against the Macedonian : promising withal, that if it pleased them to impose more upon him, he would be ready to perform the same in remembrance of the benefits B received from the people of Rome: finally, he gave the LL, of the Senat a caveat by the way to take heed that the Carthaginians deceived them not in the end: for that resolved they were, and went in hand to prepare a great navy under pretence of fending it to the Romans against the Macedonians; which if it were once ready rigged and furnished, it was in their choice then, to make whom they would either triends or toes. Being entred the camp and shewing the heads aloft, they struck such a feat, that if immediatly the army had come forward and advanced against them, the camp might have been won: and yet even then as it was they fled amain: and some there were who gave their opinion, to fend Embassadors to treat and with praiers to intreat for peace. Upon the news reported hereof, many Cities submitted and were surrendred. Such as made excuse, and laid the fault upon the folly of two C persons only, who had of their own accord offered themselves to be punished, obtained pardon of the Pretor. And then forthwith he went in expedition against other Cities; but finding them all ready to do whatfoever they were commanded, he passed quietly with his army through that countrey in peace, which but a while before was all up in arms and on a light fire. This lenity of the Pretor, which he used in taming and subduing this most fierce and proud nation without effusion of blood, was by fo much more acceptable to the LL, of the Senat and the whole body of the people, as the Conful Licinius and the other Pretor Lucretius had warred in Greece with greater cruelty and avarice. As for Lucretius, the Tribuns of the Commons accused him daily in their ordinary Orations before the people for his absence: Notwithstanding his excuse was alledged, that ablent he was, and employed about the affairs of the State. But in those daies, so unknown were Dthings done hard by, that eyen at that present he was at his farm within the territory of Antinm. and bufy in conveighing a conduct of water out of the river Coracinato Antium: the charges whereothe defraied with the money railed out of the fale of prizestaken from the enemies. Some say that he bargained to have that peece of work effected, for the sum of a hundred and 12000 Alies, Moreover he embelished and adorned the Temple of Asculapius, with the painted tables found in the pillage,... The envy and ill will, the obloquy also and dishonor like to grow to Lucretius, turned upon his successor Horsen suc, by occasion of the Embassadors of Abder a who in piteous wife complained with tears before the Senat; that their Town was by Hortenfine forced and ranfacked: How the cause of this ruin and destruction of their City was no more but this, that being enjoined by him to make paiment of a hundred thouland Denarii, and allowance E of hity thousand Modii of wheat, they requested some respit of time, wherein they might address their Embassadors, as well to Hostilius the Consul as unto Rome, concerning this imposition. For fearcely were they come unto the faid Conful, but they heard how their City was forced the principal citizens thereof beheaded, and all the rethfold in port-fale under the garland. These were grievous indignities in the fight of the Senar, whereupon they passed the same ordinance in the behalf of the Abderits, that the year before had been directed in the like case as couching the Corongans; and commanded the Pretor Q. Manins to publish the said decree before the publick affembly of the people. In like mannet two Commissioners were sent, namely C. Sempromus Blasue; and S. Julius Casar for to re-establish the Abderits in their freedom: who also had in charge to fightify from them; both to the Conful Hoftilius, and also to the Pretor Hortenfies, That the Senate judged the hostility offered unto the Abderits injurious, and the war unlawful, and therefore that all such as were brought into servicude, should be sought our and restored again

At the fame time prefentation was made unto the Senat of certain complaints against C.Caffint who had been Consultive year before, and at that time was emploied in quality of a Colonelmarshal together with A. Holitims in Macedony. Likewise there arrived the Embassadors of funcibility a petry. King, of the Ganls. A brother of his staving audience granted in the Senat made a peech, wherein be complained, that C.Cassins had given the wast to the lands and territories of the people inhabiting the Alps, who were their allies and consederats, and from the since had led aMay into captivity many thousand persons. And much at one inflant there came the Embassidors 6 of the Carmians. In trians and Japides with complaints against Cassins. That first he had enjoined strong Machan, and so departed in peace from them, as if she had meant to wat elle-where but afserwards out of the midway of his journey, he returned upon them, and in hostile manner overtant their frontiers, robbing spoiling & burning whersoever he went and to this day they cannot devise

this answer, That as touching the outrages for which they shewed themselves grieved, the Senat H neither knew thereof beforehand, that ever they were intended, nor yet approved of the same, fince they were committed. But against all right and equity it were to condemn unheard in his own defence, and abient, such a personage as he is, namely, a man who had been Consul; considering allo that his emploiment about the C.W. is the occasion of his absence, When C. Cassimie once returned out of Macedony, then if they would shew themselves and accuse him sage to sace. the Senat would hear the cause and take knowledge accordingly, yea, and endeavour that they should be satisfied and contented. Moreover, thought good it was, that these nations should not be disparched only with this bare answer, but that Embassadors also should be sent : two unto the forefaid King beyond the Alps: and other three to the people above named for to acquain them with the resolution of the Lords of the Senat. And they gave order besides to send present to I each of the Embassadors to the value of two thousand Asses over and above, to the two Princes that were brethren, these gifts following, to wit, two chains of gold weighing after they were wrought five pound of gold: also five peeces of plate in filver, amounting to the weight of twenty pound: two bard hories with their riders and lackies: likewife horiemens armonrand their caffocks: and liveries likewise for all those of their train, as well bond as free. These were the things sent unto them. But at their own request granted it was besides, that they might for their mony buy each of them ten horses, and be allowed to transport them out of Italy. The Embassiadors lent with the Gauls beyond the mountains, were C. Lalius and M. Emylius Lepidus: to the other nations C. Sicinius, P. Cornelius Blafio, and T. Memmius. Moreover, there met together in Rome at once, the Embassadors of many States both of Greece & and Afia. And first the Athenians were brought into the Senat, who related, That they had fent unto the Conful P. Licinius and the Pretor C. Lucretius, what shipping they had, and all the fighting men they were able to make : but feeing they had no use of them, they had raised a levy of a hundred thousand Modii of corn. Which, albeit their land was but barren for tillage, and the very husbandmen themselves lived of fortain corn brought in unto them, yet they had made means to do accordingly, because they would not seem to be wanting in any dutiful service: and willing they were yet, and prest to perform whatsoever they would require. The Milesians for their part faid. That hitherto they had done nothing, marry they offred themselves to be ready to accomplish all that the Senat should command them toward this war. The Alabandians shewed, That they had built a * Temple to the City of Rome, and ordained besides, that in the honour of that I goddess there should be a solemnity of games and plaies exhibited every year. Also, that they had brought with them for a present, a crown of gold weighing fifty pound, to set it up in the Capicol as a gift and offering to Iup, Opt. Max. and withal, three hundred horimens shields, which they were minded to bellow upon those, unto whom it pleased them to appoint and command, Their petition was, that they might be permitted to offer their present in the Capitol, and there to sacrifice. The men of Lampfacus came with a golden crown weighing fourscore pound, protesting, That they had quit and abandoned Perfeus, fo foon as ever the Roman army was arrived in Macedom, notwithitanding they owed allegeance unto Perfess, and were homagers to his father Philip before him. In which confideration as also for that they had performed their devoir to their full power to the Roman Generals, they requested no other favour to be gratified withal, but M to be received into the amity of the people of Rome : and in case there should be peace concluded with Perfens, that they might be excepted and exempted in the accord, for being reduced under his obedience. The rest of the Embassadors had a gracious answer returned unto them. As for the Lampiacens, order was given to Q. Manine the Pretor, to enter and enrolthem in the number of allies. Every one of these Embassadors were rewarded with a present worth two thousand Affes. The Alabandians were appointed to carry back with them into Macedony their shields aforesaid, and to deliver them unto A. Hostilius the Conful. Over and besides, the Carthaginian Embassadors out of Africk, made relation that they had brought from thence ten hundred thoufand Modii of wheat, and five hundred thousand of barley, which they had on shipboard at the fea-fide, ready to cary the same wheresoever the Senat would appoint. This benevolence of theirs N they accompanied with good words, saying, they knew well that this gift and recognisme of their duty, was inferior either to their own good will, or the demerits of the people of Rome Howbeit many times heretofore they had shewed themselves to do the part of thankful, faithful, and trufty allies, in all things tending to the profit and good of both states. In like fort the Emballadors of Majaniffa promised the same proportion of corn, with 1 200 horse, and twelve Elephants, afforing them in his name, to do whatfoever the Senate would impose and should be thought needful; and that with as free an heart as the benevolence offered of his own accord. Thanks being given both to the Carthaginians and also to the King, requested they were to transport over into Macedony to the Conful A. Hoftilius, those things which they had promised. To the Embassadors were sent by way of presents, two thousand Asses apeece. The Cretensian Em-O bassadors, related how they had sent into Macedony such a number of Archers, as the Consul P. Licinius had imposed upon them: and when they denied not upon the question asked, that there ferved more Archers of theirs under Perfew than with the Romans, this answer was madeunto them, That if the Cretenfians would well and truly and in good earnest prefer the friendship of the people of Rome before that of King Perfeus, the Senat of Rome likewise would give them are fwer as certain and affured allies : in the mean while, they should lar their marry-men to under

A fland, that it was the will and pleasure of the Senat, that the Cretensians should with all speed posfible call home all those fouldiers whom they had in any garrison of King Perfew. The Candiots being dismissed with this dispatch, then the Chalcidians were called in : and at the very first fight of them, it foon appeared upon what terms of necessity they were driven to send an embassage: when Miccion the chief man among them, by occasion that he was lame with the gout in his feet, was brought into the Senat in a litter, In which extremity difeafed as he was, there was no pleading of any excute by his infirmity, nor craving pardon, fince he was to go without, when he had alldone. He began by way of preface and preaamble, faying, "He had nothing left alive but his "tongue for to deplore and bewail the calamities of his country : then he went forward, and first Thewed what courtefies and good turns the State wherin he lived had performed to the Captains General and armies of the Romans, both of old, and also of late in the war against Perfeus. After this, he declared what parts of pride, covetouines, and ruelty, first, C. Lucretius a Roman Pretor " hadexercifed upon his country-men, and afterwards what L. Hortenfins practifed, at that time "aboveall others: also how the Chalcidians were resolved to endure all calamities, were they " more grievous than those which they presently suffred rather than they would yeeld to Perfeus. " And as for Lucretius and Hortenfius, they knew full well, that it had been better and more for "their fafety to have shut their gates against them than to receive them into their City. For such a shad excluded them forth, as namely, they of Emathia, Amphipolis, Maronea, and Enus, remain "fillentire and in good estate; but with us (lay they) the Temples have been robbed of all their "beautiful ornaments, and utterly spoiled by these sacriledgers, C. Lucretius hath carried all away C "by water over to Anium, and hath led away into bondage and captivity the persons free born. "So as the goods and fortunes of the allies of the people of Rome, both have been and daily are pil-"led & rifled. For according to the use & tashion brought up by C. Lucretius, Hortensius likewise "houseth his mariners as well in summer as winter, and our houses are ful of a rabble of these sailers " and fea-men, in fuch fort as our wives and children be forced to converse among such grooms as "make no account at all what either they say or do. Hereupon thought good it was, to send for Lucreins into the Senat, that he might fee his accuser, answer face to face, and purge himself of thesechallenges. But when he was come in place, he heard much more in presence, than had been fooken against him in his absence. Over and besides, there shewed themselves and joined together. seainst him.two other more stout adversaries and bitter accusers, to wit, M. Iuventius Talva and Den Aufidine. And these two not only coursed him before the Senat, but also having drawn him. perforce into the general affembly of the people, and charged him before them with many reproa-ties, took our process also and arrested him to make his appearance and answer judicially at a day before the people, Then Q. Manins the Pretor, by order from the Senat, answered the Chalcidians in this manner: Wheras ye alledge and fay, That ye have well deserved of the people of Rome both hererofore and also in this present war now in hand, the Senat knoweth all that to be true, and accepteth the same thankfully in the best part, as of right they ought. As touching your grievances and complaints for the lewd parts which C. Lucretius hath plaied, and which L. Hortenfius ftill practileth (both Pretors of Rome) the same neither have been nor are committed and done by the will and allowance of the people of Rome. For who would not judge so of it, that knoweth how E they levyed war upon King Perfeus and his father Philip before him, for to enfranchise Greece and fer trat liberty; and not that their allies and friends should thus hardly be intreated by their Magiftrats and Governors fent from hence? Write therfore they would unto L. Hortenfius the Pretor, to let him understand, that the Senate is not well pleased with these pranks of his which the Chalcidians complain of. Also if any free born persons were become thrall and bound, that with all convenient speed he should take order to seek them up and restore them again to their former freedom. Last of all, that they deemed it meet and reason, that no sailer or mariner, but only the masters of ships should be lodged and entertained in your houses. And these were the contents of the letters written unto Hortenfius, by commandment from the Senate. Unto the Embassadors were gifts fent, to every one asmuch as came to 2000 Asses. As for Miccion, he was allowed his Ferriage in chariots at the charges of the City, and order given that he should with all ease ride in them to Brundusum, As for C. Lucretius, when the day of appearance was come, the Tribuns commented an action against him before the people, to be a fined at a million of Affes. And in a genetall affembly and Seffion holden for this purpole, cast he was and condemned by the suffrages of all the tribes, even thirty five and no fewer, In Ligaria no memorable exploit was that year performed: for neither the enemies entred into

ms, nor the Conful led his legions into their country; and when he was affured of peace for that year, he discharged the souldiers of two Roman legions, within 60 daies after his first coming into the Province. As for the army of the Latine allies, he brought it early into the Cities of Luna and Pifa there to winter: and then himself with the cavalry visited most of the Cities in the Province of Gaul.

In no place was there any war but in Macedony: howbeit they had in suspition Gentius and the Ling of the Illyrians. Therefore the Senate ordained to fend from Brundufium eight ships ready neged and fully furnished, unto the Lieutenant C. Furius at * 1 ff a, who was Governor of the lland with the guard and firength of two lifean Veffels; in which were put aboord and fipped 2000 fouldiers, which Q. Manius the Pretor by a warrant directed out of the Senate, enrolled in that querer of Italy which lieth opposite to Illyricum. In like manner the Consul Hostilius sent

men of divers and fundry nations. And after he had made his progrets through all that region he fer him down and rested at Lichridum a City of the Dassatetians, Not far from thence there stood a frontier Town called Ufcana, and for the most part ranged under the obedience of Perfent, There were within it one thousand citizens, and a small garrison of Cretensians for their better safeguard and defence. From thence there came to Claudius fecret courriers, advertifing him, that if he would approach neerer with his army, there would be some ready at hand to betray the Town into his hands: and worth the adventure it was (fay they) and would quit for all the pains: for able it was with pillage to enrich not himself and his friends only, but also all his souldiers. The I hope of this cheat, fitting fo well his covetous humour, fo blinded his spirit and understanding, that he had not the sence to keep with him any one of those contriers that came unto him, nor the wisedom to demand hostages for assurance of his enterprise which was to be accomplished by ftealth and fraud, nor yet the forecast to fend out scouts and espies, or so much reason and motherwit as to require their oath and bond of faithful promise. Only at the day appointed he departed from Lychnidum, and within twelve miles of that City toward which he went, he encamped. Then by night at the relief of the fourth watch, he removed and fet forward, leaving behind him a regiment of a thousand, for the guard of the camp, At length, to the City they come, disordered in a long train, marching nothing close, but far afunder loofly one from another and scattered, by reason that in the night season they went many of them out of the way. This negligence of theirs k was the more, when they saw no man appearing upon the walls: but so soon as they were approached within a darts cast, the inhabitants issued forth at once out of 2 gates and together with the shout of them that sallied forth, a mighty noise and outcry besides arose from the walls; of women howling, yelling, and ringing brasen basons and bells on every hand; besides, the consused multitude of the base people and bond-slaves together, set up most hideous and dissonanticies. These manifold terrors presented from all parts, were the cause that the Romans could not abide and stand out the first tempest and violent storm, as it were, of their fally and charge. Down they went therefore, and were flain more in flight than fight; and scarce 2000 men with the Lieutenant himself, escaped and recovered the camp: for the longer way they had thither the more means and opportunity had the enemies to chase and overtake a great number of them, wearied L upon the way. Appius stayed not so long in the camp, until he had rallied those that were disperfed in the rout, (which had been the only way to have faved those that were fragled in the fields) but immediatly revired with the broken reliques of his army after this overthrow, to Lychnidum. This infelicity and such other like misfortunes happing in Macedony were made known at Rome, by occasion of Sex. Digitius a Colonel, who was returned home for to celebrate a solemn factifice. In regard whereof, the LL. of the Senat fearing to receive fome greater ignominy and dishonour, addressed Embassadors into Macedony, M. Fulvius Flaceus and M. Caninius Rebulus, to make a true report upon their knowledg how the world went there. Also that A. Hostiliu: the Consul should publish the assembly general for the election of Consuls, so as it might be holden in the month of January, and then repair himself with all convenient speed to the City. In the mean time, M M. Revius the Pretor had in charge, by vertue of an edict, to call home into the City all Senators doubt, that for from every quarter of Italy, unless such as were absent about the affairs of the state: also to give L septemorus in fireight warning to them who now were at Rome, not to absent themselves farther than a mile bruarii.] and from the City. These things were done according to the advice of the Senat, So the grand affemthen is it the bly for the election of the Confuls, was holden the * 28 day of August; wherein were created 28 of Ianuari : Confuls, Q. Martius Philippus the second time, and Q. Servilius Capio, Three daies after the Prewhich consumer tors also were chosen, namely, Caius Decimius, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Sulpitius Gallus, C. Martining the precedent met- us Figulus, Ser. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Fonteius Capito. Unto these Pretors elect, besides the fage and the two charges within the City of civil inriduction, thele four provinces and governments were circumRances, fuiteth better to the ftory.

Appens Claudius into Illyricum with four thouland footmen, for to defend the people in those H parts: who not content with those forces of his own which he had brought with him thither, demanded here and there aids and fuccours of the allies, until he had put in arms eight thousand affigned, to wit, Spin, Sardinia, Sicily, and the admiralty of the navy.

At the very end of February, the Embaffadors aforfaid returned out of Macedony: who reconn ted the acts atchieved fortunatly by Perfeus the lummer past, and in how great fear the allies of To the God the people of Rome flood, after fo many Cities reduced under the obeilance of the King. MoreofBounds, Ter- over, that the Conful his army was disfurnished of men, by reason that so many of them made minus. Solem friends to be discharged and to for favour had their pass-port and were dismissed: the fault herein, the Conful laid upon the military Tribuns or Colonels, and they again upon him. The LL of the Senat perceived well that they made but light of the shameful foil received by the incomideend of Februarate rashiness of Claudius, in saying, That there were but very few souldiers lost of the Italian nation, and those for the most part taken up in hast and enrolled on a suddain. The Consuls electio foon as they entred into their magistracy, were commanded to propound unto the Senat con-O reth by Ovid. cerning the Province of Macedony, and to them were affigued the governments of Italy and Mace-T ift.2. Qui fedony, This year was leap-year, and the third day after the feat * Terminalia, was the day inferted veteris fuit ni. between, which hapned upon the calends [of March.] Within the compass of that year certain timus anni: Tu Priests to wit, L. Flaminius, and two Pontifies or Bishops, L. Furius Philus, and C. Livius Salinafor, departed this life. The colledge of these Pontifies, elected T. Manlins Torquarus in stead of rum, Termine,

Furius, and Marcus Servilius in the room of Livius,

In the beginning of the year next following, after that the new Coff. Q. Martins and Q. Servilia at, had moved in the Senat as conching their provinces, advised it was, That with all speed possiblethey should either agree between themselves, or else cast lots for the governments in Italy and in Macedony. And before that the lots determined this matter fo doubtful and uncertain, to the end that nothing afterwards should be done for favour partially, thought good it was, to ordain belote hand a competent and sufficient number of souldiers for the supplement of the armies in both Provinces: namely, for Mecedon 6000 footmen of Romans, and as many of Latine allies : 250 horsemen Romans, and 300 allies: also to cass the old souldiers, so as in every Roman legion there should not be above 6000 soos and 300 horse. As for the other Consul, he was not gaged. with any certain ffint of Roman citizens, to be levied for the full accomplishment of his legions, B Only this was determinatly fet down, That he should enrol two legions, and either of them to contain 5200 foot and 200 horse: but forfootmen of Latins, he had a greater number allowed than his colleague; namely, 10000 foot and 600 horfe. Moreover, commandment was given to enrol four legions more, to be led forth into the field, upon what need and occasion foever should fall out. The Marshal-Colonels of the army the Consuls might not be permitted to elect: but created they were by the people. The allies of the Latine nation were enjoined to fet out firteen thousand foot and a thousand horse. And this power was only to be in a readiness at an hours warning, for to be led forth as occasion should be offered. Their principal care was about Maeedony. Ordainedalfo it was, That for the fervice at Sea, there should be enrolled to serve the navy, of the Roman citizens (fuch as were libertins and newly enfranchifed) out of all parts of C leafy one thouland, and as many out of Sicily. And unto whether of the Confuls the Province of Macedony fell, he should give order for their transporting thither, to the armado wheresoever it was, For Spain there were three thousand Roman footmen and three hundred horsemen appointed to make up the decaied bands. There also, a certain number was let down for every legion, to wit, five thousand foot and three hundred and this ty horse. Moreover, that Consul whose lot was to govern in Spain, had commission to levy of the allies four thousand footmen, and three

Tim not ignorant, that from the same prophane negligence and irreligion, whereby commonly the same prophane negligence and irreligion, whereby commonly igns. men now adaies are of belief, that the Gods portend and fore-fignify nothing to come by figns and tokens ; it proceedeth also, That no prodigies which happen, should any more, either be pu-D bliffed and reported abroad, or recorded in the annals and chronicles. Howbeit, for mine own part, in writing of these acts and monuments of ancient times, I know not how, but me thinks I cary a mind, that is become (as it were) antique also; yea, and some scrupulous devotion ariseth in my spirit, which moveth me to account the things not unworthy to have place in my histories, which those sage fathers and most prudent personages in old time thought meet to be considered of by the State, yea, and to require publick expiation. Well, to proceed, from Anagn awere two fearful fights reported that year, namely. That aburning and blazing flame was feen in the skie; and a cow known to speak kept and nourished at the publick charges. At Minturna also much about thosedaies, the welkin seemed to be on a light fire. At Reare there fell a shower that rained stones. In the fortress at Cumes the image of Apollo wept three daies and three nights continually. In the E City of Rome, two fextons or keepers of the Temples made report, the one, That in the Church of Fortune there was a Serpent feen by many men, crefted with a mane : the other. That about the Chappel of * Fortuna Primigenia, which standeth upon the Capitol hill, there happed two divers * Cum grips: and different prodigious figns, namely, That in the Chappel-yard there forung up a palm-tree; and genitis facritie all one day it rained blood. Two other firange things there were, whereof there was no regard when the was nor account made; the first, because it chanced in a privat place; for T. Martius Figulus reported, first born 247. That there grew up a palm or date-tree in his court-yard: the second, because it hapned in a forrain Marlianta. place for spoken it was, That at Fregelle in the house of M. Atreus, a lance or spear which he had bought for his fon a fouldier, burned in the day time for two hours space and more, yet so, as the fire confirmed nothing thereof. In regard of those publick prodigies, the Decemvirs had recourfe to the books of Sibylla 1 who out of them declared, That the Confuls should sacrifice forty head of greater beafts, and they shewed also to what Gods. They added moreover and gave advice to hold a publick procession, and that all the Magistrats at every shrine and upon every alter of the Gods should facrifice greater beasts, and the people wear garlands and chapters of flowers. All things were executed accordingly, as the Decemvirs suggested and directed.

After this, the affembly was published for the chusing of Cenfors. In election there were for this dignity of Centorship, the very principal persons and of best note in all the City, C. Valerius Lavinus, L. Post humins Albinus, P. Musius Scavola, C. Junius Brutus, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tilis Sempranius Gracehus. These two last rehearsed the people of Rome chose for Censors. When as by occasion of the Macedonian war, a greater care was had about the taking of musters, than at other limes before, the Confuls found much fault with the common people, and complained unto the Senat, that the yong and able men for service being called, would not answer to their names. But C.Sulpitius and M. Claudius two Tribuns of the Commons, maintained the cause against them in the behalf of the Commons, faying, That it was no hard and difficult matter for Confuls to levy fouldiers: mary, for corrupt, affectionat and popular Confuls, it was not fo easy a thing, and namely fuch as would be fure to enrol no fouldiers against their wills. And to the end that the LL. of the Senate might know this to be a truth, they should see the Pretors (if the Senate were fo content, and thought well thereof) whose power of command and anthority of government H was * less than the Confuls, to go through with the musters without empetthment. So that The civil Presors within charge was committed to the Pretors with the great affent of the Senators, but not without some the City were backbiting and detraction of the Confuls. And the Cenfors for to affilk and let forward that affair, allowed but made it known, and protested in the full assembly of the nepole, that they would until made it known, and protested in the full assembly of the people, that they would publish in at as touching the review and estimat of every mans demeanour and hability, that besides the ordin and the provincial abroad nary oath of all citizens, they should swear to these points in this form following: Alt thou invincias aurono der fix and forty years of age? then by vertue of the edich made by the Cenfors C. Chanting and not above fix Tib. Sempronius, come forth and shew thy self at the musters so often as there shall be any levy taken : and what Cenfors foever shall happen to be in place, thou shall appear and be enrolled, in case thou wert not a prest souldier before. Moreover because the voice went; that many souldiers t of the Macedonian legions were abient from the army, and had obtained large pasports without Aku, wher- limitation of return, and that through the corruption and favour of the Generals, they published as each Con- an edict as touching the fouldiers enrolled for Macedony, when P. Elisa and C. Popilius were Conful had every fuls, or any time after, That as many of them as remained within Italy, after they were enrolled where twelve. and registred first under their hands, should within thirty daies repair again to their colours into the province : and who foever of them were at the disposition of father or grandine, their names should be presented and declared before them. Semblably, they would take knowledge of their causes who were clean dismissed and cassed : and look whomsbever they judged to have obtained their discharge by any special grace and favour, before they had served our their full time by law required, they would command them to be enrolled fouldiers again. By vertue of this edict of the K Cenfors, as also by their letters sent out and divulged abroad in all incorporat Towns and places of refort for market and merchandife, there affembled together and came to Rome inch a multitude of lufty, yong, and able men, that their unufual and extraordinary number was chargeable and cumberous to the City. Thus befides the former levy taken of those that were to be fent and emploied in supply of the old armies, sour legions more were enrolled by C. Sulpitius the Pretor, and within eleven daies the musters were accomplished and ended. Then the Confuls cast lots for their provinces. For the Pretors had their governments allotted unto them before, and the fooner, by reason of the civil causes which required their jurisdictions. The one over the citizens was faln to C. Sulpitius, the other over forrainers to C. Decimins. M. Claudius Marcellus obtained the regiment of Spain, Serg. Cornelius Lentulus of Sicily, P. Fonteius L Capito ruled Sardinia, C. Martius Figulus had the conduct of the navy. And then, I fay, to QSirvilius one of the Confuls fell the government of Italy, and to Q. Martius the other of Macedony. This Martins fo foon as the Latine feasts were folemniled, departed toward his province immediatly. After this, upon the motion of Capio to the Senat to know their pleasure, which two legions of the new he should conduct into Gaul? the LL. ordained, That the Pretors C. Sulpitius and M. Claudius should give unto the Consul, which it pleased them of those legions that they had enrolled. This he took to the heart, that he a Conful was thus subjected to the will of the Pretors: yet after the Senat was risen, he flood waiting at the Tribunal of the Pretors, and required them according to the order let down by the Senat, to affign him his two legions. But the Pretors submitted the choice thereof to the Coi, himself. This done, the Censors took a review M of the Senat and chole new Senators: and M. Emylina Lepidus was elected prefident of the Senat; and these were the third Senators that made choice of him contequently one after another. Seven were displaced and deposed from their Senators dignity. Now in taking the number of the people, and in affesting them, they compelled to return into Macedon; those who were departed from the army there: and by means of this affeiment, they foon knew who were abient from their companies: they examined them for what causes they were discharged from souldery; and whose licence they judged not to be grounded of good and sufficient reason those they forced to take the military oath again in this manner and form : According to the edict of C. Claudini and Tib. Sempronius the Cenfors, thou shalt well and truly swear, to return willingly and with all thine heart, into the province of Macedony; and this shalt thou do to thy power without fraud or covin. In N making the review of them that ferved on horseback, their censure was executed with great rigour and extremity. They took from many their horses of service: upon which occasion having given offence to the whole estate of Knights and Gentlemen of Rome, they blew the coalsand kindled the fire of ill-will and heart-burning against themselves: by a certain edict of theirs besides, wherby they intimated, That none of them who in time that Q. Fulvius and Au, Posthumius the Cenfors had taken to farm the revenews, fruits and profits of the City, or undertaken at a price the publick works and provisions, should be so hardy as to present themselves to their spear set up, either to be farmers or undertakers, no, nor to be partners, or have any thing to do with thole that were in such negotiation, commerce and bargain. The old Publicans and farmers had oftentimes complained hereof to the Senat : but when they could obtain no comfort from them; 0 to moderate and abridge this infinite power of the Cenfers, at length they met with a Tribune of the Commons, one Rutilius, to stand with them and defend their cause; a man who upon a particular and private quarrel of his own was offended and bare a grudge against the Centors, And this was the occasion: They had commanded one of his late vassals and enfranchised retainers, to pull down a wall standing in the street Sacra over against a publick edifice; pretending that the faid wall was built upon the City ground. The man a private person, called unto the Tribuns for their lawful help and favour: but when as none of them all but only this Kutiling would meddle in the matter and interpole their helping hand, the Centors lent to strain and take gages for to bind him to answer the cause, and before the body of the people intended an action bon against him, and fet a grievous fine upon the head of that party aforesaid. By means I say of this debate begun upon fuch an occasion, when as the old publicans betook themselves for succourted this Tribune, prefently there was a bill preferred and substribed with the name of the said Tribune alone, in this form, That what publick revenews and profits of the State, C. Claudius and T. Semwoning had to farm let for a rent, or what publick works and provisions they had put out to be made and purveied at a price, the same leases and bargains should not stand for good but be cancelled, and new demites drawn and made. Also that it might be lawfull for all men indifferently Reither to be farmers or undertakers of the premisses. And the said Tribune assigned a day for a general affembly and fession, to have this bill to be cast by the voices of the people. When the day was come, the Censors advanced and put themselves forward to disswade and plead against the hill. So long as Graechus spake, he was heard with patience and filence. But at Claudius, when he opened his mouth, they hiffed and kept amutteting, so as he was forced by an oiez made by the, crierto procure audience: which being made, the Tribune found himself grieved and complained, that the people there affembled were withdrawn and called away from him, to the prejudice of his authority and honour, and with that flang out of the Capitol where this affembly was holden. The next day he kept a great coil and made a foul fir: first, he interdicted the goods of Tib, Gracebur as condemned and accurred, for that in letting a fine, and streining gages of him; g who had appealed to a Tribune, and in not obeying and condescending to his opposition, he feemed to fee light by his Tribunes authority, and prejudice his reputation. As for C. Claudius. he arrefted him to answer at a day, for that he had withdrawn the affembly from him: nay, he proiefled that he would indite both the Cenfors of treason or felony in the highest degree, and required of Sulpitius Pretor for the citizens, a day of affizes for their judicial tryal. The Cenfors refused not to have this matter put to an issue with all speed, and to be tried by the doom of the people. So the time for the hearing and determining of this hainous crime of majesty or treason aforefaid, was affigned the * daies immediatly before the eight and seventh calends of Ottober. Upon this, the Cenfors incontinently afcended up into the Porch of Liberty: where after they "in ante 2 & 7 Upon this, the Centors incontinently architect up into the offices that made fore and fealed the publick Registers and Records, that up and locked all the offices but that is the noithe Chancery, and discharged for the time the publick Clarks and proto-Notatics attending 22 and 24 of upon that Court, they protested that they would not go in hand with any publick affairs of September, flate, before the sentence and judgment of the people were passed upon them, 'The day came, and Claudius first pleaded his own cause and spake for himself: and when of twelve Centuries that were of Gentlemen, eight had found the Cenfor guilty and cast him, yea and many other centuries of the first Claffis. Then presently, the principal persons of the City in the very fight of the people, changed their weed, laid away their rings, and went about from one to another in humble manner, to crave the commons to be good unto the Centors. But that which most of all either staid or reversed the definitive doom against him, was (by report) Tib: Gracchurhimleli the other Cenfor: for that when the commons cried from all parts, that there was E no danget growing toward Gracebus, he swate by express words, That if his colleague were condemued, he would (without attending the judgment of the people as touching himself) accompany him into banishment. Howbeit the defendant and accused person, was driven to this neer point and hard exigent of extremity, that he came within eight centuries of being cast and condemned. Thus when Claudius was acquir, the Tribune faid he would not trouble and molest

This year at the earnest suit of the Aquileian Embassadors unto the Senat, for to have the number of their colonies encreased; a thousand and five hundred families (by vertue, of a decree granted out of the Senate) were enrolled : and for the conducting of them to Aquileia, were fent as Triumvirs or commissioners these three, to wit, T. Annius Luscus, P. Decius Subulo, and M. Cor-Finlins Gethegus. The same year C. Popilins and Cn. Offavius Embassadors, who had been sent into Greece, having first read and published at Thebes the arest and ordinance of the Senat, carried it alterwards throughout all the Cities of Peloponnefus, to this effect, That no person should contribute toward the wars, and put into the hands of the Roman Magistrats, more than that which the Senat had let down. This put them in good hope and affurance for the future time that they should be eased of those charges and expenses, by which they were impoverished and wasted, whilesevery one imposed upon them some taxation or other, and never gave them repose. In the Achzan general councelholden at Argos, they had audience given them and were heard in graciousfort : from whence leaving this most loyal and faithful nation in fingular good hope of happy estate for the time to come, they passed into Atolia. There was as yet no sedition broken out there; but all were in jealousy and suspicion one of another, and sull of natural accusations: in regard of which jars and troubles, the Embassadors only demanded hostages, and without any other end made, went distriby into Acarnania. The Acarnanians granted unto these Embassadors a Diet to be hold at Tyrrheum: where some debate was between the partakers of divers factions. Some principal men of the States, required that there should begarritons received into their Cities, to bridle the wilfull folly of those that enclined to the Macedonian mion: others gainfaid this course, and besonight the contrary, for fear lest that peaceable and confederat Cities should be put to receive that digrace and dishonor, which usually fallen upon H known enemies and those that are conquered by force of arms. And this request was reputed just. Then the Embassadors returned to Lariff a unto Hossium the Pro-consultor from him they were emploied in embassage. Oftwiss he retained still with him: but Populius together with a 1000 souldiers or very neer, he sent to Ambracia, there to lodge for the winter time.
